Land Commission, in its double capacity acting for the Government and for the tenant, can whittle down the purchase money to something far below the true market price. There are many instances which prove beyond contradiction that this is actually taking place—notably, for example, on the estate of Mr. John Bury, and also on the Costello Estate. Therefore, as long as the Land Commission has the carriage of sales, in every case where a landlord or mortgagee can hold on by any possible means, he will not hand his property over to be sacrificed at something far less than the market value. I hear on all sides in Ireland that the Land Commission is one of the chief causes of the dead-lock in the sale of estates, and is acting in a manner entirely opposed to the spirit of the Act which it was embodied to carry out. It is curious, when one hears so much said by the supporters of the present Government as to the necessity of encouraging the transfer of land, that, in Ireland, where of all countries that encouragement is most needed, the Government officials should be doing all in their power to prevent the sale and purchase of estates. Then, again, the Land Commission have no power to apportion head rents in a country where head rents are the rule, which of itself is sufficient, without any other reason, to prevent the Purchase Clauses being worked. Last year, in calling your Lordships' attention to the Report and Evidence taken before the Committee appointed to investigate the working of the Land Act, I took the liberty of suggesting that, as there was already a Court in Ireland charged with the exclusive duty of the sale of land, and also had all the machinery at its command, with extraordinary legal powers of carrying out sales in the cheapest, most expeditious, and most satisfactory manner, without bias one way or the other, and at the present moment deprived of its legitimate work by the effects of the dead-lock produced by the Land Act, that it should be made use of for the purpose of rendering the Purchase Clauses workable. The Landed Estates Court has far better opportunities of assessing the true value of estates, and so preventing frauds being committed on the Government, than any other Court in Ireland, because upon all sales the value of the property must be fully gone into, and all parties interested come before it. It is accustomed, too, in declarations of title, to ascertain the value of the property, and, in addition, all previous transactions and dealings with the estate are in its possession for reference. It alone has power to give a title which will stand against all comers. It alone can apportion head rents; to it alone must incumbrancers come in the first instance to have their securities realized; and if a sale to tenants is now effected by the Land Commission, having been obliged to purchase the property in the Landed Estates Court, two distinct sets of law costs are incurred, two distinct sets of officials are called into action, when the matter might far more easily and economically have been arranged without the intervention of a second tribunal. Then, again, I may also mention that the Land Commission cannot buy direct from the landlord unless all the incumbrancers are parties to the conveyance, and even then difficulties may arise as to the apportionment of the purchase money among the mortgagees; whereas the Landed Estates Court does not require the consent of the incumbrancers, but sells to the highest bidder, holding the purchase money; then calls on the incumbrancers to substantiate their claims to it. I cannot understand why this Court is passed over; why you are not making use of it. It is doing absolutely nothing at this moment. It has a most excellent Judge—one of the most efficient in Ireland—at the head of it, and it has a staff of most able officials. The duty of carrying out the Purchase Clauses could be satisfactorily performed by this Court, and at very little expense; and I do not understand why it should be intrusted to a Court which is most unfitted for it, and which has few of the powers absolutely indispensable for its proper discharge. In a Bill before the other House it is proposed to give these powers to a solicitor which are now exercised by a Judge of high standing in Ireland, and which are really very dangerous powers for the granting of titles to land, unless the matter is well gone into and sifted by a person in whom the greatest confidence can be placed, and likely to be productive of very serious difficulties. Why should you bring a third party into the business? The Land Commission Court has not the power; but the

Landed Estates Court has. The lower Commission Court is already overburdened with work, and the other day a Supplementary Estimate was required to meet its expenses. The cost might be enormously reduced if only the work were transferred from a tribunal which has proved its incapacity to a tribunal which has every chance of carrying it out with success. Speaking of expenses, I should like to ask whether there is any chance of the expenses of the Land Court being reduced? It is most undesirable to have a number of Sub-Commissioners holding office at the discretion of the Party in power. That produces an injurious effect upon the action of the tribunal; and I think it is a matter of importance that the Sub-Commissioners should have the same status as the Judges of the land. They have most important duties imposed upon them, and there is no appeal from them except to the Chief Commissioners. I heard rumours in Dublin yesterday of the sort of Bill we are likely to have. I have been told that the Bill will propose to exact a local guarantee, and I believe from Boards of Guardians or from the Local Government Board. The defects which the Land Commission has for carrying out sales will be increased if the local guarantee is admitted, because you will be merely substituting a Board of Purchasers for the present tribunals. The faults of the Land Commissioners are that they are acting solely for the tenant, and that through defects of construction they are not able to do what they ought to bring about—sales. The Boards of Guardians are composed of the tenant farmers, and the Local Boards are similarly composed. They will be the purchasers. I should like to ask the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) whether he would like to have the number of years' purchase of his property assessed by the persons who are going to buy it? A local guarantee is asked for; that is exactly what the Bill will do; but it will turn out even much worse than before. I would prefer the Land Commission to carry out the sales rather than that the number of years' purchase should be fixed by the very men who are going to buy my estate. I sincerely hope something will be done for the unfortunate Irish landlord, who has been so pathetically alluded to by my noble Friend on the Cross Benches; and as a means to that end I hope the Purchase Clauses in the Bill will be dealt with in a truly liberal manner. The acknowledged blots ought to be swept away, and the recommendations of the Committee of last year as to the advances to tenants and as to the length of time for the repayment carried out. I believe that you can do little permanent good whatever scheme you adopt, whether it is my noble Friend's scheme or any other. You will do little permanent good to the Irish landlords unless you make the Purchase Clauses workable, and so remove the existing dead-lock. Looking deeper into the Irish question, I do not think we shall see a true solution of the Irish difficulty unless you take some means to largely increase the number of occupying owners in Ireland.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, it appeared to him that the suggestion of his noble Friend on the Cross Bench (Lord Castletown), as far as he understood it, did not involve the consequences which were anticipated by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley). The noble Earl objected to an appeal being made to the British taxpayer to assist the landowners of Ireland; but, as he understood his noble Friend, he did not desire that any appeal should be made to the British taxpayer. All that his noble Friend suggested was that facilities should be given by the Government for money to be obtained to carry out the various schemes which he had laid before the House. That appeared to him to be a very different thing, and not to be open to the objections that had been urged by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India. As was generally done in these debates, the noble Earl had again alluded to the fact that rents had been reduced in England also. They all knew that perfectly well. But, surely, everyone in that House, and outside it, must recognize the complete difference between the reductions which had taken place in England and those which had taken place in Ireland. A great many of their Lordships, who owned property in Ireland, possessed property in England also; but though they were most anxious that assistance should be given to the impoverished landlords in Ireland, and thought that, in justice, they were entitled to have that assistance given to them from the State, yet they would never dream of asking for anything of the kind in reference to England. The cases were totally different. The reductions in England had been made voluntarily, and were due to natural causes, and the necessities arising therefrom. Then, a landowner in this country might take the land into his own hands and farm it if he liked. In fact, he could do what he liked with regard to his own land. Further, they all knew perfectly well that in many cases it was very difficult to let land—things had been so bad. In Ireland, on the contrary, they found that rents were reduced, although people were competing for it. The noble Earl also appeared to think that, in the case of owners who had received an indefeasible title from the Landed Estates Court, no hardship was involved in their having had their rents reduced. He said that they merely bought the estates, and did not buy them subject to any particular rent. That, of course, was true. They bought them with perfect right to obtain any rent they could get; but the Government introduced and passed an Act which limited their right to obtain what they could. In the cases of England and Ireland, therefore, the reduction of rents which had taken place were so dissimilar that it was quite useless to introduce any parallel. He thought that the landowning class in Ireland deserved great sympathy. They deserved more than that. They deserved, at least, justice. They had their incomes largely reduced by the action of the State. But that was not all. The action of the State unsettled the whole basis of society in the country. It disturbed men's minds; and the only way in which anything like satisfaction could be made would be for the State to show that although it thought fit to interfere and to determine the value of the commodity, yet, if that caused hardship, injustice, and loss it would interfere again to see the loss made good. The question was a larger one than that involved in the position of the landlords themselves. Nothing could be worse to a country than the existence of an impoverished landowning class. They could do no earthly good. They could not manage their property in a way conducive to the advantage or the welfare of the country; and he maintained that it was the duty of the Government in this case to do anything they possibly could in order to ameliorate the condition of the landowners in Ireland, who had been reduced to their present lamentable condition by the action of the State.

LORD CASTLETOWN, in asking leave to withdraw the Motion, stated that he had proposed to make no demand whatever upon the taxpayer. He did not regard the explanation of the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) as satisfactory. He ventured to hope that the Government would reconsider the question in no hostile spirit. He was compelled to say that he should reserve to himself a perfect right to raise this question again, and fight the fight to the bitter end.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— RELIEF OF BERBER.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to the correctness of Reuter's telegram which appeared in yesterday's Observer and in this morning's newspapers, which says, dated—

"Cairo, April 26, 8 p.m.—The reply of the British Government to the proposal to send an expedition to Berber has been received. It says that such an expedition is impossible at present, and could not, in fact, start for four months hence;"

and, if correct, whether there is any objection to stating upon what grounds such an expedition is deemed impossible?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it may be satisfactory to your Lordships to know that the Papers which have been laid upon the Table of the House this evening upon this subject, and which will be in your Lordships' hands early next week, contain the instructions which Her Majesty's Government have, upon their own responsibility, thought it right to send.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

DUBLIN, WICKLOW, AND WEXFORD RAILWAY BILL.

INSTRUCTION TO THE COMMITTEE.

MR. MAYNE rose to move an Instruction to the Select Committee to which this Bill had been referred.

MR. FINDLATER rose to a point of Order. He wished to know whether it was competent for the hon. Member, being a member of the Corporation of Dublin, who had petitioned against the Bill, and whose locus standi had been established, to move an Instruction to the Committee to protect the rights and interests of the Corporation of Dublin? He also wished to know whether it was competent for the hon. Member to move that a power should be conferred upon a Committee which they already possessed?

MR. SPEAKER: As I understand the question of Order put to me by the hon. Member, it divides itself into two parts—namely, whether the hon. Member for Tipperary, being a member of the Corporation of Dublin, is entitled to take the step he has now taken in regard to this Bill. Upon that point my opinion is clear—namely, that the fact of his being a member of the Corporation of Dublin does not prevent him from taking the action he is now taking. As to the Instruction to the Committee being in the nature of the reference of a point they have already power to deal with, I draw a distinction between a Committee on a Private Bill and Committees of this House. The Instruction to the Select Committee now about to be moved by the hon. Member is a mandatory and compulsory Instruction, and differs from an ordinary Instruction to Committees of the House, which is only permissive. Therefore, in regard to those two points, I am of opinion that the hon. Member for Tipperary is perfectly in Order.

MR. MAYNE moved—

The hon. Member said, the Bill in question contained provisions which were both extraordinary and novel. If the railway were constructed as proposed in the present Bill, it would run for nearly one-half of its entire length through or over public thoroughfares in the City of Dublin, and would involve, even by the admission of the promoters themselves, a serious disfigurement of this part of the City. He thought the House would agree with him, under the circumstances, that something more than the ordinary reference to a Committee was necessary; and he therefore begged to move that the Motion standing in his name on the Paper be adopted.

MR. R. POWER seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee to inquire and report to the House whether the proposed Railway will injuriously affect one of the few open spaces in the City of Dublin, viz.: the open space known as Beresford Place, situate on the north and west sides of the Custom House; and needlessly disfigure the said City; and that they have power to call Witnesses and receive evidence upon the subject.”
—(Mr. Mayne.)

MR. M. BROOKS said, it so happened that the proposed railway would run adjacent to, and would seriously affect, property of great value belonging to a Company of which he had the honour to be Chairman; and as he was also interested in the Corporation, no matter upon which side he voted—whether with the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne), or the promoters of the Bill—he was open to the imputation of being actuated by motives of personal consideration. He thought, however, that he ought to do his duty without fear or affection, and he ought to follow what he believed to be the general interests of the citizens of Dublin in the matter. Without any desire to be offensive to his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary, he was bound to say that he thought the Motion was one of a most insidious character, and that if it were carried it would have the effect of killing the Bill. It would, practically, kill the Bill, because there would not be sufficient time to construct any alternative line. There were no limits of deviation which would enable the Company to construct the line. There could be no doubt as to the desirability of constructing this railway. He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General present in his place, because the right hon. Gentleman had, both in the House and elsewhere, pointed out the necessity for connecting the railways which now arrived and terminated in Dublin, but which were now without any central station, such as this Bill made provision for. And there could be no doubt that this railway, if constructed, would, more or less, disfigure the City. He was not aware that any railway was ever constructed in a large town which was not, more or less, a disfigurement. But he was bound to say that the disfigurement, of which the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne) complained, would be a much smaller evil, and only a minor matter of importance, compared with the success of a Motion which would prevent the construction of this railway at all. He should, therefore, feel bound to vote against the proposal of the hon. Member, repeating, that if the Committee should employ its time in doing that which the hon. Member desired, and which they had already full power to do if they were satisfied of its necessity, they would effectually kill the Bill. Under these circumstances, he should vote against the proposal of the hon. Member.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that he was not open to the imputation of being personally interested in this railway in any way whatever; and it was simply upon the ground of public convenience that he should vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Tipperary. He quite agreed that the construction of the railway through the proposed route to Beresford Place would be, to a certain extent, a disfigurement of the City, and that it would block up one of the finest views from Carlisle Bridge; but the communication between Westland Row and Amiens Street was of the utmost importance, so far as the convenience of the mails was concerned. At the present moment great and vexatious delay was occasioned, and there was a considerable amount of obstruction in the thoroughfares, in consequence of the present mode of proceeding. He, therefore, could not conceive how anyone who had no idea of the importance of securing the rapid transit of the mails should oppose this Bill in the manner in which the hon. Member for Tipperary proposed to do. The hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Mr. Brooks) said the opposition to the Bill would kill it in its present stage, because it was impossible to deviate the line as laid down in the deposited plans. He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General present. He was quite satisfied, from the attention the right hon. Gentleman had given to the subject, that he would be able to give the House his views as to the importance of making this communication.

MR. FINDLATER said, he could conceive no other object the Motion could have than to prejudice the views of the Committee with regard to the Bill when it came before them. The hon. Member proposed that the House should do a most undesirable thing—namely, that it should instruct the Committee to take certain matters into consideration. He thought the House would require something more than the statement made by the hon. Member before they consented to accept his Motion. The hon. Member proposed—

He (Mr. Findlater) had been for 40 years a citizen of Dublin; and he thought any person who was acquainted with the piece of ground in question would say that it was anything but an open space of a beautiful nature. There was not a particle of grass upon it, nor a tree; and during the whole time he had passed in Dublin he had never, in his life, seen a child playing upon it. This open space was attached to the Custom House; it was surrounded by stone posts which were connected together by iron chains; the space was entirely gravelled; and it really formed a most unsightly object. He might say, further, that the action of the Corporation in the matter was not generally approved of by the citizens of Dublin. He had heard a great many expressions of opinion with regard to the question; and he trusted the House would not consent to grant a mandatory Instruction to the Committee, when it was open to them in their discretion to hear evidence with regard to the whole matter. In the words of the Petitioners' own prayer the locus standi of the Corporation of Dublin was established; and they prayed that in case the Bill was allowed to pass into law certain clauses and other provisions would be necessary for the protection of the Corporation and citizens of Dublin. It was, therefore, perfectly clear that it would be open to the Committee to hear evidence which the House itself could not hear. The House must rely wholly upon ex parte statements, and he thought that was an extremely objectionable thing. There could be doubt whatever that this was one of the most important lines which had been proposed for some time. Great interest was taken by Irish Members, of all classes and sections, in the carrying out of the object of the Bill—namely, the acceleration of the Irish mails; and it would be too bad, when they were on the point of reaching the goal, that their efforts were to be frustrated by a sentimental objection with regard to the beauty of the view from Carlisle Bridge. There was a railway bridge in the neighbourhood of the House of Commons; but no one could say that the bridge at Charing Cross disfigured the approaches of the House, or very much interfered with the view. He understood that it was impossible to carry the tunnel under the bed of the Liffey; and the Harbour and Dock Board, who had charge of the river, would not allow any bridge to be constructed eastward of the Custom House, so that nothing further could be done if this railway were not allowed to go on, and the connection between the Dublin and Wexford Railway and the Northern Railway for the acceleration of the mails would be frustrated altogether. Personally, he had no interest in the matter beyond that of a citizen of Dublin who was anxious to see this communication established. It was upon that ground that he opposed the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) must be very hard driven for an argument when he compared the case of Hungerford Bridge with the proposed railway, seeing that Hungerford Bridge was more than a quarter of a mile from the Houses of Parliament; whereas the structure proposed to be erected under this Bill was only 54 feet from the Custom House at Dublin. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that an open space was of no value unless it had grass upon it. Now, the City of Dublin had very few open spaces. Those spaces possessed great value, whether they had grass upon them or not; and, so far as the Custom House was concerned, it was one of the most beautiful buildings in Europe. If this mass of masonry were allowed to be built close beside it the building would be completely disfigured, and the beauty of it would be entirely lost. The hon. Member for Monaghan said he had been for 40 years a citizen of Dublin. With all respect to the position and experience of the hon. Member, he thought the Corporation of Dublin, who had passed, by a considerable majority, the vote which the hon. Member now objected to, were quite as good judges of the interests of the City of Dublin as the hon. Member. The hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Mr. Brooks) asserted that the passing of this Instruction would kill the Bill. Considering the early period of the Session, it could not be said that the inquiry which the passing of this Instruction would involve would kill the Bill. It must be a very bad Bill, indeed, if an inquiry of this kind would kill it in the month of April. He invited the House to notice that the only matter his hon. Friend desired the Committee to inquire into was, whether the proposed railway would not injuriously affect one of the few open spaces in the said City? Surely no harm could be done to any interest by an intelligent and rational inquiry; and he ventured to hope that the House would have regard to the opinion of the Corporation, and assent to the Motion of his hon. Friend without supporting the opposition of the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Brooks), whose interest in this particular case was not that of the Corporation of Dublin. He trusted the House would have regard to the opinion of the Governing Body of the City. Certainly, if the Corporation of an English town made such an appeal the House would have no hesitation in granting all that was asked for.

MR. P. MARTIN desired to make a remark in reference to the statement just made by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). It must not be assumed that the members of the Corporation of Dublin were unanimously of opinion that the Bill should be rejected. Indeed, the Resolution in favour of petitioning against the Bill was not even passed by a considerable majority of the Corporation of Dublin. On the contrary, the Petition against it was adopted by the Corporation, after considerable discussion in a small House of 30, by a majority of only two. It would, therefore, be seen that a divided opinion existed with regard to the measure itself even among the Corporation of Dublin. There was another matter which the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) had correctly put before the House. The House was now called on, without having the advantage of the evidence of the promoters, to adopt a Resolution of a most exceptional and unusual character, which would abrogate the discretion given to the Committee, and prejudice one of the matters for their decision. It must be borne in mind that the object of this Bill was one of great importance to the entire of Ireland. It had been promoted not only by influential merchants and citizens resident in Dublin, but also at the instance of the Cities of Cork and Belfast, which desired to have a line which should connect all the different railways in Dublin, and enable a passenger to go on from London without change of carriage when he arrived at Kingstown. If this Bill should be passed, a passenger would be transferred direct to Cork or Belfast; but if a mandatory Instruction was to be given to the Committee upon an unusual matter of this kind, it would simply amount to a refusal to allow the Committee to enter into the consideration of the real question. He respectfully submitted to the House whether it was desirable to make a change in the Bill in this summary manner when they had the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Mr. Brooks), and the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) both of them anxious that the Bill should go before a Committee like any other ordinary Bill to be inquired into upon its merits? If there were any defects in the engineering details of the measure, or anything which would destroy this open space, all the circumstances could be fully inquired into, and a decision of the Committee obtained upon every point. He, therefore, did not see why the House should now consent to prejudice the decision of the Committee by doing that which would practically amount to a reversal of the second reading of the Bill.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was disposed to controvert the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin). The hon. and learned Member said that if the Motion of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne) were carried the result would be to kill the Bill. He did not think it would do anything of the sort; but he understood the Motion simply to ask the Committee to direct their attention to a particular branch of the subject. It did no more than that. The hon. and learned Gentleman also said that there was only a majority of two in the Town Council of Dublin who were in favour of this proposition. He (Mr. Biggar) was told by his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary that that majority of two was only on a minor side issue; and that when the question whether or not a Petition should be presented to give protection against injury to this open space was put, a majority in favour of the Petition was nearly three-fourths against one-fourth. So that a large majority were in favour of the present Motion, and they might be fairly assumed to represent the opinions of the citizens of Dublin. At the same time, he must say for himself that if he had had the slightest idea that this Motion would be likely to injure the possibility of the Bill being passed into law he would be very sorry to vote for it. He thought it a most desirable Bill; but that it should be carried out in the best way. It was most desirable that there should be a connection between all the railways in Dublin established for the purpose of facilitating the conveyance of the mails, not, perhaps, after all, that it would be of so much benefit to Dublin itself as it would be to other parts of Ireland. No one would deny that it would be of the utmost benefit to other parts of Ireland to facilitate the transit of the mails; and he would, therefore, not be disposed to throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of the Bill, although, at the same time, he thought the question raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary was a very reasonable one. He had no doubt that Beresford Place was very beautiful; and if any means could be adopted for preventing the disfigurement of the Custom House on that open space it should be adopted. One special reason in favour of the Bill was that it would have a tendency to kill a rival scheme. He believed that most of his hon. Friends who supported this Instruction to the Committee would not be prepared to vote for it if they thought it was likely to interfere with the success of the Bill; but, on the whole, considering all the circumstances of the case, he thought the House would not be doing wrong to give this Instruction to the Committee.

MR. GIBSON wished to say a word before the Motion was put. He thought the proposal had been temperately and reasonably discussed. No doubt there was some difference of opinion in reference to the matter, and all questions where there was a difference of opinion had to be decided on the balance. As far as he could find out, the general public opinion in Ireland against that of the Corporation of Dublin was a large and substantial one. The feeling in support of the Motion was not certainly very large even in the Corporation; and unquestionably the great preponderance of opinion, not only in Dublin, but in Ireland generally, was in favour of the Bill. It was said that if the Motion of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne) were carried it would have the effect of killing the Bill. He was sure that was not the desire of the hon. Member, nor did he think it was a desire of any Member for Ireland who had considered the question. He therefore thought, under all the circumstances of the case, that it would be wiser, and, on the whole, more calculated to work out a good result for all the Irish interests, not to pass the Motion of the hon. Member.

Mr. Biggar

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—CASE OF MR. ROBERT BARKLIE.

MR. EWART asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Robert Barklie, having been suspended for some irregularities in 1866, had his case subsequently investigated by the National Board of Education, through their head district Inspectors; and, whether, as a result of that investigation, and the consideration of further evidence, the National Board came to the conclusion that Mr. Barklie should be recognized as a teacher of the York Street National School, Belfast, and that his salary should be paid from date of his taking charge thereof?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that the facts are as stated in the Question.

MR. BIGGAR asked whether the following quotations from the Report of the District National School Inspector did not apply to Mr. Barklie, about whom the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Ewart) asked this Question:—

"Not only have the candidates copied, but in many cases they have been aided and abetted by the teachers, who sent to the examination-room answers to the questions on the paper to be copied by the pupils, and from one to the other;"

and, also, whether the same Inspector did not characterize this as an "extensive and organized system of fraud;" and, is so, whether the gentleman was still considered fitted for a position of trust under the National Board?

MR. TREVELYAN: I merely said that the facts were as stated. I gave no opinion on the matter; and if the hon. Member gives Notice of his Question I will answer it in two or three days.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND)—WATER SUPPLY OF SWINEFORD UNION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the late sanitary authority of the Swineford Union, county Mayo, refused to provide a proper supply of water for about ten families in the townland of Urlaur, in said union, although requested to do so by memorial signed by the most influential persons in the dispensary district of Kilkelly; whether he is aware that the sanitary officer's report stated that—

"Water was inconvenient, some half dozen families requiring to go about eleven hundred yards for water;"

whether the memorialists wished to have the dispensary district the "contributory" place, and whether a few ratepayers from Urlaur opposed it on the ground that the expense should not be placed solely upon the electoral division of Urlaur; whether the Local Government Board, when requested to investigate the matter—and, whether the Local Government Board are now prepared, upon ascertaining the veracity of these statements, to give a provisional order to the new sanitary board to provide a proper supply of water at said place?

"Declined to interfere with the discretion of the sanitary board;"

MR. TREVELYAN: The Local Government Board inform me that a Memorial was received from certain persons in the townland named, praying that a pump might be constructed for the purpose of giving them a water supply, and that a counter Memorial was received representing that no necessity existed for such a proceeding. The Medical Officer of Health represented that the water available was pure, but inconvenient for some of the inhabitants. The Board of Guardians and Dispensary Committee both consider it unnecessary to incur expense in the matter; and the Local Government Board have not thought it necessary to interfere with the discretion of the Sanitary Authority.

POST OFFICE—CIVIL SERVICE PRAYER UNION.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Is it the fact that Mr. Blackwood, Secretary of the Post Office, has established an organization called the "Civil Service Prayer Union;" that Catholic officials who could not conscientiously join the Union, nor assist at its prayers or bible-reading, have been pressed to do so by their chiefs; whether he is aware that one of the objects of the Union, as declared by a printed document circulated through the Civil Service, is—that canvassing for membership is done during official hours, and that those who refuse to join are regarded as "unconverted;" that at Liverpool the meetings are held on Government premises, viz. a room in the Custom House; and, whether he will prevent these proceedings being carried on during official hours, and by the official superiors of the person who is asked to join?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to the three Questions of the hon. Member, I have to inform the House that I have received from Mr. Blackwood the following statement:—That he did not establish the organization to which the first Question refers, which has been in existence for many years, but that he is at present its President; that he has never pressed any Roman Catholic official to join it, and that he thinks such pressure most improbable; that canvassing in the sense of such pressure is not, so far as he knows, resorted to, though it is probable that conversation may take place on that subject as on any other of common interest; that, so far as he is concerned, those who do not join the Association are not therefore considered unconverted; that at Liverpool a quarterly meeting is held, not during the Office hours, nor in the Custom House Office, but in the dining room over the Office, which is used for other meetings, such as the Widows' and Orphans' Fund, and other unofficial business. I see no reason why the Treasury should interfere in the matter. No complaint on the subject has reached me, and the first I heard of the Union was from the hon. Member's Question.

MR. O'BRIEN: What does the right hon. Gentleman think a higher official of the Department means by asking for intercession for the unconverted members of that Department?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): It is not my duty to explain language of that kind. I have heard of persons of many religions speak of other persons as "unconverted."

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION— GRANTS OF PROBATE AND ADMINISTRATION.

MR. SEXTON (for MR. HEALY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that, since the passing of the Land Act of 1881, there has been a remarkable increase in the grants of probate and administration all over Ireland; whether, in view of the refusal of the Land Commissioners and the growing reluctance of landlords to recognise as tenants persons who have not taken out administration, the Government will remove the restrictions which prevent section 33 of "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881," being more generally availed of, so that the sons and widows of deceased tenants may cheaply obtain administration direct from the local Inland Revenue officers, without having to visit the city where the supervisor resides; and, will the Government, in view of the beneficent effect of section 33, and the great saving of legal expenses which poor persons may effect by its provisions where the personal estate is under £300, take steps to render them more widely known to persons of the farming class, whom the expense of a legal process now frequently hinders from taking out administration, and thus prevents the recognition of their status as tenants?

Mr. COURTNEY: There has been since 1882 a considerable increase in the number of grants of probate and administration, apparently due to the working of the Land Act. I am informed that the practice of the Land Commission has always been to allow any person beneficially interested in a tenancy to avail himself of the benefit of the Land Act as applicant, though no administration had been taken out, but to suspend the issuing of the order until the grant is produced. The only exception to this rule is where it is believed there is a desire to evade, from some improper motive, the taking out of a grant. It is the desire of the Inland Revenue Department to give every facility for the working of the 33rd section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881. Inland Revenue officers not necessarily supervisors have been appointed to work it in every town where any necessity appeared. The Chairman of the Board will be glad to receive any suggestions which may be made to him by the hon. Member, or any other person, as to any mode of making more widely known to persons of the farming class the facilities that now exist for the taking of grants.

Mr. Seaton

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
ACT, 1882 (PROCLAMATIONS)—MEETING AT KNOCKMAGREE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the Knockmagree (county Cork) meeting, to be held on April 20, was suppressed; whether it is a fact that nobody living in Knockmagree was served with personal notice of the suppression, that the proclamations were only posted through the district upon the eve of the day fixed for the meeting, and that, in consequence, thousands of persons, who received no notice of the intention of the Government, came into the village and were hustled about by the police; why was not the proclamation published earlier; and, whether care will be taken in future to notify the intention of the Government at the earliest possible moment, so as to avoid the risk of bringing large bodies of people, without warning, into dangerous proximity, and possible collision, with the armed forces of the Law?

MR. TREVELYAN: The meeting was suppressed because it was feared that if held it would result in danger to persons who occupy farms from which the former tenants were evicted for non-payment of rent. Copies of the Proclamation were not served upon any persons residing at Knockmagree, because it was not known that any such persons were promoters of the meeting. The Proclamation was posted at Kanturk on the previous day, which was market day, and copies were served on the promoters, who, nevertheless, attended at the place of meeting and desired to address the people. It is not the case that thousands of persons assembled. I am informed that no more than about the number of persons usually in the village on a Sunday were present (about 600), and it is not the case that any persons were hustled about by the police. The people were not in any way interfered with by the police. In the case of prohibited meetings, the authorities will endeavour, as far as possible, to give such notice as will prevent people from coming together. So far as the reports before me show, this object appears to have been secured in this case.

MR. O'BRIEN: Can the right hon. Gentleman state why, after attention has been over and over again called to the matter, he has not given the public an earlier notice of the suppression of a meeting? To my own knowledge this meeting was called a month previously.

MR. TREVELYAN: I think the Proclamation ought to be published as soon as possible; but if it were published as soon as the meeting was announced, there is danger that some persons may advertise a great number of meetings for the purpose of having them proclaimed. ["Oh!"] That might be done, and I fear that in certain cases it would be done.

MR. O'BRIEN: Then the action of the Government is a trap to prevent the promoters of meetings—["Order!"]

DOMINION OF CANADA—IRISH EMIGRANTS AT TORONTO.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that a number of persons who emigrated to Canada, assisted by the boards of guardians or by Mr. Tuke's Committee, are at present living on charity in Toronto, and are supplied chiefly by money collected for them every Sunday at the doors of the Catholic Churches in that city; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will take any steps to relieve those people, and to assist them to return to their own Country?

MR. TREVELYAN: I believe it is the case that a number of Irish immigrants were in distress at Toronto in the month of February; but only a portion of them had been State-aided, and none of them, I believe, were sent out by Mr. Tuke's Committee. The Government have no information as to any of these persons having been supported by collections at church doors; and as the winter is now over, and spring work has commenced, there is every reason to believe that employment may now be obtained. I may state that the Government are now taking steps with the view of securing that arrangements may, if possible, be made that no one shall be sent out who has not previously been approved of by a representative of the Canadian authorities.

MR. LEAMY asked whether it was really true that the Government had no information whatever about these people—whether they had got employment or not? Would the Government try and ascertain what had become of them? He would repeat the Question on Thursday.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—PETTY SESSIONS CLERK FOR GRANGE, CO. SLIGO.

MR. LYNCH asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Charles Jones Henry has been appointed petty sessions clerk for the district of Grange, county Sligo; whether he is the same person who some time since reported to the Police that he had been assaulted at night on his way home from a fair, and robbed of £81 county cess which he had collected; whether his statement was discredited by the magistrate who investigated the case; whether the appointment of Mr. Henry as petty sessions clerk has been made in the absence of two of the justices who usually attend the Grange Petty Sessions Court; and, whether the appointment will be confirmed?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Perhaps the right hon. Gentlemen will answer my Question at the same time, Whether it is a fact that the Government were recommended to offer a reward for the apprehension of the prisoner who last year attacked and injured Mr. Charles Jones Henry in the county of Sligo; whether this recommendation was made by magistrates who had the best means of ascertaining the circumstances relative to the said assault; whether the character of Mr. Charles Jones Henry is such as to fully qualify him for the position of petty sessions clerk, or of any other position in which integrity and good conduct are necessary qualifications; and, whether the Constabulary and the local authorities are satisfied with his appointment?

MR. TREVELYAN: The facts are as stated in the first, second, and fourth paragraphs of the Question of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Lynch). The circumstances as to the reported outrage on Mr. Henry were never satisfactorily cleared up, and the case is one as to which there was some variance of opinion amongst those who were engaged in investigating it. The election of Mr. Henry to the office of Petty Sessions Clerk has not yet been submitted to the Lord Lieutenant for confirmation, and I am unable to anticipate His Excellency's decision. A private reward for information in this case was offered, but without result; and it was not considered that any advantage would be obtained by the offer of a public reward, as was recommended by the magistrates of the district. As the hon. and gallant Member's (Colonel King - Harman's) Question only appeared on the Paper today, I have had no opportunity of ascertaining what is the feeling of the Constabulary or "local authorities" as to the appointment; nor do I know that it would be their duty to express an opinion on the subject unless confidentially for the information of the Government.

COLONEL KING - HARMAN complained that his Question on this subject had been altered by the Clerk at the Table.

MR. SEXTON asked whether it was not a fact that of the four Justices on the Bench two were for Mr. Henry and two for another; and that the way in which Mr. Henry got elected was by his supporters going to the Bench and voting for him behind the backs of the two others?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would not express any opinion on the matter, as it was now before the Lord Lieutenant.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—KILMEEN ELECTORAL DIVISION, KANTURK UNION.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the successful National candidate for the Kilmeen Division of the Kanturk Union, at the recent Poor Law election, has received a letter from Mrs. Smith, of Blossomfort, stating that she was obliged to break her promise to vote for him in consequence of receiving two letters from her landlord, Mr. Richard Longfield, Justice of the Peace and Deputy Lieutenant, directing her to vote for his opponent, a rent-warner on a neighbouring estate, who himself presented to her the second letter from Mr. Longfield; whether he is aware that a Mr. Horgan, who remained neutral in the same contest, notwithstanding a letter from Mr. Longfield directing him to support his candidate, was afterwards requested by Mr. Longfield to return his letter, and, on his replying that he had mislaid it, was informed that his services as game-keeper in Mr. Longfield's service were dispensed with until the letter should be returned; whether there is any legal remedy for intimidation of this description; and, whether Mr. Longfield's conduct will be brought to the attention of the Lord Chancellor?

MR. TREVELYAN: This Question was referred on Saturday to Dublin. It is presumed that local inquiry in the county of Cork was necessary to enable the Local Government Board to report upon it, as their Report has not yet been received.

WEST INDIES (BARBADOES)—POLICE ESPIONAGE.

MR. SMALL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the authorities at the Colonial Office are aware that upon the landing in Barbadoes of Mr. James Murphy, in the month of February last, his goods and luggage were subjected to a thorough search, when nothing whatever of a suspicious character was found; and that, nevertheless, Mr. Murphy has been constantly watched by police and detectives, who follow him everywhere, seat themselves in his place of business, and take notes of all the sales he makes; that, a few days after his arrival, a large and riotous crowd, attracted by the presence of police, assembled at Mr. Murphy's residence, the members of which crowd made use of violent language to him in the presence of several policemen, who did not attempt to control them; whether the authorities here will direct the officials at Barbadoes to discontinue to watch him, and to afford Mr. Murphy protection against any violence with which he may be threatened?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir; it is a fact that Mr. Murphy's boxes were examined at Barbadoes, and that nothing suspicious was found. The Government of Barbadoes have, for good reasons, caused Mr. Murphy's movements to be watched. We have not heard of such noisy or threatening acts as those referred to in the Question; and there is no doubt that protection, if necessary, will be given to Mr. Murphy.

MR. SMALL: Would the hon. Gentleman state "the very good reasons?"

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No, Sir.

Mr. Trevelyan

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — THE DERRY MAGISTRATES (MESSRS.
 ARCHDALE, DOWLING, AND ROCHE).

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the issue of the correspondence between the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and certain magistrates of Derry; when the correspondence will be laid upon the Table; and, what decision has been arrived at by the Lord Chancellor in the other cases considered by him, of complaints against Irish magistrates?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Lord Chancellor informs me that his decision with regard to the Derry magistrates will, in all probability, be made known during the present week. The hon. Member has not asked me whether the Correspondence is to be laid on the Table. It will be laid as soon as it is closed. In the case of Mr. Archdale, his Lordship, after receiving letters of explanation, has determined that it is not one in which he ought to remove him from the Commission of the Peace; but he has reprimanded Mr. Archdale, pointing out to him that he must be more cautious in future. The Correspondence in the other cases — namely, those of Mr. Thomas Dowling and Mr. Thomas Roche — has not yet closed.

MR. O'BRIEN asked what is being done in the case of Mr. M'Clintock, magistrate and Orange County Grand Master, who signed a Proclamation calling a counter demonstration to attack the Nationalists on St. Patrick's Day?

MR. TREVELYAN: I was under the impression that Mr. M'Clintock's case was included in the Derry case. I did not think that there was any supplementary motion.

MR. O'BRIEN: The occasion was quite different.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — DIS-QUALIFICATION OF DISPENSARY
 MEDICAL OFFICERS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many workhouse or dispensary medical officers in Ireland have been appointed to act in the Commission of the Peace since the rule was made excluding such officers from the Commission; how many of the medical officers so appointed are Protestants; whether, with reference to the case of Dr. Flannery, of Tubbercurry, county Sligo, it is the fact that Mr. Reynolds, of Tubbercurry, was appointed to the Commission of the Peace, although, as manager of the bank acting as treasurer to the local union, he was disqualified from acting as an ex-officio guardian; and, whether, having regard to the provision which prevents a Poor Law medical officer from acting as an ex-officio guardian, and the fact that many such officers actually hold the Commission of the Peace, the rule excluding them from the Commission will now be reconsidered?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that there are 10 gentlemen who have been appointed to the Commission of the Peace since 1872, the time when the rule in question was made, who are now dispensary doctors; but with regard to eight of them, the records of the Hanaper Office do not show whether or not they were dispensary doctors when appointed to the Commission of the Peace. Two of them were appointed by the late Lord Chancellor, knowing that they were dispensary doctors, but before the rule had been brought to his knowledge. The official records do not show the religious profession of any of these gentlemen. Previous to the case of Dr. Flannery of Tubbercurry, the present Lord Chancellor, acting on the rule of 1872, declined to appoint several gentlemen who were dispensary doctors, and he believes that the rule is a wise one, and ought to be maintained. With regard to Mr. Reynolds, named in the Question, there is no record in the Lord Chancellor's Office to show whether in 1878, when he was appointed to the Commission of the Peace, he was manager of a Bank acting as Treasurer of a local Union; but I am informed that such fact, even if it was so, was no disqualification to his being appointed a magistrate.

 ESTIMATES.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether information has been received at the Colonial Office that the Legislative Council of Jamaica, consisting, at present, of official members only, have passed the Estimates and a Vote of Credit for the second half-year of the current financial year, notwithstanding the express instructions of Lord Derby's second Despatch of the 1st December 1883, paragraph 6, directing the Governor "To reserve the Estimates for the remainder of the year now current for the consideration of the full Council;"

if so, will he explain why and by what authority this deviation from Lord Derby's instructions has taken place?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: At the time when the Secretary of State directed the Governor to reserve the Estimates for the consideration of the new Council, it was hoped and believed that the Order in Council constituting the new form of representation would have been passed in time for the elections to be held under it early enough to have a Council duly constituted before more than half of the financial year had elapsed. But, owing to the unavoidable delays caused by inquiries held by Commissioners appointed on the spot, and by the consideration of their Report at home, the Order in Council, though now settled, has not yet been sent out to the Colony. The registration and elections must take some time, so that it would virtually be impossible to summon the new Council before June or July next. By that time more than two-thirds of the financial year, ending September 30, will have expired, and, therefore, more than two-thirds of the expenditure incurred. It was therefore decided, after much consideration, that it would be both more straightforward, more satisfactory, and more fair to the new Members themselves to substitute for a second Vote of Credit a Vote passing the Estimates as they stood for the previous year, without any increase and without any alteration beyond absolutely inevitable modifications in details.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—THE 60TH RIFLES AT SUAKIN.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the following paragraph in a telegram sent by the Cairo correspondent of The Standard, and published in the issue of April 28th—

"I have heard indirectly that the state of the 60th Rifles at Suakin calls for serious consideration. Insufficient camping ground and want of water are reducing that gallant regiment to a condition anything but creditable to the authorities, or accordant to the deserts of the men:"

and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the truth of such statement?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The only information which we have on this subject is contained in a telegram received from the General Officer commanding in Egypt, dated the 27th of this month, in which he recommends the departure of the battalion from Suakin, on the ground of health and the absence of suitable shelter. I am in communication with the Admiralty on the subject. In reference to the statement contained in The Standard, as to the insufficient camping ground and want of water, although I have no recent information on the subject, the statement appears to be inconsistent with the Report which we have received as to the condition of the larger force under General Graham at Suakin, in which the camping-ground and the health of the troops are represented as being satisfactory in every respect.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked whether the Marines, who were to relieve the battalions at Suakin, would be landed under precisely the same conditions as they were now; or whether the Admiralty would make arrangements for their accommodation?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I believe the Admiralty will make arrangements for a floating barrack for the Marines. A portion, at all events, of the Marines will always be afloat, the number ashore being regulated according to the necessities of the case.

SIR JOHN HAY asked whether the water supply to the troops under General Graham was not distilled water from the ships; and whether those appliances did not still remain for the service of the troops?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There are still ships at Suakin, I believe; but the statement I made had special reference to the camping ground, which was found satisfactory.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, the question of the water supply to our troops was so important, especially considering that the thermometer was 117 degrees in the shade at Suakin now, that he hoped the noble Marquess would cause some inquiries to be made.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Certainly inquiry would be made, if it were at all probable that any measures could be taken before the departure of the troops; but, as I have stated, it is probable that the battalions now at Suakin will return in the transport which is taking the Marines.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Will there be any extra water supply for the Marines?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have already stated that the Marines, to a great extent, would be accommodated on board ship, where there would be no difficulty as to water supply.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: The noble Marquess must remember there are some Egyptian troops with English officers also at Suakin in camping ground, who will also require water.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is the date of the last despatch or message received from General Gordon; and, whether the Governor of Berber has telegraphed that it is impossible to send any more messages to Khartoum? The hon. Member also asked whether there was any truth in the report, contained in The Standard, that a considerable number of Bashi-Bazouks and soldiers under General Gordon had gone over to the enemy?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In answer to the Question on the Paper, I have to say that the last message received from General Gordon was dated the 9th of April. General Gordon's agent at Berber has telegraphed to Mr. Egerton that he cannot get messengers from Berber to Khartoum. With reference to the other Question, I have also received private Notice from my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that he was going to ask me a Question similar to that which the hon. Member has just asked me; but I think it would be better that I should answer it at once. The last telegram we received was dated the 27th of April, from Mr. Egerton to Lord Granville, to the effect that four brigades of Sanjaks or Shageeyah Bedouins from Khartoum and 500 soldiers had joined the rebels. On those actual words it might, no doubt, be thought that they were troops actually at Khartoum; but the words are susceptible of the other interpretation—namely, that they were troops at Berber; and if hon. Members will refer to The Daily News telegram they will see that the latter interpretation is the correct one. The Daily News telegram is to the effect that—

“Four Sanjaks of Scingkea have joined the rebels with 500 soldiers. The Sanjaks came from Khartoum.”

It is, therefore, quite clear that the telegram received by Lord Granville alludes to Sanjaks at Berber who had come from Khartoum.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Are we to understand that the telegrams in The Daily News are official?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No; but I quoted the one which appears this morning, because it contains information elucidating our short telegram, and also because I know the great and painful interest that telegrams on this subject excite among the friends of General Gordon.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Have the Government no telegrams of their own from Cairo on this subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have stated that Lord Granville received a telegram from Mr. Egerton, and I read it to the House.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Would it not be possible to instruct the authorities in Egypt to send a fuller telegram on this subject?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: May I ask whether there is any information from Berber with regard to the evacuation of that town; if it is true that the inhabitants have fled northwards; and, whether all telegraphic communication with General Gordon is not at an end?

MR. CHAPLIN: I should like to ask Her Majesty's Government one Question—Whether, in view of this recent information which it appears the Government have received, they are still of opinion that the position of General Gordon is one of security at Khartoum?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Eye, no actual information has been received of the withdrawal of the Governor from Berber. I have nothing to add to what fell from the Prime Minister on this point yesterday. With respect to telegraphic communication with Khartoum, no doubt the withdrawal of the garrison of Berber would cause Dongola to be the nearest place in that direction to which there would be telegraphic communication from Cairo; but I cannot at this moment positively state that that is so.

MR. GIBSON: The noble Lord says that the date of the last message received from General Gordon was the 9th of April. Would he tell the House what is the date of the last message the Government sent to General Gordon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have not all the telegrams here, and therefore I cannot state on the spur of the moment. I should prefer to answer the Question on Notice.

MR. CHAPLIN: I wish to press the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War for an answer to my Question—namely, whether, in view of recent information, the Government are still of opinion that General Gordon's position at Khartoum is one of security?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I did not know the hon. Member addressed the Question to me; but I think the House will not expect me to answer it without Notice.

MR. CHAPLIN: I beg to give Notice that I will ask the Question to-morrow.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I was glad to hear the reply of my noble Friend. I understand the Government have reason to believe that these telegrams relate to the desertion of troops from Berber, and not from Khartoum; and yet in the telegram I alluded to the words are, "leaving Khartoum helpless." I suppose I may understand my noble Friend to believe that the 500 soldiers are soldiers at Berber, and not at Khartoum?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes; that is my decided impression.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Might I ask another Question? Is the French Consul still at Khartoum; and do the Government know what number of English officers or English officials there were at Berber when the evacuation began?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I believe a French Acting Consul is still at Khartoum. With regard to how many officials there were at Berber, I do not think I could give accurate information without Notice.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Will the noble Lord telegraph to Cairo at once, and ask whether the construction put upon the desertion of these troops by the last Daily News telegram is a true version or not?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am not sure whether the Secretary of State has given instructions; but I shall have no objection to informing him that this Question has been asked by the noble Lord.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am inclined to hope that the noble Lord's interpretation of the telegram is a correct one. The matter is of vital interest; and I should like to ask the noble Lord whether he would take steps to telegraph immediately to Mr. Egerton to inquire if it is correct or not?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have already stated, in reply to the noble Lord opposite, that I will bring the matter before the Secretary of State at once.

VENEZUELA—COMMERCIAL NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the negotiations with Venezuela have yet resulted in the abandonment of the 30 per cent. differential duty imposed on British Colonial goods, in violation of the Treaty of 1825; if he is aware that the Trinidad newspapers have a rumour that Her Majesty's Government, in place of insisting on the fulfilment of the Treaty obligations, is now trying to buy their fulfilment by handing over to Venezuela the small British Island of Patos, and if he can give a contradiction to the rumour; and, if any redress has been got by the owners or imprisoned crew of the vessel sunk in the Maturin River?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: With regard to the differential duty, Her Majesty's Minister at Caracas has been instructed to submit to the Venezuelan Government certain proposals which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, offer a reasonable and satisfactory solution of the question, and they have every reason to hope that they will be accepted by the Government of Venezuela. With regard to the third paragraph of my hon. Friend's Question, I have nothing to add to the answer I gave him on the 6th of March. Her Majesty's Government are still awaiting for the Report of the Governor of Trinidad. I have seen the statement in the Trinidad papers to which the hon. Member refers. It is true that Her Majesty's Government informed the Venezuelan Government that, if the questions at issue between the two Governments are satisfactorily settled, their wishes in regard to the cession of the Island of Patos, which is a small and barren rock nearer to the Venezuelan coast than to Trinidad, will be favourably considered.

MR. MAC IVER: In consequence of the statement of the noble Lord, I shall move, at the earliest opportunity, a Resolution congratulating the Foreign Office upon the brilliant success which has attended their negotiations with the Government of Venezuela, and upon the marvellous progress of Free Trade principles throughout the world.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL PROPOSALS—PROPOSED RESTORATION OF THE GOLD COINAGE.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there had been any Correspondence between his Department or the Treasury and the Governor of the Bank of England on the subject of the proposed changes in the coinage?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): There has been a great deal of personal communication between myself and others, and the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England; but no official Correspondence. I do not think that it is usual to state to Parliament the purport of personal communications.

In reply to MR. STAVELEY HILL,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS) said, that a Treasury Minute would be laid on the Table containing information as to the estimated quantity of light gold in circulation. For this information we are in the main indebted to inquiries by bankers.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BILL [Lords].—[BILL 120.]

(Mr. Dodson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 22nd April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1 (Privy Council to prohibit landing of foreign animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease).

MR. DODSON said, he need not detain the Committee with any lengthened statement in moving the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name—namely, in page 1, line 14, after "Foreign Country," to leave out to "therein," in line 17, inclusive, and insert—

"Or any specified part thereof, that, having regard to the sanitary condition of the animals therein, or imported therefrom, to the Laws made by such Country for the regulation of the importation and exportation of animals, and for the prevention of the introduction or spreading of disease, and to the administration of such Laws, the circumstances."

As he had stated on Friday, when he gave Notice of the Amendment, the Government, after the decision arrived at on Tuesday last, had considered very carefully by what means they could proceed with the Bill, and they had come to the conclusion to propose this alteration. It would put the clause, not in the form in which they had wished to see it, but in a form which they thought would enable them fairly to administer the Act as between the different interests concerned, and in a form which they hoped would be agreed to by, at all events, many of those who had differed from them on Tuesday. Under this form, if the Committee would agree to it, the Government would consent to accept the responsibility of the clause. He would, therefore, now move the Amendment in the words of which he had given Notice of it, and which appeared to him to be clear and intelligible.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, to leave out the words "that the laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals, and to the prevention of the introduction or spreading of disease, and the general sanitary condition of animals therein," in order to insert the words "or any specified part thereof, that, having regard to the sanitary condition of the animals therein, or imported therefrom, to the Laws made by such Country for the regulation of the importation and exportation of animals, and for the prevention of the introduction or spreading of disease, and to the administration of such Laws, the circumstances."—(Mr. Dodson.)

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was heartily glad to find that the consideration which the right hon. Gentleman had given to this question had enabled him to devise means to proceed with the Bill, although, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, the clause as it would be passed would not be in precisely the form in which the Government desired to see it adopted. The right hon. Gentleman had expressed a hope that his Amendment would meet the wishes of hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, and hon. Members who sat behind him. He (Mr. Chaplin) could say for himself and many other hon. Gentlemen that, on the whole, the clause amended as proposed would fairly meet the views he and his Friends had all along contended for. What they had been contending for all along was a principle, and that principle consisted in this—that the presumption on the part of Her Majesty's Government in regard to foreign animals should be that they were dangerous—so far as the spreading of foot-and-mouth disease was concerned—unless the Government were satisfied they were safe. That presumption remained in the clause precisely as he had contended for it all along; and he was, therefore, glad to accept the clause as it was now proposed. They had never asked for more than this; and he believed the clause might be taken as generally satisfactory—as calculated to meet the demand which had been so generally made in this matter.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the great object was to arrive at such a practical result as would not interfere unnecessarily with the food supply of the country—as would not press unduly on the consumer, and yet would give reasonable security to the producer. He did not conceal his opinion that there was an unreasonable call for legislation on the subject. He should have preferred, in the first place, that there had been no Bill at all; and, in the next place, that the original words should have been retained. However, they were all governed by majorities in the House of Commons; and a majority, in this matter, had decided against the view which he entertained. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson), in the very brief remarks he had made, had stated that he thought the Amendment he proposed would enable the Government to administer the Act as between all parties interested, and also that it had been framed so as to meet the views of those who were opposed to him. Well, much depended on the exact reading of that last statement. Amongst those opposed to the Government on this question there had been two views. One was—to put it shortly—that the importation of animals from countries where there was any foot-and-mouth disease whatever should be put a stop to; and that would, practically, amount to stopping the importation from almost every country. He should be very sorry, indeed, to see Her Majesty's Government accept any such view as that. There was, then, the other expression of opinion, that it was possible, with care taken by the Government, to prevent the importation of disease; and, in fact, that if the measures adopted by the Privy Council during the past few months—some of which were very stringent—were generally put in force, immunity from disease would be secured. Hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the House had taken that view pretty generally; but he was prepared to admit that the Government were hardly to be expected to adopt it without being required to do so by a majority of the Committee. So far as he was concerned, he should be willing to consent to the change now proposed, on the understanding that although the presumption was not, as he thought it ought to be, in favour of admitting, rather than of excluding, the clause should not be taken as implying that there should be immediate prohibition of all the animals coming from the scheduled countries; but the Government should be able to feel that it would be competent for them to exercise their power in much the same way as they had been exercising it of late. He need not remind the Committee that the course of stopping the importation of live animals from France had been adopted some months ago for the protection of the agricultural interest; and he supposed the Government had now found a form of words which would enable them to continue that policy, if necessary. On that ground he did not oppose this Amendment, although he did not conceal the fact that it was not one to which he gave by any means a cordial support.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD wished to make a few observations upon the Amendment. The difference between the Bill as it stood and the Bill as it would stand with the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) seemed to him to be limited to this point—that the Amendment would give somewhat greater facilities for the exercise of power on the part of the Privy Council for the exclusion of live animals from “any specified part” of any foreign country. Although there was somewhat greater emphasis placed on the power of exclusion from a “specified part” of a foreign country, he was bound to admit that there was, substantially, no difference between the Amendment and the Bill as it came from the House of Lords. It must be known to hon. Members in every part of the House that there had not arisen during the present Session a single complaint of the administration of the existing law by the Privy Council, especially in reference to the putting in force of powers they possessed with regard to any particular country. If the Bill passed into law it would not give the Privy Council a single power which they did not already possess. With reference to the prohibition of the importation of live cattle from a foreign country on account of foot-and-mouth disease, such a prohibition had been exercised in the case of France; and in regard to a “specified part” of a foreign country, they had prohibited importation from the 27th of February to some time in March in the present year, on account of the disease from Portland in the United States. He felt the utmost confidence in the administration of the proposed new law by Lord Carlingford and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Dodson); but, whilst he said that, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that they needed no further legislation. The Bill was not a temporary one—it was to be permanent. In the Amendment they had travelled a long distance in the direction of giving an invitation to the authorities to prohibit the importation of animals required for the food of the people. The change which had been effected was this. In one week they had travelled from the obligation to prohibit, where a case was proved of the existence of the infection of foot-and-mouth disease, to the obligation to prohibit, unless a case for admission from a particular country was established. That was the journey the Committee had made in a week; and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) recognized the fact that that was the original form of the Bill of 1878—that it was the demand of the Duke of Richmond and the others who urged the Bill through Parliament. It was through the instrumentality of the Liberal Party that that provision was expunged from the Bill of 1878; and it was now sought by those who interpreted the present measure in the sense in which the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire interpreted it, to re-import that principle into legislation governing the Privy Council. It was advocated by those who supported the Bill in its present form that the Privy Council should prohibit whenever such a cock-and-bull story as that told by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire the other day was submitted to them—he referred to the statement of the hon. Gentleman that the foot-and-mouth disease had been discovered to have broken out in Kansas, United States. Hon. Gentlemen desired, in such cases as that, that the Privy Council should prohibit first and inquire afterwards. He was sorry not to see the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) in his place, for, no doubt, he and those Conservative Members who had professed the other day such anxiety for the urban population would have acted with him (Mr. Arthur Arnold) in strengthening the hands of the Government in opposing such prohibition. It was urged by those who supported the Lords' Amendment that slaughter at the port of landing afforded no security; and it was their undisguised object that there should, without the least possible delay, be an end put to that policy. He could not shut his eyes to the fact that the Lord President of the Council (Lord Carlingford) had urged them, by every means in their power, to object to the Amendment which had been introduced into the Bill by the House of Lords. The noble Lord had told them that the Amendment which was introduced in the House of Lords—and which had been accepted by the Government after an expression of the will of the House—would be mischievous to the consumer. These were words which those who had any regard for the interests of the consumer ought not to forget. He sincerely regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had been obliged to accept a policy of which he did not approve; but the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had done that need not coerce Liberal Members into that course. By opposing the proposed Amendment they would be maintaining the interests of the great body of the people of the country.

MR. WARTON said, he was not going to say a word to embitter this controversy, because the Government had acted very fairly by virtually accepting the judgment of the House. They had slightly altered the words of the Amendment, but had conceded the point which had been contended for all along. As to the construction of the Amendment, he wished to point out to some of his hon. Friends on the other side that it was essential that the present form should be adopted, for the reason that if they had struck out the word "not," and taken the alternative proposition, it would have been open to the construction that the Privy Council were bound to satisfy themselves of every one of three or four things before they acted. Now, however, under the proposed Amendment, they would be protected, and the Privy Council would not have to consider all these things with regard to foot-and-mouth disease. The Government might have had to satisfy themselves as to the position of the law, the condition of the animals, and the local regulations; and he was inclined to think, therefore, as a mere matter of construction, that the Amendment was an improvement. It was better for them to have a stringent law if they were to criticize the laws of foreign countries. They would be able to say to them—"We have a strict law ourselves, and you cannot, therefore, blame us if we insist on strict laws in you. It seemed to him—to descend to a very small point—that when Amendments were inserted the words should be made as much as possible, for the sake of uniformity with the rest of the Bill, to flow in the order in which they had done before. If hon. Members would refer to line 12, and the beginning and end of the Amendment, they would see what he meant.

MR. BROADHURST said, he thought the Bill had proceeded too far on its own dangerous and disastrous course, or too long without comment or notice from that (the Radical) part of the House. If they wanted to measure the importance of the concession now made by the Government they had only to witness the lamb-like reception it had met with from the opposite side of the House—from those hon. Members who had been loudest in their demands for the taxation of the food of the people. ["Oh, oh!" and cries of "No!"] Yes; he should maintain his assertion that this was a direct attempt—and not only an attempt, but, if the Amendment was to go on as it now stood, a successful attempt—to still further lessen the supply of food, which was at present too meagre for the great body of the people of the country. When the Bill was first introduced with its limitation of two years, he, for one, was not prepared to enter into the arena of debate on the question of cattle disease; but the landed interest with their horse-leech policy, which they enforced on this as on all occasions, were not satisfied with the measure as it was introduced; and when they got it in the House of Lords, where no interest but theirs was represented, they laid it out according to their own intentions and desires. The Liberal and Radical Members had committed the unpardonable mistake of ever allowing the measure to get into Committee in this House, because it was always in Committee that the landed interest made its most successful efforts to mould a Bill to suit its original purposes. He had said that this Bill was a direct attempt to tax the food of the people. If it was not, wherein lay the basis of the demand of the landed interest? Was it not their case that they wished to prevent the importation of live stock into the country. ["No!"] Then, if that was not so, why this Bill? But, of course, that was so, and that was the direct and ill-concealed object of the whole scheme now under debate. What was their object in wishing to limit the importation of fat live meat—was it to benefit the farmers? The farmers were making no outcries for the Bill. ["Oh!"] Well, in his own presence last week, in the City of London, a farmer made the declaration, which was reported in the London Press, that in his experience amongst his neighbours and fellow-agriculturists, neither in private gossip nor at their ordinary dinners was there ever heard a word of complaint about the cattle disease. He knew very well that exception was made when itinerant representatives of the landed interest attended the farmers' dinners, and excited them to discontent, and into making demands for the protection of their interests. He did not think the country could be misled in the object aimed at in the Bill. It was very well known that the source of income of the landed proprietors had been considerably shaken during recent years. They well advertized their philanthropic offers—which had been accepted—to reduce their rents. They knew there were rents still owing; and they, therefore, made this insidious attempt to make those rents goods by the taxation of commerce and the sacrifice of labour. This was unmistakable and plain to everyone who had watched the fortunes of the Bill during the past week, and had watched the policy of the landed interest with regard to it. He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) in his place; and he would appeal to him whether the great outcry which they were hearing from the opposite Benches against over-education was not rather caused by want of food than want of brain power on the part of the children? Was it not the fact that in nearly every case where a child had broken down in its attempt to get through its lessons, on investigation these children had been found to have barely sufficient food to keep body and soul together? If hon. Members took a walk through the school board districts and visited these thousands of half-starved children, all doubt as to what was the great question of the hour would disappear. It was, assuredly, how to secure a better supply of food to the poor. Members of the House of Commons, who knew no difficulty as to the supply and sufficiency of food, were, however, now merrily and light-heartedly engaged in passing a measure which meant fasting from flesh meat to thousands and thousands of the families of the country. ["No, no!"] He heard his hon. Friend the Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Duckham) joining in the cries which reached him from the opposite side of the House. He should like to say to that hon. Gentleman, and to other hon. Members who sat for county constituencies on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, who had been led against their better sense into joining in the cry for protection of the landed interest, knowing perfectly well that the farmer himself would reap no advantage whatever; but that whatever found its way into the farmer's pocket through the taxation which was now being levied on meat would, assuredly, rapidly jump from his pocket, with interest, into the pockets of those who sat on the opposite side of the House; he would like to say to them—"Do you think you are going to conciliate the Conservative farmers by voting for measures of this kind?" If they did think so, they would find it would be nothing of the sort. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) was down in Bedfordshire a short time ago; and though the hon. Member for that county (Mr. J. Howard) had been one of the most foremost and constant supporters of the Bill, he was roundly denounced for his betrayal of the farmer's interest. He would tell the hon. Gentleman that it was no use his entering into competition for Protection with the Conservative county Members—he would always be beaten. It would be far better for him, and other county Members on the Government side of the House, to maintain their old principles, and tell the farmers that a present of this kind could do them no good, but might do them a great deal of harm. He (Mr. Broadhurst) had now had the great honour of a seat in the House for three or four years; and during the whole time he had sat there he had never witnessed a clearer and more flagrant case of self-interest against the nation than had been exhibited in connection with this Bill. If he had the opportunity of arranging the Business of the House, he would require the Chaplain to habitually read out a prayer, asking that Members might dismiss from their minds self-interest. They talked of the attempt of the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) the other day to promote and obtain support for a Bill in which he was personally interested. Some hon. Members on the other side of the House regarded the proceedings of that hon. Member with holy horror. Well, he should think the proper thing for every hon. Member opposite, who argued for this great measure of Protection, to do was what the hon. Member for Stockton had done—namely, make an humble apology to the House and to the nation, and ask the Government to withdraw a Bill, which it was so well-known was a vicious and self-interested measure of the landowners of the country. He was glad the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) had at least taken a firm stand on this question; and he sincerely hoped the hon. Member would use every Form the House permitted him to use to prevent this abominable Bill from becoming law, and in that way working ruin, privation, and misery to millions of their fellow-citizens.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN apologized to the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard)—who had risen with himself—for attempting to speak on a question on which the hon. Member was a much greater authority than he was; but, as a matter of fact, he had had considerable difficulty in restraining his patience whilst listening to the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst). He represented as strong a body of the working class as the hon. Member for Stoke; and he was as fully informed of the requirements of that class as was the hon. Member, and yet he supported this Bill. He supported it in the interest of the very class that the hon. Member for Stoke contended were interested in its defeat. He never felt more assured of anything in his life than he did of the fact that the Bill was calculated to serve the consumer. The hon. Member for Stoke had used very harsh words against hon. Gentlemen opposite; and he (Mr. Cowen) did not see that there was any reason for doing that. There was no justification for it; because hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House, who were just as earnest in their Liberal professions as was the hon. Member himself, also supported this Bill. The point at issue was simply this. The farmers contended—and, he thought, contended justly—that the Bill would save them from the importation of the foot-and-mouth disease; and that, when their cattle were safe, they would be able to raise a larger amount of stock, prices would come down, and the people would be benefited. The farmers thought that they would be served, the landed interest would be served, and the country would be benefited. That was the point on which the supporters of this Bill hung all their arguments, and he was satisfied that events were in their favour. He did not wish to put his personal opinion in contrast with that of the hon. Member for Stoke; but he might state that he had been for three years on the Agricultural Commission, and had had an opportunity of testing the evidence on the subject. He was candid enough to say that before he had heard that evidence he did not entertain the opinions he did now. But, having heard that evidence, he could not, as an honest man, resist the conclusion which was forced on his mind—namely, that the case the farmer was contending for was justified by events and by facts. This attempt to get up a cry against the Bill of Protection was all clap-trap. Everyone in this country knew that Protection, so far as any class of the community was concerned, was dead and buried. It could not be re-established. The farmers were not in favour of it; but they did wish—and justly so—to be free from the disease. It was unfair and unjust to cause farmers to be subject to the most stringent examination whilst the law remained unamended. The hon. Member for Stoke complained about restrictions of this kind; but they were only such as he had himself given Notice of when he had intimated that it was his intention to move for, or to take some action for the purpose of getting, restrictions imposed on manufacturers by increasing the number of trade Inspectors. If the House was to watch the interests of working men in factories, was it not fair that the farmers should have their interests watched as well? They had a much stronger interest in this matter than the hon. Member for Stoke had in the question he was proposing to go into. The proposal before the Committee was a reasonable one as a compromise, and he was glad it was accepted on both sides. He was satisfied that when the people thoroughly understood the question they would see there were none more directly interested than themselves. There was no place in the country, he believed, where a larger number of live cattle was imported than Newcastle. There was no place where the Corporation had spent a larger amount in making warehouses, quays, and so forth, on the improvement of the facilities for the trade. He had heard that in consequence of the action taken by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire and others the people of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden—what he might call the clean countries—had taken special care to keep away the foot-and-mouth disease. In consequence of the laws that they knew, or thought, were about to be enacted in this country, they took care that the disease was not introduced amongst them. The Bill was already beginning to have an effect; and he was astonished that any man of ordinary intelligence should suppose that if they stopped the importation of disease they would not increase the number of cattle. But there was another question. This was not merely a question of raising meat—there was the question of milk and cheese as well. Anyone acquainted with working men knew that there was no greater want amongst working men in large towns than milk, and butter, and cheese; but they could not expect farmers to produce these things in sufficient quantities when the fear of disease was so much abroad. He apologized for having taken up the time of the House, but was bound to say that the observations of the hon. Member for Stoke had been entirely uncalled for.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he was delighted to hear the remarks of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), and he could not pass them over without remarking that that hon. Member, at all events, knew what were the wants and requirements of the large masses of the people of the country. He was also delighted to hear the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), because he had dealt with the question in that practical spirit which he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) recognized so fully as guiding his action in the course of his proceedings in that House. At the same time, he must say he was exceedingly astonished to hear the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst). Those remarks were of the sort which were doing more mischief in the country than any others. The hon. Member was one of those who went down into the country and agitated and tried to set class against class. They had been brought up as English Gentlemen, wishing to defer to the opinions and views of the people of the country; and they had not been in the habit—and he hoped they never would be in the habit—of trying to override or run down any class of the community. But they had to deal especially at the present moment with attacks of the coarsest kind delivered by Gentlemen like the hon. Member for Stoke. He should not consider himself worthy of a place in that House if he did not rise to repudiate the statements of the hon. Member. He cared not what the hon. Member might think fit to say in that House; but he cared much that he should go amongst the ignorant classes of the community, and endeavour to poison their minds with regard to another class who were endeavouring, honestly and faithfully, to discharge their duty in the position which they occupied. He believed the Committee would excuse him when he said that the words used by the hon. Member had been absolutely refuted by a passage in the Financial Statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman called attention in that speech to three classes of the community who had suffered from the recent depression, saying that the labourers and artisans had suffered far less than the landlords or their tenants; and yet the hon. Member for Stoke came down to the House, and said the landlords were anxious to rob that class, for whom, in reality, they had made so many sacrifices. ["No, no!"] Some hon. Members dissented from that; but it was a fact that the labourers' wages had not been reduced, and that they had been paid punctually. He defied the hon. Member to get up and show that the labouring classes in this respect would not bear favourable comparison with any other class in the country. His surprise at the charges made by the hon. Member was the greater, because he had always thought better things of him; he had believed him to be an honest Representative of the working classes of the country. His illusion, however, was dispelled by the statements of that day; and he hoped there were not many persons to be found who would come forward and state that the interests of the labourers and artisans of the country were opposed by a class who had done more than any other to maintain them in their position. And now, turning to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, he would say that the restrictions now in force in this country would be willingly submitted to, provided disease was kept out from abroad. He should have preferred the Bill as it came down from the House of Lords; but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Dodson) having brought in an Amendment, which recognized the feeling of the majority in the House, he was prepared to accept it. He was surprised at what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold), seeing that the hon. Member knew nothing about the practical part of the question. It mattered not what was the subject of debate, the hon. Member was sure to intervene, and was ready at all times to lay down the law upon it. But he ventured to say that the hon. Member was, in this instance, mistaken with regard to the feelings of his fellow-countrymen; because it was an undoubted fact that the great majority of them believed this measure to be absolutely necessary; and if the hon. Member took the trouble to go into the question he would find the Bill, as amended as was now proposed, to be not only in the interest of the producer in this country, but also in the interest of the consumer.

MR. PHILIPS said, he believed the farmers in the Midland districts were, generally speaking, very much opposed to all these restrictions that were placed on the cattle trade. Foot-and-mouth disease had existed in the country, more or less, for 200 or 300 years. [Laughter.] He might be laughed at for making that statement; but for all that he had good reason to believe it was correct. The question was this—Were they legislating for the benefit of the tenant farmer? He believed they were doing nothing of the kind. If they were legislating for the benefit of any class at all it was for that of the landlords; and he had that opinion of the landlords of England, which enabled him to say that they were not the men to wish to obtain anything from the pockets of their poorer brethren by promoting legislation which would tend to raise the price of meat throughout the country. He believed such a course was not for their interest; and, speaking as a landlord, he, for one, hoped that no such measure as this would be passed.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, he did not see his way to improve on the reply to the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) which had been made by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), who had disposed of his statements with his usual eloquence, and far more effectively than he (Mr. J. Howard) could have dealt with them. He was always pleased to hear the hon. Member for Stoke when speaking upon practical subjects which he understood; but he was bound to say that the hon. Member had that day entered upon a field of which it was clear that he knew nothing whatever. He was as much opposed to Protection as the hon. Member for Stoke, or any Member in that House; but he drew a very wide distinction between the exclusion of disease and the exclusion of animals that were not diseased. So far from this being, as asserted, a landlords' question, the Bill was the outcome of a legitimate demand on the part of the tenant farmers of the Kingdom for protection to the flocks and herds of the country; and instead of raising the price of meat, as had been asserted, he maintained, with great confidence, that if the Bill became law, and was followed by other legislation dealing with internal regulations, within the next two or three years the price of meat would fall considerably. He, therefore, cheerfully accepted the Amendment of the Government; indeed, he would have been content with the words in the original Bill, provided the Privy Council were made responsible for carrying them into effect. So long as the Privy Council satisfied themselves as to the safety of admission from any country the working of the Act would be approved.

MR. KENNY said, the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), which had evidently been delivered for the purpose of re-opening the discussion on the principle of the Bill, had not met with the same response from the House which had been accorded to his former remarks upon the subject. He wished to know whether the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) intended to take a Division on the Amendment, because if he did not it was difficult to see the utility of prolonging the discussion. There was a remarkable feature in the speeches which had been delivered in the opposite quarter of the House—namely, the ignorance of the whole subject displayed by hon. Members, and especially by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst). There was the astounding statement of the hon. Member for Bury (Mr. Philips) that the foot-and-mouth disease had been known in the country for 200 or 300 years. He thought the disease had been known here about 35 years, which was a very different thing. Why, the basis of the contention of those who supported the Bill was that the foot-and-mouth disease, not having yet been acclimatized in the country, was a disease which might be stamped out. Then there was the contention of the hon. Member for Stoke, that the supporters of the Bill were endeavouring to tax the food of the people. But that had been very properly called a mere outcry; the objects of the Bill being simply to prevent disease. If the hon. Member had understood the question, he believed he would have been amongst the supporters of the Bill, as furnishing the means of putting a stop to diseased importations. Of the total quantity of meat imported into the country, 25 per cent was brought in at the expense of millions of money which was lost to English and Irish farmers, whose stock became infected with foot-and-mouth disease. He trusted the Committee would be allowed speedily to come to a Division on the Amendment of the Government, which, he believed, was cheerfully accepted by all reasonable Members of the House.

MR. WIGGIN said, if he thought the Bill would increase the cost of meat by one farthing he should vote against it; but, as he believed it would have a contrary effect, he felt it his duty to give the measure his support. He resided on the borders of three counties; and he could inform the Committee that in his capacity he had been inundated with applications for orders for the removal of cattle; and he was quite sure that if the hon. Member for Stoke had spent only a short time with him during last winter, he would have altered the opinion he had formed on the merits of the Bill. For his own part, he had no doubt that in the course of a few years, so far from adding to the cost of food, there would be a large increase in the flocks and herds of the country, which would tend to keep down the price of meat. One word with regard to the remark of the hon. Member for Stoke, as to the necessity of providing children with wholesome food. The most wholesome food for children was good milk, and the Bill would undoubtedly tend towards providing a larger supply of it. Not only was much disease in general traceable to bad milk, but, in his opinion, to unwholesome and adulterated milk were due many of the diseases especially prevalent amongst children. In the interest, therefore, of the whole country they were bound, as a Legislative Body, to do all that lay in their power to stamp out a disease which gave rise to so many evils.

MR. RYLANDS said, he wished to separate himself from the opinions expressed by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst). He was quite sure the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had spoken with perfect sincerity when he stated that he and other Members who supported the Bill were desirous of providing securities against disease, and that the effect of those securities would be to increase the home supply of cattle. He did not dispute that, nor was he inclined to dispute the views, expressed with so much vigour, by his hon. Friend who had just spoken; and he wished to tell him that he and his hon. Friends thought it most important that the foot-and-mouth disease should be got rid of. They believed hon. Members had a common interest in doing that; but they said—and to this he would beg the attention of all hon. Members—that the Privy Council had already sufficient powers to do everything necessary for the protection of stock in the country. ["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen said "No;" but they had not proved that the Privy Council had failed to take the steps that were just and right to prevent the importation of disease from abroad; they said—"We want to give the Privy Council not only more power, but we want to take away from them the discretion of using it." But when such a proposal as that was made, he said that the onus probandi rested with those who made it. The Privy Council stated that they did not think the Bill was necessary, and that they had brought down the importation of disease to a minimum, and the Government had simply accepted the Bill because it was forced upon them by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). The Government had sought to modify the Bill, so as to prevent it being forced through Parliament with the Amendments made in the House of Lords; but they were defeated; and he was bound to say that he did not think the Government could have done much more than they had done. If the effect of the Amendment was to compel the Privy Council to put serious restrictions on the import of live stock, he believed that it would create a very large amount of discontent throughout the country, and interfere, to a great extent, with the industrial occupations of the people, while it would also raise the price of food. If that was believed to be the effect of the Bill, he said they were justified in using all the Forms of the House in resisting it. His hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) refused to join in accepting the Amendment; and if he went to a Division he should feel it his duty to vote with him, as a protest against this compromise, which he said would be understood by the country in this way—that the Representatives of the landed interest on both sides of the House had compelled the Government, contrary to their own judgment, to adopt a course about which they were in doubt. He ventured to say that if there had been fewer county magnates and Members representing the landed interest in that House, and a greater number of Representatives of the industrial classes and the industrial interests of the country, the Government would not have been driven into a corner and compelled to accept an Amendment of which they did not approve. He very much regretted that there should have been any legislation on this matter at all. It appeared to him to be quite unnecessary; and he believed that even with the greatest care—if every foreign animal were kept out of the country—foot-and-mouth disease might spring up. Hon. Gentlemen would not deny that 39 years ago, when the importation of live animals was absolutely prohibited from all parts of the world, and when there could be no possibility of infection, this disease arose. One of his hon. Friends (Mr. Philips) had stated that foot-and-mouth disease had been known in the country for generations; and, notwithstanding the cries of “No, no!” from some hon. Gentlemen, he was much inclined to believe in the accuracy of his hon. Friend’s statement. At all events, it was certain that there was foot-and-mouth disease when live animals from all parts of the world were prohibited; and therefore he was justified in saying that no amount of prohibition would prevent it now.

MR. GILES said, he regretted to be at variance with any of his hon. Friends on that side of the House; but having learnt that the Government had offered to compromise the matter in dispute in a way which his hon. Friend approved, he should be only too glad to vote for the Amendment. He would say, in reference to the point raised by Members on the opposite Benches, that, in his opinion, the fears of the agricultural interest were much exaggerated as to the introduction of disease into the country. When it was considered that the country could no longer supply her population with meat, it was a serious thing to increase the restrictions upon imported cattle, and thereby shut out 400,000 or 500,000 animals. It was proved that the largest number of cattle that we could supply was under 2,000,000; and, therefore, by the proposed restrictions, they might prevent 22 per cent of the supply coming into the market. Then with regard to the question of the milk supply. The statements upon that appeared to him also of an exaggerated kind. In dealing with the question of cattle, the stock was placed under three heads—cattle fit for the butcher; cattle under two years old; and milch cows and heifers. It appeared that more than one-third of the cattle in the country were milch cows and heifers; and as only one in 27 of all classes were attacked, it followed that the number of milch cows attacked could only be one in 80, a proportion quite insufficient to justify the exclusion of foreign supplies.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, if his hon. Friend went to a Division he should be obliged to take the course, which he seldom adopted, of not voting upon the question at all. He could not vote for the Amendment, because he did not wish to make himself responsible for the Bill; and he could not vote against it, because it was a decided improvement upon the Bill as it stood at that moment, inasmuch as it would enable the Government to work the Act much better than they could otherwise have done. The time for a protest, as had been pointed out by an hon. Friend, was on the insertion of the clause, and not when an improvement was being made in it.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he represented a constituency (Manchester) numbering many thousands of people. He could state to the Committee that amongst them there was an almost unanimous disapproval of this Bill; and were his hon. Colleague (Mr. Houldsworth), who sat on the opposite side of the House, present, he would appeal to him as to the correctness of that statement. They believed that the increased restrictions asked for were based upon a delusion which strongly possessed the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), who thought if there were no foreign cattle imported into the country the flocks and herds would be free from disease. Why, it would be just as reasonable, with a similar object, to shut out men and women. It was Lancashire and London that were chiefly interested in this legislation. But he was quite aware that they had little influence in that House; because although their population was large they had a very small representation. The hon. Member for Newcastle had spoken of the feeling of the people there; but he (Mr. Jacob Bright) believed that the people of that town were more fortunate than those in Lancashire in respect of the cattle imported, which in the former case were Scandinavian. He hoped the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) would take a Division on this question by way of protest, in which case he believed he would have a very respectable following.

MR. PUGH said, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Dodson) had taken credit for having practically restricted the importation of diseased cattle last year. It followed that during the last year there was a sufficient restriction with regard to disease. Why, then, were further restrictions asked for? What would be the effect of restrictions other than those which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had already in his power to exercise? Had the restrictive powers which he possessed resulted in raising the price of meat, or had they not? Because, if the latter were the case, it was difficult to understand how hon. Gentlemen near him could argue against the Bill. If anyone would take the trouble to refer to a file of The Times, it would be found that between the last Monday in April, 1883, and the last Monday in April of the present year, the price of meat in the London Market had gone down $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per pound, and in the country 1d. per pound, so that the restriction already imposed upon the importation of cattle had been to lower the price of meat; and he was satisfied that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster followed up the principle upon which he had already acted, and took the same care under this Bill, that there would result a still further reduction in the price of meat throughout the country.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had been pleased with the remarks of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), when he drew attention to the fact that he represented a large constituency having but a small representation. He (Mr. Anderson) represented a similar constituency very inadequately able to give expression to its opinions in that House. They disliked this Bill altogether. Although they were willing to accept it as a compromise in the form in which it was originally introduced by the Government, they considered it better to have no Bill at all than the Bill altered in the manner now proposed. They did not approve the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, because they did not see that it constituted any Amendment at all. It did not appear to him to make any real difference in the meaning of the clause; and he was of opinion that if the Bill were passed in the form proposed, it would, without doubt, raise the price of meat most injuriously to large communities. Now, he thought it very likely that the Amendment before the Committee, so long as it was worked by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Department, would be worked in the way which he designed it to work; but hon. Members must consider that the position of the right hon. Gentleman was not necessarily a permanent one; it was quite possible that a Government composed of Gentlemen from the other side of the House might have the working of the Bill. He observed that the Amendment, which would have had the effect of limiting the operation of the Act to two years, had been withdrawn from the Paper, so that now the Bill, when it passed into law, would be permanent. What would be the effect of that? If its effect should be to raise the price of meat they could not get quit of that grievance until they had passed a new Act for the purpose; and it was well known what the difficulty of passing that new Act would be. He was not quite sure that the wording of the Amendment might not lead to some difficulty, although he knew, or believed that he knew, the meaning which the right hon. Gentleman intended it to have—namely, that he should not be obliged, merely because one part of a country had unsatisfactory regulations with regard to cattle, to exclude importation from the whole of that country. But suppose a Government in power of which the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) was a Member. That hon. Gentleman might read the words in another way, and say that they meant that if any part of a country were infected, and had unsatisfactory regulations, importations from the whole of that country should be stopped. Therefore, he asked his right hon. Friend to study the words of the Amendment, and see if it were not possible to take either the one or the other meaning out of them; because the meaning he had last put upon it would be disastrous to the constituency which he had the honour to represent (Glasgow). To him it appeared that the slight concession made was cloaked in such doubtful language as to be of very little value. If he thought it of real use he would not be disposed to vote against it; but he could not see that, on the whole, the Amendment would do very much good. It would seem that in this matter, as was too often the case, the Government had been too careful to conciliate their enemies, and too little careful to reckon with their friends. Had they done otherwise, he thought they would have been disposed rather to abandon the Bill when the other House refused to accept the compromise offered to them.

MR. EWART said, hon. Members opposite had spoken of the Bill as only supported by county Members; but he represented a large urban and manufacturing constituency (Belfast), and he gave the Bill his most cordial support, in the interest not only of the farmers, but of manufacturers and others living in towns. The farmers were under the belief—mistaken as some people considered them to be, though he believed their statement—that they were injured by the importation of the cattle disease from abroad. They were prevented by this belief from increasing their herds, and were in every way discouraged; the immediate effect of which was to raise the price of home-grown meat. He had listened with great regret to the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), who had departed from his usual moderate and conciliatory tone, in order to indulge in language which could have no other effect than of setting class against class—that was to say, the farmers against the traders—and of raising again the question of Protection. He (Mr. Ewart) had not the slightest desire to return to Protection if it were possible to do so. The English farmers were, under the existing system, being fairly driven out of the trade; and the great hope of the country was in the production of wheat, butter, and cheese abroad. The importation of butter alone was represented by £12,000,000 annually; and anything which interfered with the production of butter in this country would be very detrimental to the people at large. The dead meat trade gave them the greatest hope for the future; they might get live cattle from the North of Europe and America; but they could not get them from Australia and the River Plate, from which countries an unlimited supply could be obtained.

MR. BRYCE said, he rose to protest against the proposed Amendment. He did not accuse hon. Members opposite, or Gentlemen on that side of the House, of any sinister motives in supporting it; but he submitted that they had not shown that the chief evil which was apprehended would be cured by the Bill; far more, in his opinion, would be effected in that direction by internal restrictions than by cutting off foreign supplies. London had only 22 Members in that House to represent a population of 4,000,000; and he doubted whether, if the Metropolis were properly represented, the Bill would be permitted to pass. The House was simply imposing a very serious burden upon the poorest class of the population; because there could really be no doubt that the effect of the Bill would be to raise the price of meat. The House, in order to meet the unreasonable fears of a Party within those walls, were going to incur a certain evil for a mere possibility of good—an evil which would be inflicted on that poorest class of the community whose welfare should be an object of especial care on the floor of the House.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he would ask hon. Members on that side of the House, who had expressed their intention to vote against the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to consider what would be the effect of its rejection. It would be to maintain the more restrictive words introduced into the Bill in the House of Lords. [MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: With a view to future amendment?] Yes; but what prospect was there of carrying any Amendments that gave larger discretion to the Privy Council than would be given by the words before the Committee? He agreed with his right hon. Friend in thinking that there was no real necessity for the Bill; but that was not the opinion of the House. And it was by that opinion they must be governed. He did not wish to enter into any argument on the question; but he would point out that the Amendment placed on the Paper by his right hon. Friend had been accepted by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that it was an Amendment which enlarged the discretion of the Privy Council, as compared with the Bill which came down from the House of Lords. He regretted that the Bill should be passed even with that Amendment; but his regret was very much modified, because he believed that the Amendment left to the common sense of the Privy Council a large measure of discretion, while he hoped that the effect of the Bill would not prove as injurious as some of his hon. Friends had foreshadowed. But if the Act should produce the effect which so many attributed to it, he said it was impossible for any Government, whether Liberal or Conservative, to maintain it in operation. He believed his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) represented the views which a large proportion of the working classes entertained with regard to the Bill. For his own part, he would support the Amendment, and should vote for it; and he hoped that his hon. Friends on that side of the House would think twice before they voted against it; because he believed that under it they would be able to effect the maximum amount of restriction in the interest of the farmer, and the minimum amount of restriction against the consumer.

MR. BIGGAR said, the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had said that these restrictions were not required; but he would ask him how he could reconcile that opinion with the conduct of the local authorities in Scotland, who, during several months of last winter, had entirely prohibited the importation into Scotland of Irish cattle? It appeared to him that if those gentlemen held the views which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Glasgow, the importation of Irish cattle would not have been prohibited. Seeing that such restrictions had been agreed to by the local representatives in many parts of the Kingdom, he did not think that any valid argument had been offered against the Bill.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON moved, in page 1, line 18, to leave out "afflicted," and insert "affected."

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether you are aware that after the first Division was called, and many Members had left the House, the doors were thrown open between the time the bell rang and the second Division; and those Members who, like myself, were in the Lobby and went to the doors to find what the second Division was about, found that the doors had been locked, notwithstanding the fact that no bell had been rung? They were, therefore, unaware that a Division was about to take place; and I want to know, under the circumstances, whether the Division was regular?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: I was one of those hon. Members who were thus misled. I was prepared to vote when the House was cleared the first time; but seeing that no Division was to take place I left the House, and I have not the slightest idea upon what point the second Division was taken. The bell was never rung at all, and I wish to know if there is any way in which I can record my vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no doubt that there was some little confusion, and that the doors were not opened as soon as they ought to have been. I think the doors were thrown open as soon as the Clerk could get a messenger to go there; and I do not think that any hon. Member was prevented, in consequence of what occurred, from recording his vote.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that no bell was rung?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: With all respect to you, Sir, the point you have mentioned is not the one to which I desire to call your attention. The bell did ring for the first Division; but when the Division was called, no Division took place. The door was then open, and some Members left the House. They were not aware that a second Division was taking place, because the bell never rang.

THE CHAIRMAN: No doubt it is customary for the bell to ring whenever there is about to be a Division, and I gave general directions accordingly. I very much regret that those directions were not carried out; but they were certainly given.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the next Amendment upon the Paper stood in his name, and the object of it was to strike out the clause. After the decided opinion which the Committee had expressed in the last Division, he did not propose to take another Division; but he would be quite ready to support by his vote the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), or any other hon. Member who desired to divide upon the clause. He begged, therefore, to move the rejection of the clause.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 343; Noes 50: Majority 293.—(Div. List, No. 78.)

Clause 2 (Extension of provisions relating to quarantine).

MR. KENNY moved, in page 1, line 22, after the word "from," to insert "foreign." The object of the Amendment was to provide that the prohibition should apply to foreign countries only. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had already expressed his willingness to accept this Amendment. As the clause stood, and if this word were not inserted, it might give rise to misinterpretation, and the prohibition might be applied to Ireland. The clause itself referred to the Act of 1878, which related to animals generally; and if this word were not inserted there was a possibility that the clause would be applied to Ireland. It was to prevent this result that he proposed the insertion of the word "foreign;" and it was not necessary that he should detain the Committee any further in explaining the purport of the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 22, after the word "from," to insert the word "foreign."—(Mr. Kenny.)

MR. DODSON said, he was quite willing to agree to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. JAMES HOWARD moved the rejection of the clause. For the information of the Committee, he might state that under Schedule 5, Part 2, provision was made for the admission of animals from the scheduled countries for exhibition and other exceptional circumstances. The Schedule provided that these foreign animals should be landed at a particular part of the several wharves, and kept at what were called quarantine stations. The Privy Council had power to issue Orders in Council prohibiting the exportation of animals suffering from other diseases than rinderpest. The Privy Council had already exercised this power in respect of foot-and-mouth disease in eight countries in Europe. The object of the clause was to allow the importation, from prohibited countries, of animals for exhibition and other exceptional circumstances; but, considering the difficulty of extirpating foot-and-mouth disease when it once gained a footing in the country, it appeared to him that the proposal contained in the clause was highly dangerous. The only reason for the introduction of the question in "another place" was that there had been some difficulty under the Act of 1878 in allowing of importation in peculiar cases. That argument was used in reference to the importation of certain performing bulls; he believed this clause to be totally unnecessary and highly dangerous. As far back as 1840 the late Professor Youatt traced the introduction of foot-and-mouth disease to the importation, in 1839, of certain animals of the bovine species for the Zoological Society. He, therefore, begged to move its omission.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the Clause.—(Mr. James Howard.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. DODSON said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press the Motion. He thought he should be able to satisfy the Committee that the hon. Member was mistaken in regard to the object of the clause. He had explained it on the second reading of the Bill. It gave the Privy Council the same power of admission for exceptional purposes from prohibited countries as they possessed in regard to countries scheduled for slaughter. If it was struck out of the Bill, there would be no dispensing power in favour of the pet regimental goat, and the learned pig, the performing bull, and other animals which contributed to popular entertainments, would be excluded. He appealed to all Members who were friends of education to allow the clause to stand. It would certainly do no hurt to admit a learned pig from a country in which there was no cattle plague, while at present England might be deprived of the display of its abilities and the opportunity of deriving instruction from it. Of course, no animals would be allowed to be admitted except under conditions which precluded the danger of infection.

MR. CHAPLIN confessed that he had come down to the House prepared to oppose this clause; but, after hearing the explanation which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman, he would only say that it did not appear to him to be unreasonable, and, under the circumstances, he would not oppose it.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY said, he should support the proposal of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard). These animals were constantly travelling all over every foreign country, exhibiting almost daily in different localities; and nothing could be more dangerous than to allow animals coming from a country in which infection existed to carry disease to localities hitherto free from it. It would be far safer to omit the clause; and it must be remembered that these animals were connected with exhibitions all over Europe.

MR. DODSON said, he would remind the hon. Member that they were subject to quarantine.

MR. JAMES HOWARD wished to know whether the clause was intended to apply to cattle plague countries? Would the right hon. Gentleman explain what the countries were to which it was applied?

MR. DODSON said, it would apply to the prohibited countries; but was subject to stringent rules. The cattle plague countries were not the only prohibited countries at the present moment. France, for instance, was prohibited, not on account of cattle plague, but on account of foot-and-mouth disease.

MR. MAC IVER said, it appeared to him that the clause, even on the statement of the Chancellor of the Duchy, was totally unnecessary; and he thought it would be highly imprudent, and even mischievous, to allow this importation of animals from prohibited countries. He thought the Amendment they had passed, and which had been added to Clause 1, was quite enough to cover anything objectionable proposed to be dealt with under Clause 2. He did not wish to give a silent vote, because the county in which his constituency was placed, more than any other in England, knew the terrible nature of the cattle plague, seeing that that county (Cheshire) had lost a considerable portion of its cattle from that disease. It was, to this very day, contributing towards a cattle plague rate; and it had substantial reasons for dreading any further importation of disease. Believing the clause to be wholly unnecessary, and even mischievous, he would cordially support the Amendment.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill" put, and agreed to.

Clause 3 (Amendment of Part Four of Schedule V. of the principal Act).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, in page 1, line 29, after the word "to," to insert the words "the route by which the animals are conveyed to this Country or to." The hon. Gentleman said, that a large part of his constituency had a great desire to import store cattle from the United States of America, and they did not think that, if proper regulations were observed, there was any risk of importing any contagious disease. The object of the Amendment was to give the Privy Council complete power to direct the route by which store cattle could be imported into the country. He intended to propose later on that, in addition to the powers conferred on the Privy Council by the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act of 1878, they should be able to make such Orders as they thought fit for prohibiting the conveyance of animals by any vessel to or from any part of the United Kingdom for such time as they might consider expedient.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 29, after the word "to," to insert the words "the route by which the animals are conveyed to this Country or to."—(Mr. J. W. Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON had no objection to insert these words, though he thought they were covered by other words.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. JAMES HOWARD proposed to omit the words "or otherwise," in page 1, line 29; first, because he did not understand their effect; and, secondly, because they were not sufficiently precise for an Act of Parliament. He hoped to hear what their intention was.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 29, to leave out the words "or otherwise."—(Mr. James Howard.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out and stand part of the Clause."

MR. DODSON said, these words were calculated to be very needful; because under this provision not only the route by which the animals came might be required, but other particulars, such as a certificate of origin, the conditions and regulations on railways, &c.; and these words were intended to give the Department power to make any requirements of that kind which might appear to be necessary. These were words with which he should be very sorry to part.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman was, no doubt, that which was in his own mind; but he thought that, if they looked to the fourth part of the 5th Schedule of the original Act, they would find that these words enabled the Privy Council to admit animals under any conditions whatever, because in the 4th section there was this provision—

"Shall allow animals, or any specified animals, to be landed without being subject under the provisions of this Schedule to slaughter or quarantine."

Therefore, to leave the words as was now proposed would be to make it competent to the Privy Council to admit animals for store purposes without any precautions or restrictions whatever. It was easy to see, that being so, that animals intended for store might bring in foot-and-mouth disease, just as well as animals brought in for meat.

MR. PUGH said, he did not think the Committee would accept the view of the noble Viscount that where animals were admitted under this section the Privy Council would be able to make no regulations except with reference to quarantine.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, that as it appeared that the retention of these words would impose greater power on the Privy Council, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. DUCKHAM proposed the omission of the 3rd clause. The Committee had heard from the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) that it was desirable to have in that county for pasture cattle from the United States. They knew that in the United States there was a considerable amount of pleuro-pneumonia, and that Texan fever prevailed in Texas. According to the Buff Book, only last year, during August, September, October, and November, 28 cargoes, consisting of 17,000 cattle, were sent to Liverpool; but 276 animals were thrown overboard on the voyage, 19 were landed dead, and 2,364 were found to be suffering from Texan fever on their arrival in port. If Texan cattle were to be admitted without quarantine, it would seriously prejudice, not only the interests of stockowners, but also of consumers. The cattle plague prevailed in 1865-6, again in 1872, and again in 1877; and, in 1878, the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act was passed, with the object of keeping cattle plague out, of stamping out pleuro-pneumonia, and, as far as possible, guarding their flocks and herds from foot-and-mouth disease. Now, what was the nature of Texan fever? It was as fatal as the cattle plague, but it took considerably more time to develop; and animals might arrive here for store purposes in a state of incubation; no inspection was of value until the disease had developed itself. Besides, Texan cattle, themselves apparently healthy, were capable of conveying to other animals the germs of the disease. So treacherous a disease as that could not be too strictly guarded against and prevented from entering this country. During the last four years great efforts had been made to free the nation from pleuro-pneumonia, and now Ireland, Scotland, and England were very nearly free from it. But if animals affected by that disease were brought into this country for store purposes, they could never preserve their stocks from it. The time of incubation varied from two weeks to four months, and no examination could tell whether the disease was latent within the animal or not before it developed itself; and it was known that for 12 months after an animal had recovered from the disease, which was of rare occurrence, it was capable of conveying it to healthy animals. With this state of things before them, the Committee ought to hesitate very much before passing a measure that was calculated to create so much disaster to agriculture. It had been said that the agriculturists of the country wanted this measure for their protection; but as to protection, that was not so at all. He believed that, if they were polled, a large majority would vote against any measure of protection; they well knew that no measure calculated to enhance the price of food for the people would ever be allowed to pass. He maintained that by preserving the health of their flocks and herds they would reduce, and not increase, the price of food. Last year, owing to the severe losses in this country caused by foot-and-mouth disease, the price of meat rose far above the average of the past few years; and not only so, but £6,500,000 were sent abroad to obtain more meat than had been imported the previous year; and this, although there were more cattle and sheep and pigs in Great Britain and Ireland last year than there were in the preceding year, and a superabundance of food for the stock. With such startling facts as those before them, the Committee ought to see the necessity for guarding, in the strongest possible manner, against the introduction and spread of diseases. Anyone who would look through the statistics for the last 20 years would see that when the country was free from disease meat was reduced in price, and that the reverse was the case when disease prevailed. On these facts he moved the rejection of the clause.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the Clause.—(Mr. Duckham.)

MR. DODSON said, he thought the hon. Gentleman could not have fully comprehended the effect of this clause. When he had, he hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn. The clause provided that if part of a foreign country was free from disease, and complied with the conditions of the fourth part of the 5th Schedule of the Act of 1878, then we might, subject to quarantine and any further regulations we thought requisite, receive cattle from that part for store purposes.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was not satisfied with the right hon. Gentleman's statement. It was quite possible for one State in the American Union to be perfectly free from disease, and yet for there to be no certainty that cattle shipped from that State would not come through an affected State. It was not certain that the cattle would have an all-through transit, passing only through States that were free from disease. The clause, as it stood, was, he thought, calculated to increase the facilities for bringing in cattle from diseased States; and seeing that very stringent measures were to be taken against bringing in animals, even though they were to be slaughtered at the port of debarkation, there should be no lessening of the restrictions as to store cattle, which might scatter disease all over the country.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that after the concession made by the Government several Gentlemen on the Opposition side were anxious to meet them as far as possible; but he wished to ask for some explanation from the right hon.

Gentleman. He apprehended that this clause was not intended to apply chiefly to the United States. Undoubtedly, there were some parts of the United States that were perfectly free from disease, although other parts were not. He wished to know whether the Government had any information as to whether cattle disease had or had not been in existence all along the Atlantic sea-board for some time, as he believed it had been? Suppose there were some States—say the Western States—where the Government were satisfied there was no disease, and whence, therefore, it might be desirable to import cattle, how were they to be brought into this country? What route would the Government consider satisfactory? And suppose they were brought from those States, and it was desired to export them at the Eastern ports, would the Government consider it right that that should be done?

MR. DODSON explained that under the 4th Schedule the Privy Council must be satisfied that the laws relating to the importation and exportation of cattle, the laws for the prevention of the introduction and spread of disease, and the general sanitary condition of the animals in a country, were such as to afford reasonable security against the importation of diseased animals. The danger in regard to the United States was this—there was pleuro-pneumonia in the States along the sea-board, there was none in the Western States; but up to the present time there had been no law in the Western States to prevent the free entry of animals from the Eastern States. If, however, the Western States passed such laws as would prevent the introduction of animals from the Eastern States, then there would be little danger to the Western States, and less risk as to importation from them.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he quite understood that the clause gave the Government discretion to a certain extent; but there was to be discretion as to admitting animals into this country from a specified port of America which might be perfectly free from disease, but with regard to which the animals, in order to arrive in this country, must go to another port which was not free, especially a port on the Atlantic sea-board, where he understood the right hon. Gentleman to admit there was pleuro-pneumonia at the present time.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. DODSON replied, that in that case the animals would come to this country not from a sound but from an unsound State.

MR. DUCKHAM asked what guarantee there would be that animals would not be allowed to come from an unsafe State; and also, whether this restriction was to apply to Germany, where rinderpest and pleuro-pneumonia existed to a large extent?

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, the powers which the Privy Council would have under the 5th Schedule were only to be exercised with respect to a whole country; but the object of this clause was this—that in the case of, say, Schleswig-Holstein, if the cattle were in a healthy condition, and those of other parts of Germany diseased, the Privy Council could exercise these powers in favour of Schleswig-Holstein; whereas Clause 3 would exclude the whole of Germany. That he understood was the object of the clause.

MR. BIGGAR said, he still thought the clause ought not to be agreed to. Suppose the State of New York was free, but an intervening State was not, how could the authorities here tell what route the cattle would take—whether they would come direct from a free State or through a State that was not free? In his view, no change should be made in the restrictions already existing; but this clause, instead of increasing the safety of cattle in this country, would increase, in a marked degree, the risk of our cattle being infected through foreign cattle.

MR. KENNY said, he thought a Division might be taken, even if there was no chance of the clause being struck out, because of the great risk there was as to the practical workability of this clause. It was an extraordinary statement that had been made, that out of 17,000 cattle imported into Liverpool, 2,364 were suffering from Texan fever. What guarantee should they have that animals sent to Liverpool in future might not be suffering from this disease, although it might not have made itself apparent? He thought there should be some provision imposing quarantine for seven days, in order to secure this country from the risk of being infected by Texan fever.

MR. DODSON repeated that this clause was required.

MR. BULWER wished for some information as to the probable effects of this clause. He understood that without this clause, supposing, for instance, there was disease in one of the Departments of France, as the law now stood the Privy Council would be bound to prohibit the importation of cattle from the whole of France. If there was disease in the Department of the Seine or the Loire, this clause, as he understood it, would enable the Privy Council to admit cattle from other French Departments which were free from disease. He did not know whether his idea was correct; but the answer of the right hon. Gentleman would very much influence his Vote.

MR. DODSON replied, that the Schedule of the Act of 1878, upon which this clause was founded, required the Privy Council to admit freely from countries when satisfied of the fulfilment of certain specified conditions which were clearly enumerated in the Schedule. This clause enabled them to admit from a specified part of a country, if that part complied with the conditions of the Schedule, but subject to quarantine and any other regulations judged requisite for safety.

MR. R. H. PAGET failed to see that the clause would provide what the right hon. Gentleman stated, and he was afraid the right hon. Gentleman had fallen into an error. The Schedule referred to admitted animals without quarantine, and this clause would do the same. He contended that there was no quarantine in the clause.

MR. DODSON said, that was not what the Government understood or intended. The 4th Schedule compelled the Privy Council to admit freely, without quarantine; but this clause provided for the requirements of quarantine.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, that if the right hon. Gentleman would undertake that if this clause, as drawn, did not give effect entirely to the principle he had enunciated, he would amend it on Report, he should be satisfied.

MR. DODSON replied, that if the clause did not give effect to what he had stated to be the intention of the Privy Council, he would amend it so that it should do so.

MR. BIGGAR said, this was a very important question, which he thought ought not to be settled off-hand. One of the great evils of Business in that House was haste and hurry to pass new clauses without proper consideration. What had occurred with regard to this clause? It was perfectly obvious that the Government could impose quarantine if they chose, and the right hon. Gentleman had said that he intended to use that power in a particular way; but the right hon. Gentleman's Successor might not know what his opinions and intentions had been, and some right hon. Gentleman who knew nothing about this matter might have the administration of a very mischievous Act. Another important consideration was as to the part of the country. According to the Bill as it stood a single parish, if it complied with the Act of 1878, might be able to sell cattle to the public, although every one of the surrounding parishes might be ravaged by foot-and-mouth disease or Texan fever.

MR. KENNY wished again to call attention to this clause, because in its present shape he believed it would be entirely inoperative. The Chancellor of the Duchy had stated what his interpretation of the clause was; but that interpretation only stood good for the right hon. Gentleman, and for nobody else. The clause would be liable to a variety of interpretations; and, that being so, the danger remained of disease being brought into this country by dishonest people, who might endeavour to evade the specified ports in England, and smuggle diseased animals into other ports. The Privy Council were empowered to exact certain conditions, and to make certain Orders, but they might refuse to do so.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress; Committee to sit again this day.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON asked when this Bill would be put down again?

MR. DODSON replied, that he would put the Bill down for Thursday next, with a view not to proceeding with it on that day, but to fixing a day when it should be taken.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—ELEMEN-TARY SCHOOL TEACHERS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BRODRICK, in rising to call attention to the position of Elementary School Teachers appointed in 1846-51, and the great disadvantage to the cause of education resulting therefrom, and to move—

“That the position of School Teachers in public Elementary Schools, appointed 1846-51, in respect of pensions, is detrimental to the best interests of education, and requires the further consideration of Her Majesty's Government,” said, that the Motion which he had to make that evening related to a subject which was not unfamiliar to the House. On a previous occasion the Vice President of the Council had promised that he would take the subject into consideration; but, despite any consideration that might have been given to it up to that time, no action had been taken upon the subject. The interest which was felt on that subject was enormous, and he had received a very large amount of correspondence about it—more, indeed, than he had been able even to acknowledge. To those unconnected with the Teaching Profession it might not be an interesting subject; but it was one which had to be dealt with upon its prosaic details. A certain number of school teachers had been appointed in 1846, when the state of public education had been a matter of very serious consideration to Parliament, and when there had been a considerable difficulty in obtaining adequate teachers. Parliament had then put the matter on a definite footing; and it had been resolved that it was expedient to make provision by retiring pensions for those teachers who were disabled by age or illness. This had been followed by another Resolution, by which authority was taken to grant the required pension, but under certain qualifications to be possessed by the teacher. He thought that if they took the case of any other service where a retiring pension might be granted on certain terms, it was understood that when the man had fulfilled those provisions the pension would be given accordingly; but this was not the view taken by the Committee of Council, before whom the matter arose again in 1851. The Committee of Council appeared to have been frightened at what it had done; and it had been resolved that, the object having been to secure competent teachers, and that object having been obtained, the sum of £6,500 should be voted annually as a retiring pension, although the number induced to join had already reached 700 or 800 persons. It must be obvious to the House that during these five years, from 1846 to 1851, a number of teachers had taken office in the belief that no such limitation existed. Ten years later the matter had again come under the consideration of the Council. At that time Mr. Lowe was Vice President of the Council, and seemed to have been seized with the same violent desire for economy by which he had afterwards so distinguished himself, as he had deliberately declared that the pensions were no longer to be granted under any circumstances. After all the promises made, these very limited pensions were taken away, and no pensions given at all. It would hardly be possible to imagine a grosser breach of public faith, and it even seemed as if the moment chosen was specially selected to emphasize this view, for until 1861 no teacher appointed in 1846 would have completed the service necessary for a pension; so that the pensions were taken away by Mr. Lowe at the very moment when the State might be called on to pay them. Of course, the Council might shelter themselves under the words which made it permissive and not compulsory on them to grant pensions. The Vice President of the Council might say he was making an appeal ad misericordiam; but, even if the teachers had been under a mistake, they still had grievances of which to complain. Coming to the Committee of 1872, he would not admit that the Report of that Committee was in any way conclusive. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) would admit the accuracy of what he was saying. The Committee had met late in 1872; they had held a few meetings and examined a few persons. At the end of the Session they had issued a short draft Report, and asked leave to be reappointed in the subsequent Session. That reappointment had never been made, and that draft Report was the one upon which reliance had been placed by those who opposed these claims. The Committee had not taken a tithe of the evidence which could enable it to judge on the matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had confessed that the Committee ought to have been reappointed for the consideration of these affairs. Many Members of the House had spoken on the subject under great misconceptions, owing to the incomplete nature of the Report; for before 1872 there was no organization of the teachers to secure a proper statement of their views, and no evidence was given before the Committee of the views held by statesmen at the time of the Minute of 1846 as to the interpretation which they put on the undertaking given by the Government. He would, with the permission of the House, read one or two extracts, to show the view taken of this obligation by statesmen of that day. The Marquess of Lansdowne said—

"I do think that any extension of the system of education in this country will be imperfect, which does not, to a considerable extent, ameliorate the condition of this class, and excite the hopes of reward. It is therefore proposed that a provision, small, undoubtedly, at first, but still which will be considered a very great object as a provision, however small, for old age, shall be made for well-conducted schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, who shall be reported as having for 15 years conducted unexceptionally schools of a certain size. . . . This, no doubt, will prove a very useful stimulus."

Lord John Russell, who was then Prime Minister, in the House of Commons, on April 19, 1847, said—

"I ask the House with confidence, whether it be not most important that the schoolmasters, to whom we intrust a task which it is so necessary they should discharge efficiently, should be able to look forward to some reward and emolument, not perhaps commensurate—for nothing can be commensurate in such cases—but more so than their reward is now, to the great and responsible duties they have to perform, and the importance of the situation they hold in life? With a view to these considerations, there is a proposition—on account of which no money will be required in the present year, but on account of which, in future years, if the grant should be continued, some may be called for—to provide retiring pensions for schoolmasters who may work themselves out in the service, and who, after performing the important duties I have referred to, might find themselves at an advanced age with no provision for the future, and with scarcely bread to eat."—(Ibid., [91] 959.)

Mr. T. Duncombe, in moving an Amendment to the Motion of Lord John Russell, said—

"He begged the House for a moment to pause and consider the amount of patronage that had already been created. . . . Then look at the pensions and gratuities that would be at the disposal of Government and the Privy Council among the schoolmasters and schoolmistresses under the scheme. He wanted to know what necessity there was, for schoolmasters, at the end of 15 years' service, having any pensions at all? There were many poor curates who had worked from 20 to 30 years, who had no pensions; and yet a schoolmaster, who should enter as a teacher at an age of 20 or 25, was not only to get gratuities during his service, but a retiring allowance at the end of 15 years. . . . What he wanted was that this unconstitutional body (Committee of Council on Education) should not have the power of granting gratuities and pensions to the extent of some £2,000,000 of the public taxes."—(Ibid., 995-6.)

Therefore, Mr. Duncombe had argued against the imposing of millions on the public taxes for teachers; whereas the actual sum to which the generosity of the Government had extended was £6,500 annually for a limited period. He thought it must be apparent to the House that, since the Committee of 1872 had not received evidence on this subject, the House had not been in a position to give a decision upon it. That was not all. He had evidence from these teachers to show that the Committee of Council in 1847 issued a broad-sheet to be hung up in the schools containing a statement that the Committee would grant pensions to schoolmasters if they would fulfil certain conditions. He had made a great effort to get hold of one of these sheets. The distance of time, however, was so great, that he had not been able to do so, but the Committee would take it that the fact was beyond a doubt. He desired, however, to pass to the reasons why this matter, having been reconsidered in 1875, should now be reconsidered again. In 1875 the noble Viscount (Viscount Sandon) said that after the debates of 1846 it was felt that the teachers had a moral claim which it would be unwise for any Government to disregard; and Lord Advocate Gordon declared, as to its legal aspect, that he should be sorry to be obliged to argue against it. If the teachers had a moral claim, that claim could not be discharged by granting a small portion of it only. A small sum—£6,500—was put aside for that purpose, and no doubt when the grant was made it was thought that it would meet the demands of the case—the teachers then had not been so long in the service, and consequently retirements were not so numerous. How were their claims met now by the sum voted in 1875? He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman had no more unpleasant task to fulfil than to select two or three cases in every 100 deserving applicants for pensions. On the last occasion there were 70 applicants, and out of these the right hon. Gentleman was only able to grant two pensions of £30 to men who were taught at the beginning of their career to expect that they would receive two-thirds of their salary. The very fact that Lord Sandon, in granting £6,500, also relaxed the conditions under which the pensions were granted, showed that he could not have contemplated such a condition of things. He had evidently hoped to pension all those affected, or he would have increased rather than relaxed the stringency of the rules. It was necessary also clearly to state that these men had had no opportunity of saving, for there was too much belief in these days that persons appointed early in life at very small salaries, on getting the advantage of the grant of 1870 or 1872, would be able to save something. It was very desirable that provision should be made by persons saving something from their incomes rather than by looking forward to pensions; but that was no reason why the Council should not carry out the promises they had made, and meet their legal claims. How did the case stand? These teachers, on first appointment, 35 years ago, were receiving from £40 to £60 a-year, the wage of an agricultural labourer; and how was it possible for any man to keep up the position of a schoolmaster, especially if he was married and had a family, and to save anything? That brought them to the gigantic evils they had now to face. His Motion was in the interests of education at large. People who had joined an honourable profession, after 40 years, had to choose between the charity of friends and the workhouse. If they had saved nothing, the workhouse was their only resource; and if, by great self-denial, they had been able to put by a small sum, they were absolutely in a worse position than those who had not been so provident, for their chance of obtaining a pension was diminished by that fact. The right hon. Gentleman would admit that any pension in his power went to the most needy, and not to the most deserving. Almost all these men when they were married had large families, like the clergy; no doubt for the same reasons, as they married early, and brought up their families as best they could. None of those who communicated with him had less than five, and some of them as many as 15 children. Many of them in their old age were afflicted with bodily infirmities—loss of sight, of hearing, and so forth—and they were perfectly ashamed to continue in their situations; but, as he had said, they had nothing to choose except to remain or to go to the workhouse. His request was not an indefinite or vague one; it was this. From the years 1862 to 1875 the grant, small in itself, but admitted by the Committee of 1851, and again in 1875, was withheld; if that grant had been given through that period, they would not have reached their present position, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman to restore the grant for that period of 13 years. These men had been 40 years in the service; and although he knew that when a man obtained a pension he always lived a long time, still, if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to make the allowance, it would have a very considerable effect—at all events, it would mitigate the hardship for the present, and if a sum of £13,000 in all were given annually for 13 years, seeing the age of those concerned, there would be no difficulty afterwards in returning to the present grant. He did not by any means desire to increase the present charges of taxpayers any more than of the local ratepayers; he felt as bitterly as anyone the enormous amount of rates which the school boards and education in general demanded; but he would be prepared to get up in any assembly in the country, even of ratepayers, and if the case was fairly stated to them, he believed they would feel that this was a bitter grievance, and a violation of public faith, and in that sense he submitted his Motion to the House.

Mr. C. T. D. ACLAND seconded the Motion, which, he said, would not require many words from him after what had fallen from the hon. Member. The request of the teachers was very definite and precise. They did not ask for a general scheme of pensions; their request was limited to persons whose claim had already accrued, or must very shortly accrue. They asked that pensions should be granted to persons who were appointed teachers between 1846 and 1851. The total number of such teachers could be easily ascertained, and it was diminishing every year. He believed that the total number originally was 1,362, of whom 893 were males and 469 females, but that they afterwards decreased to 378, of whom 268 were males and 110 females. During the last 12 years these numbers must have fallen off still further; but he had been unable to ascertain the numbers. No doubt, the Education Department could easily give them; but he found that in 1872 only two pensioners had died out of 48, and nine other pensions had lapsed. If the right hon. Gentleman urged that what had been done was the work of Parliament, he replied by saying that the Minutes of 1846 and 1851 had just as much Parliamentary sanction and force as the Revised Code of 1861 itself. It might be said that those school teachers were not public servants in the ordinary sense; but he maintained that they were practically, to all intents and purposes, servants of the State, because, although they were employed by the managers, they were placed by the State under regulations so minute and precise that their position hardly differed, except technically, from that of servants of the State. Those who had studied the terms of the Minute and the evidence of Mr. Lingen, who drew up the Circular letter which explained and enforced the Minute, would see that the Privy Council, when it issued the Minutes of 1846 and 1851, was inspired in the first place, and mainly, by a desire for the good of the schools, and that the second consideration was the claim of the teachers on the public. The Minute of August 6, 1851, spoke of the removal of the teachers being effected in a manner consistent "with their claims on the public." So in each case their claims on the public were recognized. It might be alleged that the whole sum of £6,500, which was contemplated in the Circular of 1851, was not granted in any one year up to 1861. But, on the other hand, it should be recollected that the original offer made in the Minute of 1846 was one which contemplated pensions being given to those deserving teachers who should earn them by long and meritorious service, and whose claims could not accrue until the cessation of that service; and it was now that those claims were coming upon the public. Whether or not they were to have the £6,500 a-year for the 13 years during which the money was not paid, he thought the House might at least be asked to join in pressing for such an extension of the limited sum of £6,500 as would enable the Privy Council to meet the just claims of the teachers who entered the service during the five years between 1846 and 1851. The original grievance complained of rested entirely on the Committee of Council's interpretation of expressions used by themselves in previous years. The documents indicated a sort of feeling on the part of the Department that it was necessary to hedge—to use a colloquial phrase—as it had committed itself a little further than it was able to go, because it was said that their Lordships took powers, but did not pledge themselves that any pension should be granted as a right. The House would be able to read between the lines, and would perceive that their Lordships felt that in an unguarded moment they had not sufficiently limited the offer held out in 1846. The teachers had been induced by the offer then made either to enter the service or to remain in it on lower terms than they would have done if they had not had a right to expect a pension. Successive Vice Presidents of the Council had recognized the justice of the appeal now being made, and he believed that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) felt it strongly. He hoped that it would be admitted that the small amount of the previous Votes of the House did not afford any criterion of what ought to be the amount under the altered circumstances and the accruing claims of the present time. Considering the high moral character of those whose case he was pleading, their self-sacrificing labours, and their well-deserved influence with the rising generation, he thought the matter might be safely left in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the position of School Teachers in public Elementary Schools, appointed 1846-51, in respect of pensions, is detrimental to the best interests of education, and requires the further consideration of Her Majesty's Government."—(Mr. Brodrick.)

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that he would only intervene for a very few minutes between the House and the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), than whom no one was more competent to give an opinion upon the case now before the House; but he desired to say a few words in explanation, or addition, to what he had said in July of last year, when it fell to his lot, in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick), to press the claims of these teachers upon the House. But, in the first place, he must congratulate that hon. Member for having had an opportunity, of which he had most ably availed himself, of stating this case fully to the House. When he (Sir Henry Holland) addressed the House last year it was late at night, and many other important educational points were pressed upon the Vice President at the same time, which naturally weakened the effect of the cause for which he then pleaded. After the full statement of his hon. Friend (Mr. Brodrick), he would not, of course, go into any details; but he desired to point out how, in one respect, he had not last year done full justice to the views of the teachers. He had then frankly stated that, as regarded the strictly legal view of the case, he was not quite prepared to agree with the teachers. The language of the Minute of 1846 was, no doubt, misleading; but he was of opinion that the Committee of 1872 had placed the right construction upon it, and that there was no absolute pledge in terms on the part of the Education Department to pay pensions to all teachers who fulfilled certain conditions. He had then stated that he was not surprised at the construction which they put upon the Minute; and he now desired to state that he thought, after reading the speeches made by certain Noblemen and Members of Parliament in 1847, which had not then been brought to his notice, that they were most amply justified in the view they had taken, even though it was not strictly legal. His hon. Friend the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) had cited some of these speeches; but he desired to refer to a speech which had not been cited, but which appeared to him the strongest of all. In February, 1847, Lord Lansdowne—then, he believed, President of the Council, but, at all events, the person of all others most qualified to explain and interpret the Minute of 1846—after pointing out that there "Was no class of men better entitled to the attention and favour of Parliament than the great mass of the schoolmasters of England,"

said, with reference to this very Minute—

"It is therefore proposed that a provision, small, undoubtedly, at first, but still which will be considered a very great object as a provision, however small, for old age, shall be made for well-conducted schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, who shall be reported as having for 16 years conducted unexceptionally schools of a certain size."

It would be observed that this was an unconditional statement, except as to length of service and conduct; and that it was eminently calculated to induce teachers, and did doubtless, in fact, induce teachers, to enter the service upon the sure reliance of having pensions secured to them. Putting aside, then, the legal aspect of the case, these speeches gave the teachers an overwhelming moral and equitable claim to pensions. The Committee of 1872 evidently felt the strong nature of this claim, although these speeches were not, as far as he could make out, brought under their notice. That this feeling existed was shown by two facts. First, that an Amendment in favour of the teachers was only lost by a majority of two; and, secondly, that the Committee suggested their reappointment, with a view to their being enabled to consider and report upon various schemes of superannuation in favour of the teachers, which had been brought before them, but which they had not time to deal with. When replying to his (Sir Henry Holland's) speech last year, the Vice-President of the Council promised "to make an appeal to the Treasury;" and he felt sure that the Vice President had acted up to that promise, and had made a bond fide appeal to the Treasury. He was afraid, however, that that appeal must have failed, otherwise this debate would not have been allowed to take place, and the successful result of that appeal would have been stated. If such were the case, he and others who supported the claim of the teachers must now apply direct to the Secretary to the Treasury, whose absence he regretted, and they must endeavour by constant dropping to soften his stony heart. He would urge upon him that though Parliament was jealous, and very justly jealous, of any increase of expenditure, and especially, perhaps, of any increase in respect of the Education Department, still that Parliament would be ready to recognize any good grounds for such increase; and that there were, in this case, good grounds, public and private, for an increase to meet these pensions. The moral claim of the teachers constituted the private ground; and the public ground—namely, the promotion of education—was equally strong; for no one could doubt but that the cause of education suffered from the fact that these teachers were obliged to keep on, although incapacitated from health or age from doing the good service which, until so incapacitated, they had honestly performed. Although the schools over which they presided must necessarily to a certain extent suffer, these teachers could not retire, because, without pensions, they would have to drift into the workhouse. It was most painful to read the list of cases of teachers—some 133 in number—who were applying for annuities to the Church Benevolent Institution, on the ground of old age and ill-health. He was satisfied that the country would not grudge well-earned pensions to such teachers; and he, therefore, heartily supported the Motion now before the House.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was true that the Report of the Committee appointed in 1872 could not be construed in favour of the Motion. In 1875, however, when Mr. Whitwell brought the matter forward again, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) said that since the time of the Committee fresh evidence had come out, and that strong speeches had been made in both Houses, which it was impossible to read without admitting that the teachers had a great claim. He was quite prepared still to adhere to that statement. The original Minute on the subject said, "A pension may be granted" under certain circumstances. The question was whether "may" meant "must;" and, in the opinion of the Committee, it did not do so. When, however, he read the speeches that were delivered at the time when it was first proposed to grant pensions, the case seemed to him to assume a very different aspect. The words of Lord Lansdowne, who at the time spoke with more authority on matters of education than belonged to anyone else, excepting, perhaps, the then Prime Minister, could only be interpreted as a promise that pensions would be given to schoolmasters. An appeal was now made to the feelings of hon. Members; and it was said that it was undesirable that men and women should be compelled to continue working as schoolmasters and schoolmistresses when they arrived at an age at which they ought to retire, and that it was a great disappointment to them not to obtain the pension upon which they had counted. These were very good grounds for an appeal ad misericordiam; but there was also room for an appeal on the ground of public faith. The question was, what was the temptation that was held out to men and women to become masters and mistresses? He thought there could be very little doubt that a pension was part of the temptation. There was a much more important matter than the expenditure of public money to be considered, and that was the keeping of good faith. There was, in his opinion, an actual, positive claim on the part of masters and mistresses to whom the Motion referred to a pension under the conditions on which it was offered; and that was the reason why he spoke so strongly in 1875, and why he ventured to speak so strongly now. If they meant to keep good faith, the only question they had to consider was whether that Minute of Viscount Sandon's of £6,500 was sufficient; and he thought his hon. Friend who had brought the Motion forward had shown that it was not sufficient. He was sure all of them would feel, and that the State and their constituents—much as they might dislike the expenditure of public money—would feel, that the servants of the country ought not to be worse treated than the servants of any respectable business firm. For these reasons he most strongly supported the Motion.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that at the end of last year, and at the end of a very long night's debate, he made a promise that he would renew his appeal to the Treasury in favour of some additional aid for the purposes of pensions for teachers. The Mover of the Motion before the House had said that although he (Mr. Mundella) had made the promise, no action had been taken upon it. But the promise was made during last year, and immediately after the Recess he had communicated with the Secretary of the National Union of Elementary Teachers, and asked him to place before him a full statement of the claims of the teachers, and the arguments offered in support of them, and that statement was not sent in until the 14th of November. Since that time there had been no allotment of pensions, though the time for allotment was now at hand. There had, therefore, been no laches on his part, and no one had suffered up to now. He could assure the House that the allotment of these pensions was a very painful duty to him, as no doubt it had been to his Predecessors; whilst the number of pensions to give did not increase, the number of applicants was largely increasing. He might say that there were, in fact, no pensions to give except those created by the death of previous holders of them. At the last half-yearly allotment he had but two at his disposal, and there were over 70 applicants, all meritorious, all deserving cases. He had made his appeal to the Treasury, and had submitted the facts to his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, who, he was glad to say, had not met him in any haggling way. His hon. Friend, however, was unable to admit that the teachers had any legal claim to a pension, and that view was also supported by the evidence of Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth, Sir Ralph Lingen, and Sir Francis Stanford before the Committee in 1872. Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth had said every teacher had the same sort of claim to a pension, as every barrister had a hope of becoming Lord Chancellor. The Minute of 1846 was in itself so ambiguous as to be misleading, and although one thing might be in the minds of the framers of the Minute, another thing was in the minds of the teachers who read it; and he was bound to say he thought the latter were justified in forming a conclusion that every teacher who fulfilled the conditions of Minute had a fair claim. There certainly was everything to justify the teachers in their claim. Between 1846 and 1851 a number of teachers were attracted into the profession by the pension which was then promised; and it was not until 1851 that the Lord President of the Council became frightened at the amount which these pensions would reach, and placed the limit of £6,500 a-year on the pensions to be given. Up to the year 1851 there was, in the mind of the teachers at any rate, no limit on the amount of pensions to be paid. The Secretary to the Treasury had given this matter a good deal of consideration, and he (Mr. Mundella) was thankful to find himself in the position of being able to accede to the case laid before the House by the hon. Member. No man in the House, or out of it, would enjoy more than he the change he was about to announce, for hitherto almost every Member in the House had applied to him, and brought before him, the claims of different teachers to pensions. He had submitted to the Treasury a proposal that they should make a grant for the purpose of these pensions; but the Secretary to the Treasury replied that this claim was either a sound and fair one, or it was not. Between 1846 and 1851 there was a great influx of teachers, and any definite grant that might be made might not be sufficient to meet all the cases. Of course, he only referred to the cases of those teachers who entered the profession between 1846 and 1851. Those who came in after 1851 came in on distinct terms, and they knew that the pensions were limited to £6,500 a-year. In 1861 pensions were abolished, and there was no claim for pensions in respect of teachers who joined since that year. Their position was altogether altered. But in respect of those teachers who joined between 1846 and 1851, with the distinct understanding that they would have pensions, the Treasury would find the money to give them the pensions to which they were entitled. The teacher at the present time was not in the position of a civil servant with a fixed salary. He had a position of independence, and could make his own bargain with the school managers. His pay was greatly increased, and the prizes of the profession were far more numerous than before. He hoped that these prizes would go on increasing in number, and this they would do in proportion as the English idea of education was raised. The improvement in the salaries of teachers even in very recent years was very remarkable. Thus, in 1874 the number of teachers whose salaries were under £100 a-year was 4,300, and in 1883 the number was 5,900. In 1874 the number whose salaries were above £100 and under £200 was 3,885, and in 1883 it was 7,740. In 1874 the number whose salaries were between £200 and £300 was 251, and in 1883 it was 994. The number whose salaries in 1874 were over £300 a-year was 18, and in 1883 the number was 191. Similarly, in 1874 there were only 492 schoolmistresses whose salaries were over £100; in 1883 the number was 3,095. The position of the teachers had been a rapid and steady advance since the passing of the Education Act. It was most important that it should be so; and he hoped that teachers would, by a combination of intelligence and association, make for themselves ample provision, and would not have to come to Parliament for any assistance in their old age.

MR. J. G. TALBOT congratulated his hon. Friend the Member for West Surrey on the satisfactory result of his Motion. He wished, however, before the debate closed to understand exactly what the right hon. Gentleman had given to the teachers. He understood the concession amounted to this—that the teachers who entered between 1846 and 1851, and between 1851 and 1862, were to receive pensions, but in differing ratios. With regard to the first class, they were to have the whole of the pensions to which they were entitled—namely, two-thirds of their salaries.

MR. MUNDELLA: Oh, no, no; in accordance with the Minute of 1846.

MR. J. G. TALBOT believed that was one of the terms of the Minute of 1846.

MR. MUNDELLA: That was the maximum allowance.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Then were the teachers who entered between 1846 and 1851 to receive pensions equal to two-thirds of the emoluments they received?

MR. MUNDELLA: No.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, then he did not think the teachers had got what in the course of the debate hon. Members had been led to expect they would get, or that the teachers ought to get. Were they, then, to receive a pension the amount of which was to be determined by the right hon. Gentleman himself or his Successor in Office, and according to the circumstances of each particular case? It might be one-third or one-sixth, but in no case could it exceed two-thirds.

MR. MUNDELLA: There is a fair guide as to the rate of the pension by the 200 pensions fixed in 1851. It is impossible to give a larger pension than that given to teachers in the past.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Were they, then, to understand that the teachers in the first class—those appointed between 1846 and 1851—who had a strong Parliamentary and official claim, if they had not an absolute legal claim—were to be raised to the footing to which he now understood the remainder of that class was to be raised? The House would observe that up to this time there were a considerable number of teachers surviving who were appointed between 1846 and 1851, and very few of those teachers had received any pension at all up to this time.

MR. MUNDELLA: The hon. Gentleman forgets that there are 270 pensions running now, and those teachers have their full share.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: But of the total number a very small proportion had received that pension. He understood, however, that the whole number appointed between 1846 and 1851 were to receive a pension if they fulfilled the conditions required of them, and that the amount was to depend upon the opinion which the Vice President or his Successor formed of their services in each particular case. What was to happen, then, to the teachers appointed between 1851 and 1861? They had not so strong a claim as the former class, but they had a strong claim on the Government for pensions in their turn; and he wished to know how much they might expect to receive of the amount obtained by the right hon. Gentleman from the Treasury? What were the real facts of the case with regard to the class of pensions referred to in the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Brodrick)? Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth in 1846 made a statement on the subject, which was worthy the attention of the House. In 1846 a pamphlet was published entitled The School in its relation to the State, issued as "an explanation of the Minutes of the Committee of Council on Education, in August and December, 1846." It was generally admitted that this pamphlet was written by Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth, who was at that time Secretary of the Committee of Council. In that pamphlet he said—

“Their Lordships desired to render the profession of schoolmaster honourable by raising its character, by giving it the public recognition of impartially awarding certificates or diplomas, and by securing to well-trained or otherwise efficient masters a position of comfort during the period of their arduous labour, and the means of retirement on a pension awarded by the Government.”

There was no mention here of pensions which they themselves had subscribed for. The pamphlet goes on—

“Their Lordships have, therefore, rendered superannuation pensions accessible to masters distinguished by long and efficient services, and who, by age or by any disabling infirmity, are compelled to retire. It cannot be doubted that such arrangements will raise this profession in public estimation by increasing its efficiency and respectability.”

He would quote one more piece of evidence which was admitted to be written by Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth. In a letter dated March 11th, 1847, addressed to Mr. E. Salter, Secretary of the Manchester British Schoolmasters' Association, he said—

“I had yesterday to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, in which you inquired whether masters of the elementary schools who have not been trained in a Normal school under the inspection of the Committee of Council are admissible to the advantages offered by their Lordships' Minutes of August and December last, provided that upon the Report of Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools my Lords find such masters to be efficient and deserving. . . . I informed you also that my Lords, being desirous to offer the strongest inducements to schoolmasters and schoolmistresses to render long and efficient services to the public, had opened the prospect of a retiring pension to this class of teachers.”

He thought, if they were to haggle about the meaning of words, and to ask whether the claim was a legal or a moral one, they were pursuing a course of conduct very unworthy the House of Commons. [Mr. MUNDELLA: All that is admitted.] It was not admitted a few months ago; and if it was now admitted he did not think the right hon. Gentleman was quite candid when he quoted against his opponents the evidence of Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth before the Committee of 1872. This was not a Party question, however, and he was sorry that during a portion of the time that this iniquitous state of things had been going on—he said it with shame—a Conservative Government had been in Office. He trusted that the manner in which those teachers had been treated during those 13 years would never again be imitated in the Public Service of this country.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he thought the Treasury and the Government had acted in a fair spirit in regard to the claims of the teachers appointed before 1851. He presumed that the pensions awarded would be something like those in the Code—namely, pensions of £20, £25, or £30. He thought the Department should give pensions on the more liberal scale of £30 a-year to those teachers of old standing who entered the profession before 1851. He hoped that the Department would not, for the sake of a small annual sum, disappoint the expectations of those teachers who joined between 1851 and 1862, during which period the Vote of £6,500 was suspended.

MR. WHITLEY said, he understood that the teachers appointed before 1851 would receive pensions; but if that consumed the £6,500, he understood the teachers between 1851 and 1862 would receive no pension. What he wished to know was, how the Government proposed to deal with the teachers between 1851 and 1862? Supposing the pensions to the other teachers consumed the £6,500, were they to have pensions or not?

LODGE GEORGE HAMILTON said, he understood that the right hon. Gentleman proposed that pensions should be given up to the amount of £6,500 in each year, but that if after that allotment had been made any of the teachers appointed between 1846 and 1851 had not got a pension, then they would have a pension irrespective of the £6,500. [Mr. MUNDELLA: That is so.] He hoped the concession would be carried a little further, and that the Secretary to the Treasury would consider the claims of the teachers appointed between 1851 and 1861.

MR. COURTNEY explained that the Government were not going to make any concession which might countenance a general claim to pensions. As he understood, all were agreed in repudiating a general system of pensions. The action of the Government had reference strictly to the Minutes that had been quoted. The teacher who came in between 1846 and 1851 was entitled to appeal to the Minute of 1846, and to say—“I came in with the expectation that in certain conditions I should receive a certain pension; but subsequently the amount to be allotted to pensions was diminished, and after that for a time suspended altogether; that was in derogation of the expectation I had a right to look forward to, and so far you have wronged my moral expectation." The Government met that position by saying—"Whatever you had a moral right to look forward to shall be conceded, whatever burden may be thrown upon the Treasury." The teacher between 1851 and 1862 had the right to look forward to the chance of a succession to a pension in certain conditions, provided the total allotted to pensions did not exceed £6,500 a-year. The appeal of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) might be good as an appeal ad misericordiam, but the Government rejected it; they were only conceding those which were moral claims; and the moral claim between 1851 and 1862 was to a contingent share in £6,500. The Government restricted themselves to the full satisfaction of the moral claims. They all renounced the idea that pensions should be conceded to teachers as a class, and the Government were giving them only to those who entered the service on the faith of the Minutes; and to that extent they gave all that was demanded.

MR. BRODRICK said, he must express his acknowledgments to the House and the Government for the spirit in which his Resolution had been met, and before withdrawing it he would only ask for a further explanation as to the way in which the pensions would be distributed. When the total exceeded £6,500, would teachers appointed after 1851 have to wait till it fell again to that level, or would they compete on even terms with the teachers appointed in 1846 to 1851 for any vacant pensions in the original sum? If not, the teachers appointed in 1851 to 1862 would be in a worse position by his Motion.

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, that to the earlier class of teachers—1846 to 1851—pensions would be given in meritorious cases without regard to the total.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the pensions would be on the same scale as under the present Minute.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT wished to make a protest against the theory that there was no hope in the future for a general system of pensions for teachers. There seemed to him no serious difficulty about devising a scheme of regular insurance under State supervision, by which a fixed percentage of each annual salary should be put by. After a sufficient period of service the teacher might retire upon an annuity thus provided for, with the addition of a bonus from the State proportionate to the length of service, and perhaps to his past efficiency in the profession. This would be similar to the State assurance proposed by Prince Bismarck for Germany.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—CONVENTION BETWEEN SPAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. TOMLINSON rose to call attention to the Correspondence respecting the Commercial Convention concluded between Spain and the United States relative to the West India Trade (Commercial, No. 10, 1884), and to move—

"That, in view of the increasing difficulties placed by foreign Governments in the way of the due development of the Home and Colonial trade and commerce of the British Empire, by differential duties and bounties, it is incumbent on Her Majesty's Government to use every means for securing the adoption of the most-favoured nation principle as the basis of the commercial relations between the whole of the British Empire and foreign nations."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after Eleven o'clock.

DISPOSAL OF THE DEAD (REGULA- TIONS) BILL.—[BILL 10.]

(*Dr. Cameron, Sir Lyon Playfair, Dr.
Farquharson.*)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. CAMERON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the Bill which he had the honour to ask the House to read a second time might be briefly described as a measure for the protection of society against the concealment and destruction of evidence of homicidal crime. In no country in the world—in no civilized country—were the laws which regulated burial so devoid of anything like effective security for the detection of foul play as in our country. Of late there had been brought before the public a novel mode of disposing of the dead, in the shape of cremation, which, totally unregulated, afforded even greater facilities than burial for the concealment of deeds of violence and wrong-doing. Within 18 months no fewer than four bodies were publicly cremated in England, and a distinguished Judge had laid it down from the Bench that there was nothing whatever illegal in cremation, even when practised in the most objectionable and irregular form. Since then the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, in reply to a Question by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), expressed his individual dislike to the practice, and stated that he would exercise whatever power the law placed in his hands for the purpose of its prevention; but since the right hon. and learned Gentleman made that announcement another body had been publicly cremated, and he did nothing to prevent, and had done nothing to punish the perpetrators, of that act—an act which in that case, as everybody must admit, was contrary to public decorum and decency.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Where, where?

DR. CAMERON: In Wales.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That was before my answer to the hon. Member for Northampton.

DR. CAMERON: No; it was attempted before, but it was done after the declaration of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. His inaction must, therefore, if he were aware of the fact and of the statement of law laid down by Mr. Justice Stephen, be accepted as a practical endorsement of the statement of the law laid down by that Judge, and a practical confession of his utter powerlessness to interfere in the matter. The object of this Bill was to afford something like a proper guarantee for the treatment and prevention of foul play in cases where the dead were disposed of by burial, and to provide for the regulation of cremation, which, uncontrolled as it was at present, was fraught with danger to the public, but which, under proper regulations, the promoters of this Bill believed afforded a chance of effecting a most desirable reform in the mode of disposing of those hundreds of thousands of dead bodies, which the harvest of death each year threw upon our hands. Their Burial Laws provided an elaborate machinery and certificates, and most people were content to imagine that they provided every precaution that could be required or provided; but anyone who looked into them would find it was an utter delusion to suppose that those laws provided adequate securities for the ascertainment of the cause of death or for the detection of foul play. Large numbers of people in this country died without having had any medical attendance whatever. Sometimes they received as much as was necessary to procure a worthless certificate; but many thousands were buried without the formality of any certificate at all as to the cause of death. The attention of the public and of the Government had been repeatedly drawn to this subject. So far back as 1843, Mr. Chadwick, in his Supplementary Report on Intramural Burial, dwelt on the necessity for the amendment of their Burial Laws; but nothing had been done. In 1851, in their Report on Extra-mural Sepulture, the Board of Health reported on certain defects in the present system of the registration of death, and the facilities consequently afforded for the perpetration of crime, to which they said their attention had been called by numerous witnesses of all classes. The Report of the Board of Health on Extra-mural Sepulture, published in the previous year, 1850, drew attention to the fact that, although the number of still-born infants at that time was estimated at 40,000, there was no provision whatever with regard to their burial; and only in one cemetery reported on in 1850 was there any rule requiring the production of any certificate that the child was still-born. The child alleged to be still-born was, without a certificate, and for a small fee of 1s. 6d. or 2s. handed to the sexton, interred without as much as an entry in the cemetery books. The law had been amended in this respect; but it was still very unsatisfactory in others, and the Returns of the Registrar General showed that in the last year for which his statistics had been prepared and presented to the House there occurred in England and Wales alone no fewer than 20,194 deaths in which persons were buried without any medical or other certificate as to the cause of death. That fact pointed to gross neglect. He found that in Ireland there occurred 2,229 cases in which death was certified after inquest, and 4,289 cases were entered in which the cause of death was ill-defined or not specified. In Scotland the state of matters was a great deal worse. According to the last Report of the Registrar General in Scotland, 20 per cent of all the deaths that occurred in that country were not certified. This, he was aware, involved an exaggeration, the result of the manner in which the Returns were made up; but in Glasgow, in 1882, 9 per cent of the total number of persons who died were buried without any certificate whatever as to the cause of death; in 1872-3, out of a total of 29,200 deaths that occurred in Glasgow during those two years, no fewer than 3,281 were either buried without any medical certificate as to cause of death, or were entered as without any medical attendance. A most remarkable fact brought out by their most painstaking medical officer of health, Dr. Russell, was that of legitimate children under five years only 28 per cent were uncertified, while among illegitimate no fewer than 52 per cent of the deaths were uncertified. In Scotland that state of matters was made worse by the fact that they had no Coroners, and the Procurorator Fiscal would not look into any case, however mysterious the cause of death might be, unless he believed death had resulted from some criminal act. There was no family in Scotland who would not look upon an attempt by the Procurator Fiscal to view a body in a private house as tantamount to a charge of murder. The matter was brought under the notice of the Government 40 years ago by Mr. Edwin Chadwick in the Report to which he had before referred, and which contained extracts from the evidence of such well-known men as Dr. Scott Alison, Mr. William Chambers, and Mr. Hill Burton, the historian, which showed the scandalously lax nature of the Scottish law as to the verification of the cause of death and the investigation of mysterious and suspicious occurrences. Those opinions showed the thoroughly unsatisfactory state of our law as regarded the verification of the cause of death incident to burial. It was a popular delusion that the detection of poison by exhumation was always possible. It was perfectly true that fractured bones remained to testify to deeds of violence for a number of years; but putrefication speedily set in to destroy the softer tissues. Certain poisons might be discovered in the bodies of persons buried for months and years after burial; but the subtle organic vegetable poisons, and even some non-organic poisons, such as phosphorus, participated in the decay of the victim, and consequently could not be traced. Moreover, modern scientific research had shown that putrefaction in fermentation in animal matter gave rise to sepsine and other alkaloids of a poisonous nature. It was necessary to be very cautious about forming a conclusion from physiological tests as to the presence of poison in a body. The fact that animals died after the administration of substances extracted from the viscera of persons exhumed in a state of putrefaction did not prove that the viscera contained poison before putrefaction set in. Taking these facts into consideration, the supreme importance attached to a prompt verification of the cause of death was apparent; and in France, Germany, and other countries its importance was recognized by the existence of the official known as le médecin vérificateur. It had been recommended by the Board of Health in this country that health officers should attend in all private houses, verify the cause of death of an inmate, and report any suspicious circumstance to the public authorities. This, however, would be too expensive and inquisitorial a system if universally applied; and he, therefore, proposed that it should only be resorted to in cases in which no certificate of death was produced. If everything was correct, the burial officer would certify to that effect; if not, the case would be reported to the Coroner in England and Ireland, and the Procurator Fiscal in Scotland, officers whom he did not desire to supersede. As such a system, however, might cause delay in burials in rural districts, he thought that such districts might, for the present at any rate, be exempted from its operation. He did not say the Bill met all the shortcomings of our wretched Burial Laws; but he claimed it would be a step in the direction in which reform was most urgently required, and which might be met by existing machinery without offending popular susceptibilities. Now, he came to the proposals in his Bill which dealt with the subject of cremation; and, that being a novel method of disposing of the dead in this country, he felt himself at liberty to suggest precautions which would be intolerable in the case of the old-established custom of burial, and which would afford a security for the detection of foul play infinitely superior to anything which it would be possible to engraft upon the slovenly system of their Burial Laws. At the present moment cremation in this country was absolutely uncontrolled, except so far as it might give rise to a nuisance, or lead to a disturbance of the public peace. There was no regulation of it, no certificate was required, and consequently it might be performed in any place and by any person. Captain Hanham, for example, cremated his mother and his wife in his private grounds in Dorset; and he himself, when he died, was cremated in the same place by his friends. Dr. Price, the so-called Welsh Druid, cremated his child on an open fire on a Welsh mountain; and he had announced his readiness to undertake the same duty for any other person. The English Cremation Society had erected a crematorium at Woking. That Society had hitherto abstained from commencing active operations, owing to the uncertainty of the law on the subject, and to the attitude taken up by the Home Office. But it had now announced that, in consequence of the judgment of Mr. Justice Stephen, it was prepared to undertake the cremation of any body sent to it. The Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers had appointed a Committee to consider the propriety of erecting a crematorium at Ilford. Now, though he had not the smallest doubt, from the constitution of the Cremation Society of England, which embraced amongst its members some of the most eminent men in the Legal and Medical Professions, that any cremations undertaken by it would be conducted with the most perfect regard to public security and decorum; and though, if the Commissioners of Sewers erected their crematorium at Ilford, the same remark would apply to any cremations conducted under their auspices—these bodies would be the first to admit that it was impolitic to intrust absolute discretion in a matter of such importance to any society or irresponsible body of men, and still more to any eccentric individual like Mr. Price, or even to more intelligent enthusiasts like the friends of Captain Hanham. He (Dr. Cameron) proposed, therefore, that the Secretary of State should license places to be used as crematoria, and that it should be an offence punishable by heavy penalties to burn a body in any place not licensed for the purpose. He proposed that no cremation should be allowed without a special permit from the registrar of deaths, to be granted only on the production of a medical certificate given by the personal attendants on the case, or after a post mortem examination, and given under heavy penalties in case of any false statement, to the effect that death had resulted from natural causes, and that there was no doubt on the point that the cause of death was so and so, and that there was no reason whatever to suspect that it had been accelerated or caused by any criminal act. In addition to this, he proposed that the Home Secretary should be empowered—if the right hon. Gentleman did not covet the duty he was sure some of his Colleagues who had not very much to do might be found to take it off his hands—the Judge Advocate General, for example, who had shown a natural talent in that direction, might possibly be induced to undertake it—to frame regulations. These regulations would naturally deal with such subjects as the prevention of anything like precipitancy or indecorum in the conduct of cremations. He thought they might very properly also provide for the investigation, by some independent official, of every case in which cremation was asked. He thought that in cases where cremation was desired we might very safely introduce something analogous to the Continental system of médecins vérificateurs. The official might inquire in the circumstances of the case, and might be empowered, in case of anything suspicious transpiring, to suspend the disposal of the body temporarily until an examination had been made. Now, there was not the smallest difficulty, from a medico-legal point of view, in making cremation infinitely safer, so far as public security was concerned, than anything that was found under our present Burial Laws, even with any improvements which it would be possible to engraft upon them. There only remained, therefore, he thought, to discuss the policy which should guide the Government in dealing with the subject. It might be dealt with in three ways. It might be regulated, or the law on the subject might be left as it was, or it might be prohibited altogether. The arguments against leaving the law as it stood, in his mind, appeared to be insurmountably strong. The legality of cremation did not rest solely upon the judgment of Sir James Stephen, for the opinions of the highest authorities in the possession of the Cremation Society had been given to the same effect. In his judgment in the case of "Williams v. Williams," Mr. Justice Cave inferentially admitted the legality of cremation; and in their correspondence with the Cremation Society two successive Home Secretaries had not ventured to assert that cremation was illegal. One of them proposed, in certain circumstances, to introduce a Bill making it illegal; and that showed that in his mind there was nothing at present illegal in it. Nor was the legalization of it a matter of recent date. As it was legal now, so it was in the last century, when, in 1769, the body of Mrs. Pratt was cremated at Tyburn Cemetery. But the fact of the legality was now universally known; and there was nothing to prevent any criminal who thought he might get rid of evidence of a crime from availing himself of it. Especially was this the case with the crime of infanticide; whereas, in a case recently reported at Scarborough, it had always been a common practice of murderers to get rid of the bodies of their victims by burning them in domestic fire-places. It seemed, to his mind, needless to contend further as to the inexpediency of leaving the law as it stood. The question was, therefore, whether the practice should be regulated or prohibited altogether? To regulate cremation would be to follow in the steps of every civilized nation that had hitherto dealt with the subject. To prohibit it, in his opinion, would be to take a reactionary step, one fraught with total disregard of the teachings of sanitary science and of the sacredness of individual liberty; and which would mark us as the least enlightened, as regarded the problem of how best to dispose of our dead, of all the great countries of the world. Cremation was legal in the United States of America, and in many of the large towns there crematoria had been erected. It was legal in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. A public crematorium was in 1874 erected by the Municipality of Vienna; and the Municipality of Lisbon, where cremation was optional, had decreed that during epidemics cremation should be compulsory. In France an order had been given to cremate the remains of hospital patients which had been dissected; and he had a Bill there, which was interesting as having been the last of M. Gambetta before the French Chamber of Deputies, proposing to render cremation generally optional in France. Now, wherever the subject of cremation had been discussed an overwhelming consensus of scientific opinion had been in its favour. As to the Home Secretary's statement that cremation was repugnant to public opinion in this country, he could only say that during the last few months the subject had been very largely and widely discussed in the Press of this country; and, so far as public opinion was reflected in the Press from The Times down to Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper, it had been almost unanimously expressed in support of optional cremation. He did not mean to say that if this Bill became law, and crematoria were established to-morrow, that there would be any great general rush to get cremated. Public opinion was too strong for it to become general all at once; but of this he felt certain—that the great majority of the enlightened and intelligent portion of the community were sufficiently alive to the dangers of our present system of

burial, and desired to see those dangers lessened by allowing a free option for anyone who wished to dispose of his body in a sanitary way; and as to the poor, they had good reason to know the hideous scandal and indecency to which the present system of burial condemned them, and he was certain that a vast number of them would rejoice at anything which would tend in any degree to diminish the overcrowding which condemned those dearest to them to the nameless horrors of putrefaction in a common grave. But, even if only a small majority were desirous of escaping the horrors of the grave, why should they be forbidden to carry out their desire? On what grounds, in a matter where public policy pointed all the other way, were they justified in allowing a particular interpretation of public sentiment to override the sacred principle of individual liberty. The other day he had a letter from a lady residing in a fashionable part of London, who said that to her death would be deprived of half its terrors if she could be cremated instead of being buried, and it was in consequence of a similar sentiment expressed by his mother that Captain Hanham overcame all obstacles and cremated her. Why should they interfere with such a preference. On every ground of policy it would be most rational to prohibit burial rather than cremation. Thirty years ago the Board of Health, in a Report bristling with horrors, emphatically condemned the existing state of things, and they made the heroic proposal to take possession of all burial grounds and establish national cemeteries. It might be said that Burial Boards had been established and large public cemeteries opened since then. But large cemeteries existed then, too; and the Board of Health reported that, being conducted on purely commercial principles, burying as many people as possible in the smallest area, they did more harm than good. They stated that even when they wrote almost all the existing large cemeteries in London were already closely approached by the habitations of the living, the outer boundary line in some cases, as that of Norwood, being separated from the dwelling houses by scarcely more than the width of a street. The Board of Health based their recommendation not merely upon that, but upon the nature of the present system, which demoralized the poor by consigning them by scores and hundreds to festering pits described by the Board of Health, and which he had seen himself, with hardly enough earth to cover the coffins. The Report was published very shortly after the outbreak of the great cholera epidemic, and the Board of Health stated that in many instances outbreaks of cholera occurred in consequence of the proximity of inhabited districts to those burial grounds; and if anybody examined the Report in detail it would be found they had only too good grounds for making the assertion. At the time that Report was issued it might have been said that, however plausible the alleged connection of cause and effect between burying grounds and outbreaks of cholera and other epidemics might be, science could show no demonstration of it. But of late years that defect in the argument had been amply supplied, and scientific men all over the world had proved satisfactorily that that connection did exist. It had been proved that many, if not all, zymotic diseases were due to the invasion of the system by minute microscopic organisms which multiplied themselves in the blood and tissues, and gave rise to those disturbances which constituted the phenomena of each disease. It had been shown that buried in earth the spores or seeds of their organisms retained their vitality for an indefinite period, and that, if brought to the surface by the spade or through the agency of earthworms, they might find their way into the food we ate and the water we drank, and within our bodies once more renew the pestilential cycle of their existence. In medical literature many instances were recorded where outbursts of plague occurred through opening ground where patients had been buried; and in this Report and elsewhere there was ample proof of the potency of earth to preserve and spread the infections of many other diseases. M. Pasteur had recently shown in a most conclusive manner that whole districts in France had been poisoned by splenic fever owing to the burial of animals that had died of disease. The germs of disease were brought to the herbage by earthworms, and found their way into the watercourses; and scientific agriculturists of France were now discussing whether the bodies of animals ought to be disposed of by burning, or whether they might not be rendered innocuous and converted into a manure by destruction in sulphuric acid. The same with regard to yellow fever. A Commission had been recently appointed in Brazil to inquire into the nature of that disease, and that Commission had reported that it, too, was due to one of these organisms, which, under suitable conditions of temperature and moisture, was capable of multiplying itself in earth, and that churchyards in which yellow-fever patients were buried were literally hot-beds for the spread of the disease. If they took the earth from a graveyard where yellow-fever patients had been buried and washed it with water, the water would wash out a sufficient number of the organisms to convey the disease to healthy animals. Cholera was a disease with which in this country they were more concerned than with yellow fever. They had all heard of the recent discourses regarding that disease made by Dr. Koch's Commission. These showed that cholera also was caused by the invasion of the system by another of the organisms to which he had referred. Dr. Koch had shown that if matter impregnated with cholera organisms was spread upon moist earth these organisms rapidly multiply under favourable conditions of temperature; and that would explain the connection which the Board of Health had told them they had found to exist between cemeteries or graveyards and outbreaks of cholera epidemics. Professor Tyndall published a letter during the cholera scare in The Daily News, calling attention to the way in which Bristol was preserved from an attack of that disease in 1876. On the occurrence of a case of cholera there every precaution was taken. The dead body of the man who died was embedded in M'Dougal's powder in his coffin, and in this way the germs were burned and destroyed almost as effectually as they would have been destroyed had the body been cremated. If you locked up a body swarming with choleraic organisms in a lead coffin, so long as it remained there the living were free from all danger from it; but if you put the body in a wicker coffin, as in the "earth to earth" system, you allowed every facility for those organisms of disease to be conveyed into the earth and watercourses, and so afforded means for spreading disease. The only link in the chain of the argument which was wanting was, how did these organisms find their way into the watercourses and spread the diseases?

Well, there was no secret in the matter. To anyone who knew anything about graveyards and cemeteries, it was needless to say that many of them were very badly drained, and that coffins in many cases lay soaked with water. Dr. Mapother, a well-known scientific gentleman in Ireland, had described the churchyards there as being generally situate on high eminences, in such a manner that the drainage from them percolated into the surrounding wells from which the residents in the various districts obtained their water supply; and the same gentleman also described one churchyard with which he was acquainted as situate upon the banks of a river from which some 30,000 or 40,000 persons drew their water supply. Again, in 1874, in consequence of some irregularities in the neighbourhood, an investigation was made into the case of the cemetery at Tooting; and it then transpired that the entire drainage from that cemetery went into a brook which flowed into the River Wandle, from which a large number of persons drew their water supply. And the same was the case with the Finchley Cemetery. Numbers of cemeteries and churchyards drained into the Thames; and he thought that would be an interesting Return which showed the number of graveyards in the Valley of the Thames which drained into the waters of that river before these waters were supplied to the inhabitants of London for drinking purposes. The only rational objection to the process of cremation was the medico-legal one. So far as the destruction of evidence of crime by cremation was concerned, that was simply and solely a question of degree. It had been shown by direct experiment that mineral poisons, such as salts of copper, zinc, &c., could be perfectly well detected in the ashes of animals poisoned by those drugs when they had been cremated. And as to vegetable poisons, the traces of most, if not of all, of them were destroyed more or less quickly by the putrefactive action of dead bodies; and if they wanted to insure the detection of vegetable poisons, they must take steps to secure what they had not at present—namely, prompt verification of the cause of death. Under the system of cremation which he proposed they would have an infinitely better chance of securing prompt verification of the cause of death than under any of the Burial Laws at present existing. So long as they allowed 20,000 to die annually and be buried in England and Wales without taking the trouble to demand any evidence whatever as to the cause of their death, although they had died under circumstances of the grossest neglect, and often under circumstances provocative of suspicion, it was absurd to argue against cremation that it might be abused as a means of doing away with the evidences of illegal causes of death. As to the skilful poisoner, it was childish to think of baffling him by preventing cremation, so long as they allowed him to remove the viscera of his victim, under pretence of embalming the body, or to deport it from this country, in order to bury or burn it outside our control, in some German or Italian crematorium. He would only add in conclusion that, in a letter written from the Home Office on this subject in February, 1882, the following sentence occurred:—

“In Sir William Harcourt's opinion, the practice of cremation ought not to be sanctioned, except under the authority and regulation of an Act of Parliament.”

On that point he was entirely at one with the Home Secretary; and for the purpose of giving effect to his and the right hon. and learned Gentleman's views on the subject he had introduced this Bill. He therefore begged to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Dr. FARQUHARSON, in seconding the Motion, said, he had been a convert to cremation ever since he had attended the hospital and dissecting-room. He thought that, whatever conclusion the House might come to on the question, there could be no doubt it was one well worthy of its consideration. His hon. Friend had made out an impregnable case. He had shown them the dangers connected with the existing mode of disposing of the dead, and he had shown them how those dangers could be removed. This was a question of very great importance in all large and growing communities in England, where, in conjunction with Wales, there were 500,000 deaths annually. It was quite obvious that these bodies must be destroyed in some way, which simply meant their resolution into their natural elements; and it seemed to him that common sense would most naturally be in favour of the quickest process of destruction. The system of burial now carried on in this country was one which impeded, in many essential ways, this process of destruction, which ought to be quick. The process, under existing circumstances, lasted from 25 to 40, or even 50 years; whereas the process of burning might be efficiently done in less than one hour. They were all aware of the unsanitary evils which had arisen from the burial of corpses in large towns. These were recognized 20 years ago, when intra-mural interment of dead bodies was prohibited. It was calculated that London doubled its population in 50 years, so that those parts which now formed part of the suburbs would in half a century become part of the interior of the City; and they knew, further, that the air around those graveyards was laden with morbid matter, and that, as a consequence, the health of persons resident in the neighbourhood suffered, and that through their weakened state of health the inhabitants of such districts were more liable to become victims on the outbreak of epidemics than those of the healthier surroundings. The practice of cremation had been described as revolting, illegal, un-Christian, &c.; but he thought his hon. Friend had shown how important that system of destruction really was. They had heard of the dangers of the present system of burial. These dangers were bad enough in the country; but they must be specially concentrated in the commercial undertakings in London which were known as cemeteries. They knew that great overcrowding took place there. There were 20 or 30 persons put into one grave, with only a nominal piece of ground between each. If a person was not rich his grave was opened in 12 years, the bones were thrown into some adjoining field, or used for manure, or ground down, or sold to a bone merchant for what they would bring. Sentiment was rather on the side of the advocates of cremation than otherwise. They had naturally some feeling as to where they should lie; and the pictures that they saw of the old churchyard, with its mouldering monuments lighted up with evening sun or moonlight, gave expression to a very proper sentiment; but if we could take a look below the ground and see what was going on there—see the horrible and loathsome appearance of the bodies—he thought the charm of the sentiment would somewhat disappear. Even granting to the full the poetical associations of a rural graveyard, how many of us could expect to be buried under such conditions? Most of us must necessarily be interred in large suburban cemeteries, and there certainly was nothing poetical about such a burial. They were carried to a place where they had never been before, a service was conducted by a person whom they had never seen in their lives, and in a very perfunctory manner, and eventually horrible desecration of the graves took place, and the remains were flung away. He invited the House to contrast that with what the process of cremation would be. The body would be taken to the crematorium, part of the service would be said, the body would then be lowered, and the process of burning would go on for about an hour. The ashes would then be removed, and the rest of the service could be said. The ashes could be put away in any way that the relations liked. They might be buried in the ordinary way; or, better still, following the old custom of the Romans, they might be put into a monumental urn and placed in the crypt of the church. The operation of cremation could be carried on with perfect decency. He had been present, along with Sir Spencer Wells, at the cremation of a horse; no one could have known that anything particular was going on; there was not a trace of smoke, and there was no smell; and the ashes which remained were white, and extremely pleasant looking. He did not know whether he would be in Order in showing the House what they were like. [Here the hon. Member produced, and held up for the inspection of the House, a small bottle filled with a white powder, which, he explained, were the ashes, not of the identical horse that he had seen cremated, but of a cow cremated some time before under precisely similar conditions.] It was cremated in one hour, and the ashes had an appearance not unlike frosted silver. He believed that the sentimental argument would be entirely in favour of cremation. To borrow an expression used by Sir Spencer Wells, it was a question of purification versus putrefaction. From the point of view of crime, Sir Henry Thompson had pointed out that in doubtful cases the stomach and portions of the liver might be preserved, and it had been shown that a great many metals might be readily detected in the ashes. If this discussion had no other outcome than to show that the precautions now taken against poisoning in this country were extremely lax, he did not think that day's Morning Sitting would be thrown away. About 500,000 people died annually in England and Wales, and about 80,000 died in London. These bodies must be got rid of in some way without offence to the living. They must be buried out of sight and destroyed. It was calculated that if one body occupied each grave, it would require an acre for 1,200 persons. Therefore it was necessary to take every year from the area of land 500 acres. The country could not afford to give away so much land. Cremation was quick, clean, cheaper than burial, and more harmless to the surrounding population. Bodies could be cremated for less than 15s., while an ordinary burial did not cost much less than £10. The nation, he believed, was coming round in favour of cremation; many of the clergy advocated it; some of the Bishops were tending that way. In Italy, Germany, and even Japan, cremation was not only legal, but it was tolerably extensively adopted. All that was asked was that persons should be allowed to be cremated if they liked; this was a purely permissive Bill. He prophesied that before another generation passed away this process of disposing of the dead would be universally employed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Cameron.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I have listened with great interest to the very able and moderate speeches of my hon. Friends who have brought forward this Bill. They must excuse me for making a criticism on those speeches; and it is that those speeches have really no relation, or very little relation, to the Bill, and that, if the main propositions of those speeches are to be accepted, this Bill ought not to be read the second time. That is rather a broad statement, but I will endeavour to justify it. Hon. Gentlemen who have listened to those two speeches will agree with me that they involve two main propositions. The first of those propositions is that the present Burial Laws are extremely defective in not providing against the improper dealing with dead human bodies, and that fair and adequate provision should be made in that respect. The second proposition is that the present method of disposing of such bodies is so injurious to the health of the public, and, as the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) thought, the consequences of following that method are so alarming, that some other method of disposing of human bodies should be adopted. If those two propositions had been established, what should we have expected the character of this Bill to be? Why, we should have expected that it would have provided for the universal examination of human bodies before they were buried, and for the universal burning of all bodies. But the Bill provides for neither of these things, and why? My hon. Friend, being a man of experience and prudence, knows that a Bill to effect those objects would be totally and entirely impracticable. For my own part, I believe that great defects do exist in the Burial Laws of England with reference to certificates of death. Recent circumstances have brought the subject of these laws particularly under my notice, and during the last few weeks I have been examining most anxiously the operation of those laws in connection with the crimes which were lately committed in Liverpool. I was certainly astonished to hear so great a scientific authority as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow say that it was only ignorant people who supposed that poisons could be detected in the human body for a long period after death.

DR. CAMERON: I did not say that. The right hon. and learned Gentleman must have misunderstood me.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member said that a great many persons disappeared, and that the existence of mineral poisons could be detected with equal certainty in the case of bodies cremated as in the case of bodies buried. I myself have only dabbled a very little in science; but I was surprised to hear that the presence of arsenic could be detected in the case of cremated bodies, because I have always understood that arsenic was sublimated by heat. It must be recollected that poisoning by arsenic is one of the commonest things in the world. [Laughter.] Those hon. Members who laugh do not know as much as I do on the subject.

DR. CAMERON: What I said was, that direct experiments had shown that arsenic was found in the ashes after cremation.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am bound to take my hon. Friend's authority; but I had always supposed that fire sublimated arsenic. With reference to the present mode of granting certificates of the cause of death, I think that much greater caution should be exercised in the granting of these certificates than is the case at present; and I shall be exceedingly glad to see some well-considered measure, having for its object the amendment of the present law on this part of the subject, introduced. But this Bill contains no provisions that will strengthen the law on that point. First of all, it admits the ordinary certificate, which we know is most carelessly given in many cases. It is only where an ordinary certificate is not given that another certificate is substituted. And then there is the extraordinary proposition that the provisions of this Bill are not to apply to any place except where the population is under 5,000. If we are going to have a measure to remedy that defect, it will not be a measure like this. What was the use of taking precaution against poisoning illegitimate children, or improperly making away with them, and then to exclude from its operation the whole of the rural districts? It was impossible that Parliament could accept a measure so framed on a subject like that. One of the difficulties which my hon. Friend has felt is—where are you to get the people to make the examination? He invokes the aid of the central officer of health, who is to make the necessary examination for a fee of 5s.—that is to say, that this officer is to be expected to make a perfect analysis of a human body for 5s. In the course of events the Home Office has had occasion, in particular cases, to direct the analytical examination of human bodies; this requires the highest qualities of science, and a most difficult and expensive matter they have always found it to be. In a country village, however, it would be a simple impossibility to obtain anything like such an examination that would be satisfactory or of the slightest real advantage. The hon. Member, however, has said that these examinations would only be necessary in cases of suspicion. But in most instances the suspicion does not arise at the moment of death. In many of the cases with which the Criminal Courts have had to deal, suspicion has not arisen until months after the death, and in such cases the Bill would afford no security whatever. Therefore, as far as this part of the Bill is concerned, what I have to say is this—that I do not dispute that the present system of interment is unsatisfactory, and that I do not say that greater precautions ought not to be taken, but that the first three clauses of the Bill are utterly inadequate to meet the evil to which the hon. Member has referred. But these clauses, which are intended to effect the reform of our system of registration, and of the granting of certificates, are merely supplementary to the main feature of the Bill, which is that which relates to cremation. Upon this subject I must entreat the indulgence of the enlightened while I endeavour to state why I am not in favour of the proposal contained in this part of the Bill. We all know that the enlightened are not very tolerant of the vulgar; but I may tell the enlightened that it is the vulgar who form the majority of mankind. It is quite true that the law of England on the subject of burial is very defective, and is practically indefensible; but still we must remember that it is only in very modern times that England has become so very enlightened. In former times there used to be a very commonplace quality with which we used to get on very well—that of common sense—which had its peculiar laws and habits which were adapted to inferior capacities; and when those laws and habits came to be subjected to the searching tests of philosophy and enlightenment it was found that a great many holes could be found in them. It is now said that it had been discovered that it is not illegal to cremate human bodies, and to cremate, being legal, entitles it to being authorized and regulated. That may be so; but the same assertion applies equally to many other methods of disposing of dead bodies. It is true that the judgment of Mr. Justice Stephen states that there is nothing illegal in cremation; but equally there is nothing illegal that I know of in cannibalism. That is a proposition perfectly clear. I have read the judgment of Mr. Justice Stephen on the question this morning, and it certainly goes to that extent, because it declares that there is nothing in the law which requires that a dead body should be disposed of in any particular way; and therefore to allege that this judgment is a judgment inferentially in favour of cremation is as unfair a use of it as it would be to import it as a judgment in favour of cannibalism, or any other method of disposing of the human frame. All that it says is that the law is practically silent upon the subject. But what I say is that the common usage, the common sentiment, and the common feeling on this subject has been so strong hitherto that it has been unnecessary that any particular provision should be made with regard to it. That is the real history of the law on this question. Then we come to the proposition of the hon. Member. He says that we must regulate cremation because the people of the country desire to be cremated. He challenged me for saying that public sentiment was not in favour of cremation, and asked where I found the grounds for arriving at that opinion. He says he has read all the newspapers—I have not time to do that—and that they are all in favour of cremation. Then, when he comes to the point, he admits that people would not rush to be cremated; and I cannot help thinking his study of the subject has brought him to very much the same conclusion as I had arrived at. My hon. Friend is a courageous man; he is a logical man, which is the quality of his countrymen. I observe the two promoters of this Bill are both from Scotland, and I believe its ablest supporter represents a Scottish University where we know that science has developed more than anywhere else, more particularly the science of logic; but with all his courage and ability the hon. Member has a great power to work against—namely, the experience and the sentiment of mankind almost from the earliest period of history. The most enlightened, the most civilized, and the most refined nation of antiquity—that of Greece—did not burn their dead. It is true that in Homer descriptions may be found of the burning of the dead in pre-historic times, and I doubt whether the universal proposition laid down by Wachsmuth, that the Greeks never burned their dead, can be supported. I think that that proposition is too wide—indeed, Socrates speaks of both manners of disposing of the dead. The Greeks, however, did not adopt burning as a general practice. The Greeks followed the method which we have adopted in more recent periods. They forbade burials within cities, and they insisted on extra-mural interments. Then as to the Romans. With regard to the Romans, no doubt, burning was in the time of the Empire adopted. It was not the usual practice of the Romans in the time of the Republic. I remember that Sylla was the first of his family—the first of the Cornelian Gens—who was burnt, and he caused himself to be burnt, in order that he might not be served as he had served his great rival, Marius, whom he had dug up after burial. That pretty well fixes what the practice was at that particular time. No doubt after that time burning was largely adopted by the Romans, and that for two or three centuries they burnt their dead; but there were some curious exceptions. When a man was struck by lightning he was supposed to be sanctified by the stroke; and I remember the fine phrase of Mr. Canning, referring to King George III. in the decay of his age. He spoke of him as "Scathed by Heaven's lightning, but consecrated as much as blasted by the blow." The Romans also buried in the case of infants whose teeth had not been out. But they often used burial very frequently otherwise. The word sepulcrum applies both to burial and burning. We have all seen a sarcophagus. We have seen the memorials of Roman remains in England. They may be seen in the Museum at York and other places, and actually so perfect that the imprint of the mortuary cloth may be traced upon the covering of the dead. Therefore it is clear that burning was not the universal practice of even Imperial Rome; but that burial was used as well. Therefore, if you look to the history of mankind—and, after all, mankind had some wisdom even before we were born—if you look back 2,000 years, how small a space of that period it is during which the civilized world adopted this method of disposing of its dead. Why, it would not be two or three centuries out of 20 centuries of Christianity that the practice of burning prevailed. For 18 centuries, it may be said, indeed, to have been rejected by the opinion of civilized Europe. Did I say 18 centuries? I should have said 15 centuries, for the Roman influence prevailed for about three or four centuries. Now, it may be said in these enlightened times that there was prejudice connected with religious ideas; but that is not the cause why the present system has endured. My hon. Friend referred to the practice on the Continent of Europe. There was a time when France was not under the influence of religious prejudice. When the Goddess of Reason was installed in Paris there was no ground why the religious influence should prevail, and why cremation should not have been adopted. But it was not adopted in France. My hon. Friend referred to a Bill by M. Gambetta which might have been passed; but I gather from him that cremation at the present moment is illegal in France. But if that is so, it is not under the predominant influence of religious prejudice. No, Sir; it is not religious prejudice. It is a prejudice, if you please. I would call it a sentiment founded upon the sympathy, in my opinion, of mankind. At all events, my hon. Friend must go a great deal further before he can establish anything like a consensus of opinion in favour of the system he advocates. He has told us that there are crematoria established in various places; but he has not told us what use is made of them. That is very important. If he could show us that in those countries where they are established use is made of them by millions of people, by thousands and tens of thousands of cases, we might think that it was insular prejudice, and that there was a public sentiment in favour of its being universally employed. That would have advanced his argument. But he quoted nothing in that way worth speaking of. There is only one great authority I can find which he has actually converted, and that is the Commissioners of Sewers of the Corporation of London. Well, the Corporation of London is a body of advanced opinions. They had a Bill the other day dealing with the water supply. Now they are going to dispose of human bodies, and they are going to establish a great crematorium at Ilford. Whether they are building for themselves a great funeral pyre to dispose of the Corporation it is not for me to say; but perhaps they desire that their death should not be like that of other men, and that they should vanish in a fiery chariot. But as to this new method, I cannot accept even the authority of the Commissioners of Sewers against the general opinion of the world of the practice of collective ages. The question is, what is the character of the evils made out, and what are the methods to deal with it? Now, my hon. Friend read largely from the Reports of the Commissioners of Health; and I gathered from him that they were the Reports in The Times. He referred to Mr. Edwin Chadwick, who took a great interest in public health. This was many years ago. A great deal has been done in the reform of burial since then in regard to burials in crowded populations and matters of that kind. Instead of having them in the City of London and in the midst of crowded populations, you have burials at Woking and other cemeteries. My hon. Friend (Dr. Farquharson) is afraid that the soil of England will be exhausted by burial grounds. We have not come to that yet. They are hardly so extensive as deer forests at the present time, and therefore I do not think that is an argument. I once saw a remarkable statement that the whole population of the globe could stand on the Isle of Wight; giving each man a yard square to stand on. Well, if you lay him down a yard square would equally accommodate him; and if you come to dispose of the population of the globe in that way, I do not think territorial earth hunger is an argument which will conclude this question. I look on this matter, as I said before, as one of the unenlightened. I know that to-morrow, for the remarks I have made, I shall be denounced as a Philistine, and that the philosophers will do me to death. I always sympathized a good deal with the Philistines, and I always thought that the strong man was very hard upon them, and I console myself with the reflection of the instrument he employed for their destruction. Therefore, if I am attacked by the philosophers, I feel that after all we are the majority of the world, and that though the philosophers do come down upon us very harshly, still there are always some of us who survive. But, to speak seriously, my hon. Friend is kind enough to make the pivot of his cremation turn on the Home Secretary. I always maintained that the Home Secretary has got a good deal too much to do, and I am painfully conscious that he has a great deal more to do than he can properly do, or properly does, and the creation of all these new duties is in itself an evil. How am I to undertake the duties that are here laid down? I am to determine how many, and where the crematoria are to be placed. I am afraid that my decisions on the subject would not be satisfactory to my hon. Friend. Then I am to determine the regulations under which people are to be turned into those silver-frosted fragments, as my hon. Friend (Dr. Farquharson) called it, and put in glass bottles. These things are imposing on the Executive duties that I feel entirely unequal to. I see before me my Predecessor (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and my probable Successor. If he is willing to state that he is prepared to accept those duties my hon. Friend will have received valuable support; but, at the present time, it seems to me that we should be doing a thing which would be extremely unwise and extremely imprudent if we were to endeavour to force on the mind of the people, when they are not prepared for it, a measure of this kind. I believe that practical politics and practical statesmanship differ in that respect, that philosophical speculation must take account of the sentiment and, if you please, the prejudice of mankind; and I do not think that the proposals which have been advanced by my hon. Friend—propositions which, I venture to say, are by no means commensurate with the Bill—are those which would be acceptable, or could be safely adopted. So far as the Bill itself is concerned, I have pointed out that it does not correspond with those propositions, and it does not make an adequate reform in the certificate of death, and consequently upon that footing could not be accepted; and that, as regards cremation, it proposes to introduce a thing which, if it were introduced, would not accomplish the objects of my hon. Friend, which could only be accomplished by a general and compulsory system of cremation; that it is not worth while for his purpose, and therefore, if not worth while for the purpose of the general good of the community, it certainly is not prudent to introduce a matter which I think would be the cause of very great dissatisfaction and very great alarm, in disturbing a system which on the whole, whatever may be its defects, is correspondent to the wishes and the necessities of the community.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: The Home Secretary objected to the Bill of my hon. Friend on the ground that it did not carry out the full advocacy of the speech he made in its favour. My hon. Friend knew that it would be only possible to give a permissive Bill for cremation of those who believed it was a salutary process. His speech certainly went much further, and I trust in my remarks I shall keep within it. It is a mere simple permissive Bill, removing an illegal disability which may at present attach to cremation, and giving those securities against crime which are so necessary to prevent cases of secret poisoning. I have placed my name on the back of this Bill, not because I think that cremation is in all cases the best method of disposing of the dead, but because it is a perfectly safe and innocuous process, and as such should not be prejudiced by any legal disability. The means of burning bodies in a complete way are perfectly known, and are efficiently practised in foreign countries. The means of burying in a safe and complete way are also known, but are rarely followed in practice. So that, as a fact, cremation is a process of disposing of the dead in a way which is completely innocuous to the living; while burial, as commonly followed, is a perpetual menace to the health of the survivors in countries of large and increasing populations. The Home Secretary is a high classical authority; but my reading in history as to burying and burning is different from his. From the earliest times, burning was practised in the interior regions of Asia; and in the Western World it was followed by the Thracians, by the Celts, the Sarmatians, and other nations. Both processes, burning and burial, have been so extensively adopted in all ages and among all countries, that a main argument against burning consists in the fact that an effort is being made to revive a plan which has been abandoned by common consent in some Pagan and in all Christian countries. At one time burning was at least as general as burial. Indeed, in past ages it was more general than burial, with the important exceptions of Egypt, Judea, and China. Even in these countries burning of bodies was not unknown. Among the Jews, Saul and his sons were burned, and their ashes were buried under a tree. In great plagues also, as in the Vale of Tophet, the bodies were burned for sanitary reasons. At Rome the burning of bodies was practised from the close of the Republic to the middle of the fourth Christian century. In Greece, at one time at least, it was so universal that the only exceptions to it were in the cases of suicide, persons struck by lightning, and mere infants. Why, then, was this general process abandoned? Both the philosophies and the religions of the Old World had great effect in supporting or opposing the two systems of burial and burning. In the old philosophies matter was supposed to be derived from earth, or air, or water, or fire; and living bodies formed from these were after death resolved into them. So the earth philosophers preferred burial, and the air and fire philosophers preferred burning. Religious beliefs acted more powerfully in the selection of funeral rites. Egypt, believing firmly in immortality, embalmed bodies to preserve them for a future state, so that the greatest punishment of the malefactor was to burn his body. So it was in the primitive belief of Christians, that the actual bodies of dead men were to be changed into glorified bodies for immortality. This belief gave a great impulse to the burial of the dead, and it was increased by burning dead and living bodies for heresy, so that burial became a sign of faith, and burning of unbelief. Amid all these changes, the main purpose of burial or burning was never lost sight of, and that was to conceal or destroy the dead body. It was touchingly expressed by Abraham, on the death of Sarah, when he asked for a piece of land "that I may bury the dead out of my sight." The very word "burial" is derived from an old Anglo-Saxon word which means concealment. The dead are to disappear from the living. Socrates put the case wisely when he said that he did not care whether his body was burned or buried, provided his friends did not think that they had burned or buried Socrates. To him it was true, as our great poet expresses it—

"Death makes no conquest of this conqueror,
For now he lives in fame, though not in life."

Lucan, writing in the first century, also shows in what estimation both processes were held, when he says—" Tabeas cadavera solvat an rogos haud refert"—whether decay or fire destroys corpses matters not. This philosophy of the past has again become the philosophy of the present. Surely, there is no educated man in this 19th century who could believe that immortality is chained to the body of the dead. Not so believed the glorious martyrs who were burned at the stake, or thrown to wild beasts in the arena, or, in later times, those who were beheaded for their faith and thrown into the felon's pit. All were equally certain with old Sir Thomas Brown that "there is nothing immortal but immortality." Both religion and science have now come to the belief that the disposal of the dead is a question of sentiment and convenience. Either burial or cremation produces exactly the same end—the resolution of the body, and differs only in regard to the time in which the resolution is effected. Burial resolves the body into its simple gases and solids, according to its efficiency, in from three to 20 years. Burning produces exactly the same gases and solids in one hour. The earth in its effective state is simply a slow, burning furnace; the crematory is a rapid one. In the earth the body is slowly burned by the air within the pores of the soil. All the organic part of the body passes into gases, which escape into the air as carbonic acid, water, and ammonia. When everything is favourable to burial—when there is no intervening coffin to retard the decay, when the soil is sufficient in quantity and porosity—the decay or slow burning goes on as Nature intended, innocuously to the living, and in fulfilment of an infinitely wise purpose of the great Creator. For these ultimate gases into which the body is resolved constitute the whole aerial food of plants, and are by them constantly moulded into new forms of organic life. And when we make our burials in this simple and complete way there is no violation of any natural law; but we help to fulfil the great cycle of the world, that death and life continually alternate; for death is a source of life, and the dissolution of one generation is necessary for the life of the succeeding one. That is the ideal burial advocated in Mr. Seymour Haden's eloquent letters, "Earth to Earth;" and to it I have no exception to take or preference to give in favour of cremation. But is that the sort of burial which prevails in this country? The description of the actual condition of burial is too repulsive to give, so I will simply say that we do everything to postpone, although we cannot defeat, the beneficent laws of Nature as to the resolution of dead bodies. We inclose our dead in impermeable coffins, often in brick graves, under conditions in which natural decay is substituted by putrescence. In the case of the poor what is called a grave is only a hole in which coffin upon coffin is piled, separated only by thin layers of earth wholly insufficient for absorption. That is not a grave; it is a pit of putridity. I have beside me an official Report upon the way in which paupers are now buried in a Lancashire workhouse close to the living inmates. I will not shock the House by quoting from it. Burial, as commonly practised in this country, both among rich and poor, shows little respect to the dead, and is a continual menace to the living. It destroys the soil, it fouls the air, it contaminates the water, and is a fertile source of human disease. Are you, then, surprised that a reaction against the abuses of burial has taken place, and that scientific men have proposed to re-establish burning as one means of remedying these abominable evils? The body is subject to the immutable law of resolution by decay, as the great provision of the Creator to nourish plants required as food by new generations. You may retard the operation of the law by bad systems of burial, or by embalmments; but in the end it governs you. The bodies of the old Pharaohs have existed for thousands of years; but they are now gradually dissipating in our museums by decay. In this case the process of decay is inoffensive; but what it is in even the best of our churchyards I do not venture to describe. Cremation yields to this law instant obedience. The body yields in the furnace the very same gases which it yields from the soil. The time only differs. In the one case an hour is sufficient; in the other case 20 years may not suffice. The ultimate processes are not merely similar—they are absolutely identical. Both fulfil the end—"Ashes to ashes, dust to dust"—but in cremation that is a reality; in burial only a postponed hope, which the survivor may never live to see realized. Why, then, should we hesitate to give legal facilities to those who desire to treat their dead in this way? The burned bodies of martyrs are as sacred in the history of Christianity as those which are buried in the catacombs of Rome. Of the two modes of disposing of the dead let the living choose their own plan, on the condition that both are conducted with decorum, and with full regard to the known wishes of the deceased and to the feelings of the survivors. Let religion still hallow the event by the beautiful services which all Christian countries adopt on that solemn occasion. I admit that, until the religious feelings of the country look upon cremation with favour, it is not likely to be extensively practised. But if you reject this Bill, you are bound to reform your Laws of Burial, and to bring its practice into some unison with existing knowledge. At present it is a scandal to the most elementary laws of public health. It is desirable to look upon the graves of those we have loved with the tenderest associations of the past, and with the brightest hopes of the future. But burial, as now practised, is to every man of science an evil to the living and a want of honour to the dead. If you deny to those who desire cremation the right to use it, at least meet this demand by reforming your modes of burial; at all events, bring them into consonance with Nature's laws, which are much wiser than our statutes. Burial and burning have the same end, to resolve dead bodies into the aerial food of plants—the one slowly, the other quickly. Over a dead body man has no further power, for chemical and physical forces then reign supreme. It seems unreasonable to refuse to those who wish these changes to be quickly effected, through burning, the right to do so. You cannot help the same end arriving at last. The great and abounding air into which passes all the foulness of the living and all the decay of the dead will continue to be, as it is now, the ultimate grave of organic death and the cradle of organic life. Old Bishop Hall was very near this truth when he said—"Death borders upon our birth, and our cradle stands in the grave." Why should you not allow those who know this truth to produce the final and inevitable result by a process of rapid burning, instead of by a prolonged process of decay in the soil? Only one real argument has been used against the Bill, and that is that burning of a body might destroy the evidences of crime. The Bill takes special precautions that crimes of violence could not escape detection. But secret poisoning might in some cases remain undiscovered, although by this Bill, with its carefully framed methods of medical examination, it is far less likely to remain undetected than on the present system. Secret poisoning is effected either by mineral or organic poisons. All the mineral poisons, except arsenic, and perhaps mercury, would remain in the ashes of the burning, and these could be retained. As to organic poisons, they would be destroyed by burning, as they are now destroyed in the grave, by putrescence; so as regards these both burial and burning are equally at fault. The common form of arsenical poisoning would, however, be detected after burial, and probably not at all after burning. This is an admitted objection to it. Although the medical certificate required by the Bill would render such occasions rare, they might occur, as they do now, not infrequently, in ordinary burial. But to what extent? I never heard it urged that cremation of our Indian subjects is any hindrance to the administration of justice in our Indian Empire. But, admitting the evil to some extent, to me it appears to be as nothing compared to the good which would follow. I do not, indeed, believe that burning will become at all universal. But if it be brought into competition with burial, that as a system must be greatly improved, and be brought under laws which will render it compatible with decency and with public health. So that the good which would follow by the introduction of a competing system for the disposal of the dead would amply compensate the living for the rare, though possible, chance that an isolated crime might remain undetected.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had listened with attention and pleasure to the able speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair). He was himself quite indifferent to the particular mode adopted for disposing of human remains, whether by burial or by cremation; but bodies must be got rid of somehow. They were apt to be disagreeable to the living; the present practice of interment was attended with drawbacks; and, therefore, we were bound to consider fairly the proposed alternative. He had lived for a long time among Hindoos, with whom cremation was habitual. In and about Calcutta there were, perhaps, 500,000 Hindoos, who, at one time, used to throw their dead into the Hooghly. That was prohibited, and then, burial being unknown among them, cremation was adopted, under a completely European administration, without any remonstrance on the part of either Christians or Mahomedans. Considering how great was the population, it was surprising how simply and easily it was done in an inclosure which was almost in the centre of Calcutta. At first, in anticipation of offence to the living, science was called in aid, and a furnace and a high chimney erected for the purpose of carrying off the fumes to Heaven; but somehow the scientific process did not commend itself to the Hindoos, and they were allowed to return to the historic funeral pyre. He was bound to say, from personal observation, that by this plan the dead were disposed of rapidly and without offence, and no complaint was made on the part of the outside public. He could not concur in the assertion that no inconvenience was felt in prosecuting inquiry in cases of supposed poisoning; on the contrary, there had been inconvenience from too rapid cremation, just as there would be from throwing bodies into the Ganges, in a country where it was necessary to dispose of bodies more quickly than in this country. We did not know how far poisoning was common in this country; still less did we know how far it might be common in India; and sometimes he had had reason to suspect that it prevailed more than we supposed. It was, therefore, possible that the rapid disposal of bodies might have some effect in promoting poisoning. There was a law in India under which childless widows inherited the property of their husbands; and it had often been remarked by administrators that, according to statistics, there was an extraordinary number of childless Hindoo widows, and this led to the suspicion that a good many of the husbands had been made away with. In this country it was possible to take greater precautions than were possible in India, because it was not necessary to dispose of the dead so rapidly. The precautions provided by the Bill would probably be sufficient. The only other objection he had—namely, the waste of good matter for manurial purposes—had been disposed of by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh; and, as the final result was the same by both processes, he was prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that as we were not all philosophers nor all Hindoos, we could not argue this matter as if we were either the one or the other. He shared the feeling of the Home Secretary as to the danger that would ensue from cremation so far as the detection of crime was concerned. We must consider how far the adoption of cremation would effect the probability of crimes being committed without their being detected. It was curious that even in India those who buried their dead would not have the philosophic method of cremation, but would revert to the somewhat crude and unphilosophical method of burning on the funeral pile; and the House had just heard, on the high authority of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), that apprehensions were entertained as to the rate at which poisoning prevailed among the Hindoos. As a matter of fact, even organic poisons had been known to remain a long time in the body; they had been found in bodies that had been exhumed, and the result had been the conviction of poisoners. On the other hand, it was certain that even arsenic would be largely dissipated by the process of burning. The adoption of the process of burning would, therefore, produce in the minds of the people a feeling that, in spite of medical certificates, they would be exposed to the risks of poisoning, because their bodies would be disposed of so quickly, and with them would disappear the evidence of crime. The argument that opposition to the Bill implied interference with the law of Nature which converted our bodies into the food of plants could scarcely be treated as one affecting practical politics. There might have been a menace to the living in the conditions of burial some years ago; but improved regulations had been adopted, and now no practical danger could ensue if the Burial Laws were properly carried out. It was said that we should still have to improve our Burial Laws unless we adopted cremation. If so, we should still have to improve them, for the Bill was only permissive, and under it cremation would not become general for a long time. One of the greatest arguments against the Bill was that it was against the public sentiment. It was immaterial what might have been done among the Greeks and the Romans; but, if cremation had been introduced by either, by the common consent of Europe the practice had ceased. When it was proposed to begin it at Wokingham seven or eight years ago, very strong representations were made to him against it; and if the attempt had been made it would have led to disturbance in the country. He did not think it safe to allow the experiment to go on; his endeavours to stop it had been followed up by those of his Successor, who deserved the thanks of the country for the attitude he had taken. The attempt to prove what the results of the decomposition of the human body were and must be, whatever happened, would have been a good lecture at the Royal Institution; but practical politics were not governed by philosophy. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Lyon Playfair) had said that the only difference between burial and cremation was that one system took years, and the other a few hours. Even if he could prove that, yet cremation was against the opinion of the majority. They must consider, not whether there were a few people who wanted it, but that the mass of the people were against it. Where was the demand for it? A number of philosophers, who thought it was the perfection of science, would be glad to see it carried out; but they did not represent the common feeling of the country. It was said that the sentiment of the country had arisen from the belief that the actual body would rise again hereafter, and that impression might still prevail in spite of all philosophy. Nothing but imperative necessity should induce Parliament to do anything which would shock the feelings of the masses of the people on the subject of the burial of the dead. This should not be done unless it was absolutely necessary for the health of the living. No such statement had been made; and the fact that the sentiment of the people was against it was evident. ["Where?"] Where? everywhere. He had the best means of knowing what happened several years ago when he was in Office, and he believed his Successor had found there was no change in the feelings of the people. He agreed with everything the Home Secretary had said; and, therefore, he should heartily vote against the second reading.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, they had had a very extraordinary exhibition that day. They had seen a Secretary of State and an ex-Secretary of State running amuck against the laws of Nature, the laws of science, and the laws of the country. As he understood it, it was pretty well admitted by those who acknowledged the decision of the Judges that cremation was legal. It had been stated so from the Bench; but the Home Secretary had congratulated his Predecessor upon having resisted. And when his Predecessor got up, he boasted that he, in defiance of the law, had interfered to prevent cremation. Well, that was a very astonishing state of things in a country which, up to the present time, he had hoped was a law-abiding country. As for the laws of Nature, they were jeered out of the House. It was perfectly monstrous, the Home Secretary said, for anyone to allude to such things in Parliament. The late Home Secretary had said that they were not within the scope of practical politics. Well, they were anxious to bring them within the scope of practical politics, and that was the reason that excellent Bill was brought in. The Home Secretary had told them that he and others would feel afraid that they might be poisoned if other people were burned. He had said—"My relations would immediately poison me. One cousin would poison me, another cousin would burn me, and neither cousin would hang for it." Well, he thought that was within the range of practical politics. His hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) had pointed out that there were 20,000 persons who died every year, and were buried without any species of medical certificate. He did not suppose that all those persons were poisoned; but they might have been, so far as the law was concerned, just as well as if they had been cremated. [An hon. MEMBER: They could be dug up.] No; they could not be dug up. Nobody did. When once they had got a relative underground they kept him there. He remembered once the Home Secretary stating in that House that he was an old Whig. Now, it seemed to him that an old Whig was almost worse than the oldest Conservative, because the right hon. and learned Gentleman literally carried his Conservatism beyond the grave. What was his argument? He had talked about the Greeks and the Romans; but, living in the full light of the 19th century, what had the Greeks and the Romans to do with it? What struck him was the ignorance displayed by the Home Secretary. Had the right hon. and learned Gentleman never read of Thucydides? Speaking of the plague in Athens, Thucydides said that it was so common then to burn the corpses, and the people were in such a state of excitement, that they took some of their friends before they were dead to act as faggots for those who were dead. The right hon. and learned Gentleman told the House that the Romans did not burn their dead in the days of the Republic; and he argued that Republics were so much better than Empires that we ought not to do so now. That was a very doubtful question. He thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would find that the Etruscans did burn their dead.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The Etruscans were not Romans.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. and learned Gentleman was continually making discoveries. He never said they were. But the Etruscans preceded the Romans, and the Romans acquired a very large portion of their civilization from the Etruscans. If, therefore, it were admitted that the Etruscans were in the habit of burning their dead, they might assume that the Romans also burnt their dead. But what on earth did the matter signify? It did not signify one atom. Then the Home Secretary said—"Look at Christianity! when Christianity came they ceased to burn the dead." But did the right hon. and learned Gentleman remember that he was alluding to ages when Europe was in a state of barbarism; and that it was at that time that they ceased to burn their dead and began to bury them? He would point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that, so far as many of the sects of the Church were concerned, they had certainly been in favour of burning, because they burnt on both sides heretics, even before they were dead. Then the right hon. and learned Gentleman told them that it was a matter of sentiment—no; not a matter of sentiment, but of feeling. He did not know who had that feeling. So far as he was concerned, it was a matter of absolute indifference to him whether he was buried, or burnt, or anatomized—or anathematized. It was a matter of absolute indifference to him what became of his relatives. He did not see that they would gain anything by being burnt or by being buried. It was a question for the living, not for the dead. Why they objected to burial and why they wished to inaugurate cremation was, that those who remained on this Globe would benefit by cremation. They might talk about cemeteries, but the corpses did gradually get into the soil—they permeated the water and they did a vast amount of injury. The Home

Secretary and the late Home Secretary seemed to be under the impression that the Bill obliged everybody to be burnt. It did nothing of the sort. They did not in any sort or way wish to interfere with the late Home Secretary being buried if he wished it. They were not going to insist on burning him. That was a matter for himself and his friends. What they simply asked was that when a person desired to be cremated, not that the law should permit him, for the law did that already, but that the cremation should take place under certain regulations. All the arguments against the Bill had been against the system of cremation. He hoped the House would assent to the Bill. It allowed the matter to be optional. It was what he might almost call a local option after death. The Bill was the consequence of a considerable number of persons desiring that cremation should take place under fair and legitimate rules and regulations which would render abuse of the system impossible.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD, referring to the death of a lady which occurred 10 years ago in the parish in which he resided, expressed the opinion that the fearful circumstances which were brought to light after the body was exhumed would not have been revealed if cremation had taken place. He ventured to say that this was a question for the living rather than for the dead; and he very much doubted whether the safeguards proposed in the Bill were adequate. He hoped the House would pause before hastily passing the second reading.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, that when the practice of cremation had become extensive among the Romans poisoning increased very much. A lady named Locusta had had considerable opportunities for exercising her art, and detection became very difficult. There were but few mineral poisons whose traces would remain after cremation; and if local authorities established on a large scale a crematorium, where the bodies of the poor would be consumed, it was likely that poisoning by arsenic would be greatly encouraged. He differed from hon. Gentlemen who thought that we might trust to popular sentiment. Changes in that respect occurred very rapidly. He did not think that either the consistency or persistency of popular sentiment on the subject could be trusted; and it would be almost impossible to provide safeguards against an abuse which existed in an imperfect form under our present system. He agreed with his right hon. and learned Friend as to the scientific aspect of the subject; but when it came to be a question of police the matter would be found to be very difficult. He believed there was very much less secret poisoning now than in former times; but we could not afford to relax any of our existing precautions.

MR. WARTON said, he regretted very much that the Bill had been brought forward. Of the four Scotch Members who had supported it three were of scientific eminence; and their opinions on vaccination and vivisection had hitherto been received with a respect which in future were less likely to be extended to them. The debate, however, showed that the Home Secretary, when he spoke the sentiments of his own heart, was a thorough Tory, for a more admirable, sound Tory speech than that of the right hon. and learned Gentleman he had never heard in the House. The earliest instance of a contract on record was when the Patriarch Abraham paid a price in silver for a burial-place in which to lay his dead. The natural sentiment with regard to a burial-place where our bodies must remain until the Resurrection must be stronger than with regard to an urn containing a handful of ashes.

MR. TOMLINSON said, it seemed to him that those hon. Gentlemen who promoted the measure had no very clear idea in their own minds as to how it was to be worked. Accordingly, they adopted a practice that was not uncommon, and threw the responsibility of making regulations on the Home Secretary. An excellent sentiment was growing up in favour of so disposing of the dead as to allow Nature to complete her work naturally; and if legislation were proposed with the object of discouraging the use of lead coffins and brick graves he should give it his support. Such an amendment of the Burial Laws would completely meet the main argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair). There was, however, no reasonable chance of a general approval of the practice of cremation. Nearly every civilized race felt horror at the thought of submitting the bodies of their relatives to cremation. There was evidence in Rome and elsewhere to show that, from the earliest times, Christians were opposed to the practice of burning the dead.

MR. FINDLATER said, it was admitted by everyone that cremation could take place with perfect ease. The Bill did not propose to legalize cremation, for it was legal already. The measure would only regulate the practice, and place it under proper restrictions. He regretted that the Home Secretary should have treated the subject in a spirit of badinage. What, he asked, was the relevancy of references to the Greeks and Romans? Those nations knew nothing of the germ theory of disease, whereas we knew that our rivers and springs were being poisoned by the germs emanating from dead bodies. Replying to the argument that cremation might frustrate the detection of poisoners, he said that a Committee of the French Chamber of Deputies had reported that experiments conducted by chemists of eminence showed that arsenic and other poisons could be found in the ashes of poisoned animals after cremation. He should support the Motion for the second reading. [Cries of "Divide!"]

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was not surprised that the House should be anxious to go to a Division after the rollicking Scotch morning which they had had. He wished, however, to be allowed to point out that the provisions of the Bill did not afford absolute security against the disposal by cremation of the body of a poisoned man. A certificate would be necessary before cremation could be carried out, signed by the medical attendant of the deceased in his last illness. Suppose a case in which the medical man himself should be the culprit; there would be nothing to prevent him from signing the certificate for the disposal by burning of the corpse of his victim. In his opinion, the Bill was simply a measure designed to put 5s. into the pockets of the Medical Profession every time a person died. Much had been said about the interest which the poor felt in the question of cremation. He knew well that many poor people in ill-health preferred to starve in their own houses rather than go into the workhouse, so great was their fear of a pauper grave; but the horror with which they looked forward to a pauper's burial would be greatly increased if they were told that they would be burnt. The Bill represented the crude effort of some scientific men to foist their views upon the House; and he trusted that those views would not be adopted.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 (PURCHASE CLAUSES) BILL.—[BILL 23.]

(Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. William Shaw, Mr. Charles Russell, Mr. Lea, Mr. Findlater.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. A. DICKSON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was to amend and extend the Purchase Clauses embodied in the Land Act of 1881. Now, so far as the main object of the Bill was concerned, he was happy to say there was no difference amongst the Irish Members sitting upon any side of the House. They all agreed that the Purchase Clauses required both amendment and extension. He did admit that there was a difference of opinion as to the method by which the object should be carried out; but the end that they all had in view was to give vitality to these clauses. They all agreed that something on the part of the Government of a comprehensive nature must now be done, for it was well known to Irish Members that the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act were practically useless, and had been almost inoperative. He need hardly remind the House that the Purchase Clauses were first inserted in the Church Act of 1869, and were known as the Bright Clauses. These clauses were inserted in the Land Act of 1870, they were amended in 1872, and then finally amended and embodied in the Land Act of 1881. Great results were expected in Ireland when the Purchase Clauses were amended in the Land Act of 1881; but he thought the House would admit—and Irish Members would admit—that up to the present time these clauses had been a dismal failure, and that the creation under them of a peasant proprietary in Ireland was as far off as ever. The House stood committed to an amendment of these clauses, for on the 12th of June last year the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) carried unanimously a Resolution that the Purchase Clauses urgently required to be amended; and the House, in passing the second reading of the Bill, would merely give effect to that Resolution. What were the actual results under these clauses up to the present time? Under the new machinery brought into operation by the Land Act, they had only 330 sales to tenants up to the 31st of December, 1883, or during two and a-half years' operation they had only 330 sales to tenants, involving 15,000 acres of land, and purchase money amounting to £150,000; so that at the present rate of progress it would take 1,000 years to realize the intentions of Parliament. Now, why had the Purchase Clauses failed? In his opinion they failed simply and solely because of the vexatious and technical difficulties introduced into the Land Act. These technical difficulties, he believed, were three—first, no matter what security might be offered, the Land Commissioners could only advance three-fourths of the money; second, the rate of interest could not be varied, nor the term of repayment; and, third, the Land Commissioners were unable to purchase estates, unless three-fourths of the tenants representing two-thirds of the entire rental agreed to buy. Owing, therefore, to the total absence of elasticity in the Land Act of 1881, the Land Commissioners were so tied up that they had to refuse an enormous number of applications. What did the last Report of the Land Commissioners say? Their last Report said that, although £225,000 was sanctioned for purchases, only £150,000 was paid; and all this was owing to the technical difficulties with which the tenants were unable to comply, so that the result now was there was stagnation in the market for land. The Encumbered Estates Court was blocked, and the mortgagees were only waiting to close and sell properties that were heavily encumbered. The public would not purchase, and the tenants could not. It rested, therefore, with the Government, in the interests of both landlord and tenant, to abandon patchwork legislation in connection with the Purchase Clauses, which had been pursued for the last 12 or 13 years, and courageously set about seeing that the intentions of Parliament should be carried out, and something done to create a number of freeholders in Ireland. The Government, in doing this, would be only following the example of every country in Europe. Every State in Europe had given its attention to this matter, and England alone was behind, although there was no country in the world where the creation of occupying proprietors would work with better results than in Ireland. The Bill which he now brought before the House was merely a contribution to the solution of a question which must before long be settled. He had mentioned the three difficulties which destroyed the working of the Purchase Clauses. The first was the inability on the part of the Land Commissioners to advance more than three-fourths of the purchase money—he proposed in the Bill that the Board to be created under it, and to be called the Land Corporation, should have power to advance the whole of the purchase money. For the money advanced the Corporation would have ample security. They would have the security of the fee simple in the land, and the security of the tenant's interest or the tenant right. He would remind the House, and the English Members especially, that the tenant's interest, as defined and settled by the Land Act, was a very important interest. It was equal, in many cases—he believed in the majority of cases in Ulster—to the fee simple; and, on the average, all over Ireland the tenant's interest would amount to one-half the value of the fee simple. The advance would, therefore, be secured by the fee simple and the tenant's interest as well. It provided, as a further safeguard, that the tenant's title in the land purchased should not be confirmed until five years of the annual instalments had been paid by him. By this time the tenant would have a substantial interest in the land he purchased, and the Corporation would have ample security for the money they advanced. He desired to strongly impress upon the House the absolute necessity that the whole purchase money should be advanced. Let the House remember that Ireland was but slowly recovering from the depression of the last few years; and, bearing that in mind, he thought every Member would agree with him that it would be impolitic to compel the tenant to have recourse to the money-lender, or to deprive himself of the small savings that he would require to work the land, or to sell his stock, in order that he might raise the purchase money. He believed, and it was generally admitted by all acquainted with the subject, that the Government would be better secured by advancing the whole of the money than they would by advancing three-fourths of it, and thereby driving the tenants into the hands of money-lenders, who would exercise a pernicious control and influence over them. If this course had been pursued with regard to the glebe lands sold to tenants under the Purchase Clauses of the Church Act of 1869, the present owners, especially in Ulster, would not be in their present embarrassed condition. What was the evidence of Mr. Morrough O'Brien before the Select Committee in 1878? He said that he was told by the tenants that they had to starve themselves in order to raise the necessary one-fourth of the purchase money, and in one instance a tenant had to sell his entire stock—two cows and six sheep—and borrow at the rate of 20 per cent, in order to become the owner of his land. If the whole of the purchase money was not advanced, he ventured to say that the sales in Ireland would be few and far between; because they all knew that, in consequence of the Land Act of 1881, the tenants could not now be frightened by the terror of the new and unknown landlord, and not compelled to borrow at 20 per cent, or starve themselves. The tenants were now secured from eviction, except for non-payment of the judicial rent. He would say emphatically that it was the interest of both landlord and tenant that the whole purchase money should be advanced; and he hoped that the Irish Members would reject any proposals of the Government on the subject, unless the advance of the whole of the purchase money was conceded. Under the Bill he proposed that the rate of interest should not be less than 3½ per cent, and left the terms of repayment entirely at the discretion of the Land Corporation, to decide according to the merits of each estate and case, and to deal with them upon a sound commercial basis. A difficulty in connection with the inability of the Land Commissioners to carry out the Purchase Clauses was the impossibility to get three-fourths of the tenants on an estate representing two-thirds of the rental to agree to buy. Now, what he proposed was that the Land Corporation should be able to purchase estates in globo, and hold them over until transferred to the tenants. In proposing this he followed the suggestion made by Judge

"You must have a person or persons who would have an interest in the tenants, and who would be prepared to come forward and buy in globo estates for sale, and then sell them back to the tenants. It is the only chance of selling largely to the tenants."

Now, that was exactly the principle embodied in this Bill. He was aware that great divergence of opinion existed amongst Irish Members as to the mode for extending the Purchase Clauses; and he brought forward this Bill as a contribution to the discussion, and as an attempt to solve the difficulties now existing. The Corporation that he proposed to establish would be partly a public and partly a State Institution. He proposed that the State should guarantee 3 per cent on £10,000,000 sterling. He was anxious that this should be held out to the Irish people as a source of investment, especially to the agricultural community. The deposits in the Irish banks at the present moment were about £35,000,000, and depositors were paid on that sum about 1 per cent; and he had no doubt that before long these depositors would be ready to invest their money in a Corporation such as this, which would give them a State guarantee of 3 per cent on their money. This would not only be a financial gain to the people, but a great political advantage to the State. He would be glad to see the Irish people having a National Institution of this kind, where their deposits would be safe, and where they would get a reasonable interest for their money. An impression existed, principally in England, that if these facilities were given there would be a great rush upon the part of the tenants to buy. No greater delusion could possibly exist. He would remind the House that the transactions in the Encumbered Estates Court during the most prosperous years did not exceed £1,000,000 per annum. He did not believe that all the facilities for purchase offered by this Bill would lead to sales of more than £1,000,000 a-year, so that the operations would be very gradual, because there was now no pressing necessity on the part of the tenants to buy; and he also believed that when the present glut in the land market was removed it would be found that the proprietors of great estates had not the slightest intention of selling.

He proposed under this Bill that there should be no law costs, and that the amount of the purchase money should cover all the liability of the tenant. The costs at present to the tenants in the Encumbered Estates Court amounted to 11 per cent of the purchase money; and where the amount of the purchase money was only £150, the costs reached 18 per cent, or four years' purchase. There was a strong feeling about this in the North of Ireland; and he believed that, unless some special arrangements were made, the people would be very cautious about becoming purchasers. It was a well-known fact that tenants would rather pay £10 more for their land than £10 in costs. He had now given the House in bare outline his project, and it did not go one step beyond what the Select Committee had recommended in 1878. One of the Land Commissioners examined by Mr. Bright—Mr. Justice O'Hagan—said that the Commission proposed by him "should have all matters connected with the purchase and sale of land absolutely in their own hands." It had been suggested to leave the working of these Purchase Clauses in the hands of the Land Commissioners. He had no objection if they placed in the hands of the Commissioners extensive powers, and left them absolutely free to deal with every case. If, however, they placed extensive powers in the hands of the Commissioners, could they believe that they could utilize them? Why the Land Commissioners were unable to grapple with the appeals, and 9,000 appeals were waiting for hearing. Their hands were full, and they had more work than they would be able to accomplish for the next four years. Public opinion in Ireland was anxiously awaiting for the solution of this question, and for the creation of a peasant proprietary. The question which they had now to decide was, whether they would allow the people facilities for becoming the owners of the land which was waiting for sale, or let it get into the hands of speculators? He earnestly hoped that Her Majesty's Government, for the sake of the peace and prosperity of Ireland, would facilitate so desirable a result when they had the opportunity. They were now face to face with the very same position of affairs as existed in 1850; and he hoped that the blunder then made would not be repeated, and that they would now enable the tillers of the soil to become the owners of the land which they cultivated. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. T. A. Dickson.)

MR. PLUNKET said, he would only detain the House for two or three minutes. He had no intention of moving the rejection of the Bill; but it must be understood that he did not in the least degree assent to it. If he moved the rejection of the Bill it would be his duty to give some reasons for doing so. He would not, however, waste a moment of the time of the House. He was anxious to hear the statement which the Chief Secretary had long promised them, and which men of all classes in Ireland had been long looking forward to with the greatest anxiety. The right hon. Gentleman, he trusted, would now address the House and state the view of the Government.

MR. PARNELL: Sir, I should have been very much better pleased if the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down had informed the House what measure he was prepared to support of this kind. I doubt very much if the right hon. and learned Member would support any Bill such as has been introduced. I welcome this Bill as a step in the right direction; but I scarcely think that the time has come yet in Ireland for any large transfer of property from landlords to tenants, either under this Bill or any other proposal which has yet been made, unless very special facilities were offered by the Government. I doubt very much whether Irish landowners, as a class, are desirous of selling their interests in the land at the price which tenants would be willing to give for it. I doubt very much if the time has yet arrived for such a project. I am very much disposed to think that on the great majority of estates in Ireland the measure would be ineffective, and that its operations would be confined to those which are already in the market, and which must be sold, owing to the fact that the margin which has been left for the benefit of the original owners who have petitioned for the sale has been absorbed, or nearly absorbed, owing to the very great depreciation in the value of land which has taken place in that country. As regards the main question of the sale of land in Ireland to the tenants, I scarcely think that we shall be able to approach it on the basis afforded in the Bill of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson). All Parties in this House now entertain the belief that it would be most desirable that the purchase facilities of the Act of 1881 should be extended, so as to enable tenants upon estates in Ireland to become owners of their holdings upon fair and reasonable terms. It certainly would have afforded some light to the House if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given some information to the House as to the views of his Party upon the Bill of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Dickson). I can only say, with regard to this Bill, that I recognize in it a sincere attempt at, if not a solution of the Irish Land Question; it certainly is an attempt to solve the present difficulty with regard to the sale of estates in Ireland. I believe that if the Government were to see their way to the adoption of the measure, a very considerable number of estates now in the market waiting for sale from various causes would be transferred, enabling the tenants to become the owners of their holdings upon reasonable and proper terms. I do think that it would be most desirous that the owners of encumbered estates in Ireland should be afforded an opportunity of selling, and the tenants an opportunity of buying, their holdings. I think, however, in all probability, unless very exceptional facilities were afforded by the Government, such as the extension of the repayment period over a larger number of years, and that a greater amount of the loan was advanced, no very great progress would be made upon a large scale just now. I have always held that the Land Question in Ireland will never be settled upon a firm and sure foundation until the occupying tenants have been made the owners of their holdings; and I consider that it would be very well worth the while of the Government, whether Conservative or Liberal, to settle the question upon that basis, and to create in the nation a spirit of contentment and peace amongst all parties. I believe that one result would be to do away with the necessity, from their point of view, of "exceptional legislation," and of having to keep up a large garrison of military and police. Yet I am convinced that if the sale of land in Ireland took place under certain conditions and at a certain price, the result would be that the taxpayer eventually would be no loser whatever, and that not one shilling of extra taxation would be incurred by enabling the Irish tenants to pay in just instalments for their land. While I say this, I say, also, that I think the time has scarcely come yet when the operations of the Bill of the hon. Member could be carried out upon any extensive scale. However, the condition of the land market in Ireland will afford the Government an opportunity of making an experiment, and seeing how far the tenants on these encumbered estates are desirous of purchasing, and also of ascertaining the price which they are disposed to give for their holdings. They can then judge by the course of things during the next few years what probability there would be of the success of a more extended scheme of purchase from the result in this case. If it be found that the tenants upon such encumbered estates purchased their holdings at prices which are accepted by the Courts having the jurisdiction of the sale, and that the instalments are paid with reasonable punctuality, it would afford a strong inducement to the Government to adopt a larger scheme in the course of a few years. It would be an encouragement to the taxpayers of the Three Kingdoms to undertake larger and greater risks with a view to bringing about a permanent and lasting settlement of the Land Question, which, as anyone with any experience of the actual situation of affairs in Ireland knows, is the only accepted means of leading to tranquillity and peace in that country. The subject of the present Bill is divided into two questions—Are the landlords willing to sell, and are the tenants willing to buy? I have already answered these two questions by saying that, in my opinion, the landlords are not willing to sell at present at such prices as would enable the tenants to buy. The tenants are not willing to give 20 years' purchase on the judicial rent. When the question comes to be considered it will be fought upon that. The tenants will object to having to pay the entire taxation upon these estates, county cess, poor rate, and Income Tax, with the knowledge that they would have an inflexible landlord, instead of having, as at present, a few rare examples who are flexible. When they would understand that the demands of the taxpayer could not be avoided, postponed, or delayed, they would rather look forward to the time when the Healy Clause of the Land Act will be a reality in existence instead of in theory, as at present; and when, instead of having to pay for the improvements of their predecessors in title 20 years' purchase of a judicial rent, they will themselves obtain the benefits of such improvements. The Irish landlords, unless they received a further loan, would not permit the tenants to purchase under these conditions; and, therefore, I hold that, unless the period of repayment were very materially extended from 35 to 52 years, the tenants would not be induced to buy at such a rate as the landlords would be willing to sell at. I should be very glad to know the sentiments of the Government. They appear to shrink from placing themselves in the position of creditors on an extensive scale to the Irish tenants. The Land Act of 1881 preserved the landlords as a buffer between the Government and the tenants. I do not know whether the opinion has been modified within recent years; but the announcement that they intend to propose some scheme of purchase would rather appear to indicate that they are favourable to the assumption of a greater risk by the State than they were when the Land Act of 1881 was passed, and that, so far as regards the encumbered estates which are now in the market, and must be sold whether the price obtained for them be high or low, they are disposed to experiment on a somewhat larger scale than hitherto. I believe that the experiment can be tried with perfect safety. I think that in all probability an expenditure of £10,000,000 a-year extending over a period of 10 years—that would be £100,000,000 altogether—would enable most of the land in the occupation of tenants subject to the operation of the Land Act of 1881 to be purchased, and that long before the expiration of the 10 years you would have repaid in annual instalments a very considerable portion of the sum lent during the first three years, and that possibly, if it were worked out by an actuary, it would be found that at no time during the 10 years would the State have lent more than a total sum of about £50,000,000. In all probability, what will result from the present situation will be an experiment on a large scale as to the feasibility of establishing a peasant proprietary. But I shall regard the discussion as important if the Government evinces now less repugnance to pledging the credit of the State on a larger scale than formerly. There is one most important condition which is absolutely necessary to be satisfied, so as to secure the success of an experiment, even upon a limited scale. I refer to the advance of the whole of the purchase money. Whether that advance is to be through an intermediate body, such as the Company which has been established under the Tramways Act, which would take upon themselves some portion of the risk, or whether the advance is to be to the occupying tenant himself, I look upon it as an indispensable condition for the purchase of any quantity of land by the tenants that the whole of the purchase money be advanced by the State. Whether they would extend the period of repayment is another question. I think an extension would facilitate purchases. Perhaps the House is not generally aware of the important provisions contained in the direction of advancing purchase money in the second part of the Tramways Act of last Session. It is claimed by the Company which has been formed for that purpose that the Land Commissioners now, if permitted by the Treasury, could advance the whole of the purchase money of an estate to the Company, though, when the estate comes to be resold to the tenants by the Company, only three-fourths of the purchase money can be then advanced to the tenants. Thus the Company is rendered responsible for the repayment of a quarter of the purchase money. It appears to me that by a development of the principle which is contained in this portion of the Tramways Act you might obtain a solution of the difficulty weighing upon the mind of the Government as regards advancing the whole of the money—that if some intermediate body in a responsible and solvent position, either a public Company with a subscribed capital at its back, or a local body, such as a County Board, or in the absence of a County Board the Board of Guardians, with power to levy rates on the locality, could be established, that then the Government might with safety advance to such a body the total purchase money, while reserving to themselves the right to hold this body responsible for the payment of one-fourth in case of the failure of the tenants. That is the construction which has been placed by a lawyer of ability upon some sections of the Tramways Act. We have not yet got the opinion of the Land Commission. But it is hoped very shortly that an opportunity will be afforded to the Treasury of declaring what is their interpretation of the Act; and if their view should be that the whole of the purchase money can be thus advanced, a very important step will be taken in the simplification of this question. There is another important question with regard to leaseholders. They will be unable to take the same advantageous terms of purchase as those yearly tenants enjoying judicial tenures with reduced rents. The leaseholders will be compelled to purchase on the basis of their own high rents, which, in all probability, are 50 per cent over those paid by the tenants from year to year having judicial tenures. Hence it will follow that the risk to the State of the element of repudiation will be very much augmented as regards these leaseholders, and it will be impossible to carry out a symmetrical scheme of purchase. I think if the Imperial Exchequer is asked to advance a large sum of money to enable Irish landowners who must sell to dispose of their estates upon comparatively advantageous terms, where there is at present no market for them, those who are responsible for the safety of the taxpayers as regards these transactions should ask the landowners to permit the leaseholders to enter the Land Court, to allow them to have fair rents fixed, so that the State may be assured that if this experiment is tried it may turn out satisfactory to the Government and to this country. If sales are carried out to any extent, and the leaseholders buy with the rest, as they must, and on the basis of the old unreduced rents, I confess I cannot feel that confidence in my own mind that the transaction, so far as regards these leaseholders, will turn out as satisfactory to the State as I should like. I think, therefore, that the State might ask that this important class, the leaseholders, should be admitted to the benefits of the Land Act,

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, if a long declaration of policy had been expected from me I should not have had time to make it. I have, however, no such declaration to make, and the limit of time allowed me will suffice for what I have to say. The debate, though short, has been interesting and instructive; and my only regret is that my right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Plunket) had not given the House the full benefit of his remarks. The announcement I have to make is important, as every stage of so important a matter as this must be. It is simply this—that the Government have been maturing a scheme, which is now almost in the very last stage; and it is a scheme which they believe will be satisfactory to the persons interested in this question. That speculation has not been diminished by what has taken place in this debate. It is unnecessary for me to enter into the objections which the Government feel to the Bill brought forward by my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend, I take it, felt that, as a private Member, he could not lay down a comprehensive machinery for carrying out the purchase of land by a Government Department; and I conclude that, being well versed in business, he sought for a means of obtaining that end by means of a commercial body. But the objections which the Government take to this scheme are vital. They are strongly of opinion that if the Government guarantee is not to be a mere gift to the shareholders, it will be necessary for the shareholders, in order to obtain interest for their money, to make that money, in some shape or other, out of the tenants of Ireland. But the tenants have shown their determination that not a penny shall be made out of them if they can possibly help it. That is the real objection which lies at the bottom of our unwillingness to accept the scheme of my hon. Friend. I think, however, that that scheme is admirably drawn up, and if a land bank which will stand between the Government and the tenants and landlords could possibly be devised I cannot imagine how it could be better devised; but the only land banks which have hitherto been concerned in carrying out these transactions have been Government institutions—I refer to Prussia; and the Government think that a machinery more straightforward and convenient than even such institutions can be invented, and has been to a very great extent invented in their hands. I wish this scheme to come before the House as a whole, and I will not, therefore, enter into any details; but I shall take the earliest opportunity of unfolding it. On all sides this is allowed to be a most momentous business, and the assurance that the Government is on the eve of embarking upon such a scheme is, at all events, a very important stage. I do not wish that the House should be able to read between the lines of my speech in any important respect. I may say I agree very much with what has been stated in the course of the debate. I agree as to the paltry results of the purchase system, as to the importance of an independent body which shall practically be able to give its full time and attention to this business; as to the importance, if possible, of obtaining the tenant right as a part of the security, if that might be obtained by just means; as to the immense importance of doing everything to diminish or limit the legal expense of the transaction. And if—

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

MR. GIBSON said, that the matter had already been postponed twice, and five weeks ago they were told that a statement would be made that day. Now they were referred to that elastic period—an early date. Did that mean a week—he called that an early date, though not very early—[Mr. TREVELYAN dis-sented.]—or a fortnight, or when?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have conferred with my right hon. Friend beside me (Mr. Childers), and I have no reason to doubt but that he or I shall be able to lay the outline of the Government proposal before the House in the shape of asking leave to introduce the Bill, in the course of a fortnight, or, at any rate, two or three days over that time, or possibly a day or two more.

QUESTION.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE SLIGO CONSPIRACY TRIAL.

In reply to Mr. SEXTON,

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the Sligo prisoners would be brought up tomorrow, when evidence would be taken against them. They would be allowed to see their legal advisers.

EGYPT—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I wish to put to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a series of Questions of which I have given him private Notice—first, Whether it is intended by Her Majesty's Government to propose a Conference on Egyptian affairs; and, if so, when and where it will be held; secondly, what the subject matter of the Conference will be, whether it will be limited to the discussion of the usual affairs will embrace the administration of the government of Egypt; and, lastly, whether any of the Powers, and, if so, which of them, have agreed to that proposal from Her Majesty's Government?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the matter is still under negotiation, and, therefore, I can only give general answers to the Questions. Her Majesty's Government have issued a Circular to the five Powers, and have also sent a despatch to the Porte, proposing a Conference to consider whether there should not be some change made in the Law of Liquidation, and, if so, what that change should be. It is proposed that the Conference should be held either in London or at Constantinople; but that question is not yet settled. I may add that from Turkey we have yet had no answer. Four Powers have agreed to the proposal. France has also, in courteous terms, agreed to the principle of the Conference, but wishes to have some preliminary communication with Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thanked the noble Earl for his statement; but said that, as the question was one he did not wish to lose sight of, he would ask him on Tuesday next whether he could supplement his answer by any further statement.

"THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P."—ACTION AT BAR.

PETITION.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he had received a Petition from Mr. Bradlaugh, who described himself as a Member of the House of Commons, stating that an action at Bar had been raised against him by the Attorney General, for certain penalties he was alleged to have incurred, and that he was desirous that an officer of their Lordships' House might attend the hearing, and praying that, for the purposes of the case, the said officer should be allowed to produce the Journal of their Lordships' House for the year 1882. He did not know the Petitioner, nor what the question was, nor whether the books would be relevant; but he supposed their Lordships would agree to the request, and leave the Court which heard the case to decide on the value of the evidence.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the usual course was for the Petition to be laid upon the Table, and for a Notice of Motion in accordance with the prayer of the Petition to be given.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

SETTLED LAND BILL.—(No. 52.)

(The Earl Cairns.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL CAIRNS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was to remove some technical difficulties that had arisen in connection with the working of his own Act, which was passed a few years ago. That Act, he reminded their Lordships, was introduced in the House of Lords; and when it came back from the House of Commons at the close of the Session, it was found that a number of Amendments had been made. At the time he (Earl Cairns) expressed the opinion that these Amendments would give rise to difficulties, but said that the stage of the Bill was too critical to justify them in restoring it to its original condition. The experience they had gained since the Act came into operation showed that the fears he had expressed were well founded. Difficulties had arisen which it was the main object of this Bill to remove.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Cairns.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that, in his opinion, the measure was a necessary one.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 13th instant.

EGYPT—ENGAGEMENTS OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT (DESPATCH OF 19TH SEPTEMBER, 1879).

OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: I beg to lay upon the Table an addition to the Paper already presented to the House in reference to the despatch of the 19th of September, 1879 (Egypt, No. 11, 1884).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of calling attention to the despatch of the 19th of September, 1879 (Egypt, No. 11, 1884), from the Foreign Office, recently laid upon the Table, and to the interpretation placed upon it by Her Majesty's Government. The matter of which I have given Notice is not one of leading or paramount importance; and in the present state of anxiety in respect to all that has taken place in Egypt I feel that I have to apologize for the comparative triviality of the question concerning which I propose to offer a few remarks to your Lordships. The truth is that the Prime Minister has publicly placed a certain interpretation upon a despatch of mine which I cannot admit to be correct, and which, if I passed without observation, I should be held to have admitted. The matter has arisen in this way. The Prime Minister the other day received a deputation from a Conference convened by the Working Men's Peace Association, who presented resolutions which were passed at a meeting of that Association expressing horror at the wholesale slaughter of thousands of brave men in the Soudan, and urging on the Government the necessity of redeeming their pledges to the country by retiring, and thus staying further effusion of blood. To these resolutions the Prime Minister answered that they would receive his respectful attention, and added this curious sentence—

"It cannot be too clearly understood that the covenants under which the country has been acting in Egypt were not made by the present Government."

Well, that was a strange statement, and the Prime Minister's attention was naturally called to it in "another place." He was asked by Baron de Worms whether he could state what were the covenants under which Her Majesty's Government had sanctioned a military expedition to the Eastern Soudan; and whether under them the Government were precluded from giving relief to General Gordon at Khartoum? The answer of the Prime Minister was that—

"The covenant to which the Question of the hon. Member refers was one made by the late Government earnestly to support the Government of the Khedive."

The Prime Minister was then asked whether he could produce the covenant, and he said that it depended upon two consents—the consent of the late Government and the consent of the French Government. Mr. Bourke at once said that, on behalf of the late Government, he would give the consent to the production of the Paper; and, in consequence, the despatch has been laid upon the Table of your Lordships' House. But I must notice, in passing, that Mr. Bourke consented to the production of the whole covenant, and not to a fragment of it. Therefore I saw, with some regret, that when it was produced it showed considerable omissions, and that those omissions materially affected the sense of the despatch. I am bound, however, to say that when I state that, I do not for a moment suggest—indeed, it would be absurd to do so—that there was any intention on the part of the Foreign Office, or of the noble Earl opposite, to produce a garbled despatch. I am quite aware what was the course followed. The despatch was sent to the French Embassy, and it was printed in the form in which it came back from the Embassy; but it is not the less true that, as printed, it did not entirely exhibit the true state of the case. What I have to call attention to in this despatch, and the interpretation which the Prime Minister has put upon it, refers to two points—first, the meaning of the despatch; and, secondly, the Government with whom the alleged covenant was made. The covenant under which, according to the Prime Minister, England has been acting alone in Egypt during all these lamentable occurrences is contained in these few words. The result of the conversation between myself and M. Waddington was an arrangement, upon certain points, “that the Native Government should receive our earnest support.” Thus it appears that in a conversation I had with M. Waddington, I had said, and I afterwards recorded the fact in a despatch, that the Native Government should receive our earnest support. That is the covenant which, according to the Prime Minister, he has been acting under in Egypt during the past four years. It is material to ask what did I mean by “the Native Government.” As the despatch is presented, it is not very easy to see, as nothing is said; but there is one important omission which, by the great courtesy of the noble Earl opposite, I have obtained in a printed form, and it is now upon the Table of the House. There occur in it these sentences—

“I thought it right to inform His Excellency that I believed M. de Blignières to be adverse to the present arrangements. I urged that explicit instructions should be given to him. These M. Waddington promised to give, and said he would make M. de Blignières understand that the system of European Ministers could not be resumed.”—[Egypt, No. 14 (1884).]

These were the important and emphatic words—

“That the system of European Ministers could not be resumed.”

The House will remember that an experiment had been tried; Sir Rivers Wilson had been made one of two European Ministers at Cairo; that disturbances had followed; that it had been necessary for the European Ministry to resign; and that the Dual Control was instituted in its place. The great question for the moment was whether the European Ministry should be restored, or whether a Native Ministry should be appointed and supported in its place; and in view of that I pressed that M. Waddington, who quite agreed with me, should make it clearly understood that the European Ministry could not be restored; and we agreed that the Native Government should receive our earnest support. That was the meaning of the words “the Native Government.” What that meant was that Riaz Pasha and his Colleagues should receive our earnest support; and because we agreed that Riaz Pasha and his Colleagues, as distinguished from Sir Rivers Wilson and M. de Blignières, were to receive our earnest support, therefore, four years later, the Prime Minister contends that it was under that covenant, and it alone, all the melancholy events have taken place in Egypt. But I will ask the noble Earl opposite to go a step further, and to say to whom was this promise made. If it had been a promise made to the Khedive, I could understand that the Khedive might have misunderstood it, and might have supposed that it was a promise to support him against any insurrection that might arise. But that promise was not made to the Khedive; it was made to the French Government; and will anyone tell me that since that everything that has been done by England in Egypt since the battle of Tel-el-Kebir has been done in pursuance of that covenant with the French Government? Is it not a matter of notoriety that ever since then—in fact, ever since the bombardment of Alexandria, not only has England not acted in that country in deference to the wishes of, and in pursuance of the covenant with, the French Government, but in spite of the great reluctance and unwillingness, recently culminating in exasperation, on the part of that Government to whom we profess to be so friendly? When we consider what has taken place in Egypt, when we consider that the results of the course pursued by the English Government in Egypt have been the abandonment of General Hicks, the compulsion of the Khedive's Ministry, whether they liked it or not, to the abandoning the greater part of their Empire; the retention of Suakin, which was no special object to the Khedive or to the Native Government; the tremendous slaughter which has been committed without any apparent effect upon the safety of Suakin or the solution of any other of the difficulties of Egypt; the sending of General Gordon on his lamentable and hopeless mission to Khartoum; the abandonment of garrison after garrison in the Soudan; the suffering the barbarous tribes to advance from Obeid to Khartoum, and from Khartoum to Berber, and to make themselves masters of the whole country of the Soudan; and, considering that these have been the prominent and salient features of English policy in Egypt, is it not somewhat surprising to learn that all this has been done in pure deference to the French Government, simply because we were under the covenant with the French Government made five years ago, in a conversation between myself and M. Waddington, and because that covenant contained the words that the Native Government should receive our earnest support? My Lords, I do not intend now to criticize any particular point in the general policy of Her Majesty's Government in Egypt. For that other opportunities will occur. I am only dealing now with the particular contention of the Prime Minister, that the whole of his conduct is covered by my pledge in this despatch, and that it is under the covenant I made to France that he has done all that he has done, and neglected all that he has neglected to do. To attach such results to such a covenant as appears from these words is not mere sophistry, but derision.

EARL GRANVILLE: I will, my Lords, confine myself entirely to the point which the noble Marquess desired to elucidate—namely, the contention between himself and Mr. Gladstone, though the noble Marquess managed, as is usual with him, to put in a few words of bitter censure on the Egyptian policy of Her Majesty's Government. In the first place, I should like to give some explanation as to the Paper in question, as to which I admit the noble Marquess has given a perfectly true and historical account of how it came to be produced at all. Having received the full assent of Mr. Bourke to the presentation of the despatch on behalf of the late Government, there only remained M. Waddington and the French Government whose consent it was necessary to obtain. The first six paragraphs of the despatch were of a personal and confidential character as between the noble Marquess and M. Waddington; and I had not the slightest doubt that both of them would wish that the personal passages should be omitted. I therefore sent to M. Waddington the despatch, saying that I presumed he would not object to its publication, but that probably he would prefer that the personal passages should be omitted. In reply, M. Waddington said he had no objection to the publication on condition that those passages were omitted, and that an additional passage of a similar private character should also be omitted. I then presented the despatch which constituted the agreement made between the noble Marquess and M. Waddington. The noble Marquess is good enough to say that there is not the slightest suspicion that we had in any way tampered with the despatch; but I am bound to say it never crossed me that the previous sentences which were omitted really bore on the question of the agreement. Further, after hearing the explanation of the noble Marquess, I do not see how they do so apply. The noble Marquess said very truly that Mr. Gladstone had stated that we had inherited a covenant from Her Majesty's late Government, and that Mr. Gladstone quoted this despatch when pressed to do so—

"The result of our further conversation was an agreement on the following points:—1. That the Commission of Liquidation should have power to deal with the Unified Debt as well as the other liabilities of the Egyptian Government. This concession M. Waddington made unwillingly, but said that he had no alternative, as his own counter proposal met with no support from any of the Powers. 2. That before any money was appropriated towards payment of the creditors, a sufficient sum should be set aside to provide for the expenses of Egyptian administration. 3. That the Native Government should receive our earnest support. 4. That the two Governments should make it clearly understood to the Khedive that they would not tolerate the establishment in Egypt of political influence on the part of any other European Power in competition with that of England and France, and that they were prepared to take action to any extent that might be found necessary to give effect to their views in this respect."—[Egypt, No. 14, (1884.)]

That appears to me to be a most complete declaration on the part of two great Governments to give support to a smaller Government. The noble Marquess has complained that Mr. Gladstone rests solely upon this despatch; but I do not know that this was the case. I think it was perfectly impossible that Mr. Gladstone should not also take into consideration that it was primarily the late Government, followed, it is true, by France, and subsequently by other Governments, who forced the late Khedive to resign and put the present Khedive in his place, subject to his following their advice in all important particulars; and this was the origin of the position in which we find ourselves. I have often given credit to the noble Marquess for having so steadily supported the present Khedive, and for having contended that England's honour was bound up in supporting him. I could quote from five or six different speeches of the noble Marquess in and out of Parliament passages in which the noble Marquess has expressed in the strongest words that we were pledged to have recourse to force if we wished to fulfil our obligations.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I said in consequence of obligations incurred by the action of Her Majesty's present Government.

EARL GRANVILLE: Exactly; I am coming to that. The noble Marquess chooses to anticipate the argument which might be used. The noble Marquess says—"In consequence of the action of the present Government." It is open to me to dispute that, and to say that it is perfectly impossible to disconnect the action of Her Majesty's Government following on the assurances and acts of the late Government. But that is a matter of opinion on which the noble Marquess is, no doubt, a much greater authority than myself. I will, however, just quote from that greater authority. Speaking on May 15, 1882, the noble Marquess said—

"With respect to Egypt itself, it appears to me that Her Majesty's Government, both by the engagements which they themselves have entered into, and by the engagements which they have necessarily inherited from their Predecessors"—

the absolute words of Mr. Gladstone—

"are bound to give their support to the present Viceroy of Egypt, so long as his Government is in accordance with the principles which they approve. They are bound to give him that support, not merely as a matter of sentiment, not merely in words or in notes, but in something stronger if the need should arise."—(3 Hansard [269] 651.)

My Lords, that was the explanation of our obligations and the acts of our Predecessors given two years ago by the noble Marquess before he was challenged with regard to this matter; but now that he is challenged he gives a most able and, I quite admit, a most ingenious explanation of the facts.

Amended extract of despatch from the Marquess of Salisbury to Mr. Malet, of 19th September 1879: Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table.

EGYPT—EVACUATION OF THE EASTERN SOUDAN.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHNAIRN rose to ask the Government—First, their reasons for the evacuation of East Soudan by the troops under General Graham after his great successes over the rebel forces had created a panic and a complete depression of the "morale" among them, so that he was able to detach cavalry patrols from Suakin to considerable distances through the south and west, as well as through the northern district in the direction of Berber, proclaiming English supremacy over rebellion and anarchy; second, further to ask Her Majesty's Government whether this sudden and unexpected retreat from the scene of action, ordered by them, had not as seriously damaged British influence as General Graham's successes had previously raised it in that part of the world; third, whether this most serious loss of influence has not endangered the position and life of General Gordon, as well as the lives and properties of foreign consular agents and of a large number of loyal inhabitants in the Soudan districts; fourth, whether, even at this late hour, it would not save the dangerous situation now existing in the Soudans to concentrate Indian cavalry and infantry at Suakin, a safe port and base, in addition to making a military demonstration from Assouan southwards, which could be turned, when required, into a real movement? And whether these dispositions to attack the enemy in front and rear, thus placing him between two fires, might not have a wholesome effect in arresting a further development of rebellion round Khartoum and Berber, and throughout the Soudans? The noble and gallant Lord said that the object of these Questions was to show by official facts the serious and unenviable responsibility to the country, which rested upon Her Majesty's Government, for their incomprehensible policy in having abandoned the most satisfactory position, either in a political or a military sense, secured to them in East Soudan by the great and decisive successes of General Graham and his troops, and in having descended into its antithesis, a retreat to Cairo and England, which was, to the minds of Orientals, a certain proof of weakness, whether in policy or warfare. The Soudanese, Zulus, and Lazzees were the bravest populations in the East; but, brave as they were, they were not free from this Oriental characteristic. And the British successes at the last general action of Tamanieb were marked by unusual terrors of war; no less than 6,000 men killed on the field by the improved arms of the Royal Artillery and Infantry, which left an indelible impression on the minds of the Soudanese soldiers, and of their countrymen, of the invincible power of British troops. Nothing could have effaced this except the evacuation. The Soudanese troops, in fanatical devotion to the Mahdi's cause, rushed to the attack, recklessly exposing themselves to the iron storm of case of the battery under Captain Holley, to whom the country could not be sufficiently grateful for the all-important service he and his brave gunners, as General Graham said in his despatch "not protected by Infantry," rendered at a critical moment. The enemy were shot down before they could reach the guns like the Austrians in the campaign with the Prussians in 1866. The Austrians charged often and gallantly; but before they could reach their opponents, they were shot down by the Prussian Nadelgewehr. The Soudanese had practical proof at Tamasi and Tamanieb that even the Mahdi, by whose orders they fought, and in whose service they died, could not save them from either death or defeat, a proof the more impressive, as their best fighting men, their leaders, were the first to fall. They broke, dispersed, and fled in complete disorder in every direction, never to rally again, until encouraged to do so by the policy of the Government. He took a glance at the great interests which the Government had sacrificed, and the bad passions of rebellion, anarchy, and massacres, which they had developed by their retreat. From the moment the transports conveying our soldiers disappeared from Suakin the Mahdi and all the former germs of disorder revived, and every newspaper teemed with afflicting accounts of the desperate state of things in the Soudan. But had Admiral Hewett and General Graham "par nobile fratrum, quos gloria junxit," remained, they would, with the good common sense of Englishmen, have established temporary order and government by the issue of a resolute and sensible Proclamation calling on the Native authorities of every grade to do their duty faithfully, promising them support and reward if they acted with loyalty, justice, and energy; and, on the other hand, proclaiming suspension from their duties if they acted in a contrary manner. The English Commanders might have collected confidential information respecting the Slave Trade, which would have enabled Her Majesty's Government, in concert, if possible, with the Egyptian Government, to adopt measures calculated to lessen the horrors of slavery, although unable to abolish it altogether. Worst of all, the Government abandoned, and exposed to great peril, their Representative in Soudan, at Khartoum, the only fortified stronghold in Upper Egypt. The excuses the Government had made were of no avail, and the country would universally condemn the policy which Her Majesty's Government had pursued.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have listened with attention to the interesting essay which my noble and gallant Friend has been good enough to read to us; and your Lordships will easily understand that I do not feel myself competent to enter into the military details with which his Questions are chiefly concerned. I say Questions, because the Notice he has given is really more of an argumentative statement of his views. I shall, therefore, shortly say, with regard to his first Question, that Her Majesty's Government are certainly of opinion that the only object of keeping the body of General Graham's Army at Suakin after the victory he gained would have been if we intended to send them on to Berber. We believe, rightly or wrongly, that the difficulties of sending large bodies of troops to Berber at that time were great indeed. I think it would have been possible to have sent a few Cavalry; but the thing would have been one of extreme risk, and certainly recent events have not disproved the necessity of the caution we exercised in that respect. With regard to the second and third Questions, I can only say I do not agree with the views of my noble and gallant Friend; and, as regards the fourth, I will not now give an opinion. Papers lately presented give some reasons against the use of Indian troops for this particular service; and I may remind my noble and gallant Friend that another distinguished officer, Lord Napier of Magdala, though disagreeing with the Government, deprecated the other day the use of Indian troops, and wished that British troops should be exclusively employed in any operations that might be undertaken.

QUESTIONS.

WAR OFFICE—CLERKS OF THE LOWER DIVISION—HOLIDAYS AND SICK LEAVE.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the Petitions which he has received during the last five years from Lower Division Clerks in the War Office, on the subject of holidays and sick leave, What are the points which have been referred to the Treasury; on what dates the first and last communications to the Treasury were made; whether any reply has been received from the Treasury; and, when he expects to be in a position to give his decision on the questions referred to in the Petitions?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that the communication with the Treasury on the subject referred to in the Question had not yet been concluded. As soon as a final reply had been received from the Treasury, he would have no objection to give whatever information he possessed on the subject.

BURIALS—NONCONFORMIST FUNERALS AT MAIDENHEAD.

MR. G. PALMER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has seen a statement in The Maidenhead Advertiser of 19th March, that, at the burial by a Nonconformist minister, in the churchyard of All Saints, Boyne Hill, Maidenhead, of a girl named Annie Barnes, the funeral party were not allowed to enter by the churchyard gates, but had to enter through an opening in the churchyard fence, which had been made for the purpose; whether he is aware that this is the second occasion on which the same obstruction has been offered to a Nonconformist burial in All Saints' churchyard, and that the vicar, the Rev. A. H. Drummond, has declared his determination to pursue a similar course in future; and, whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the facts; and, if they prove to be as stated, will give directions for instituting legal proceedings against the vicar?

EARL PERCY said, he would ask, in reference to the same statement, Whether it is the fact that the church, vicarage, schools, and curate's house form a quadrangle, out of which a path leads through and under the church tower to the churchyard, which lies entirely on the other side of the church, and that, consequently, this path is only used by funerals which go to the church; whether the "opening in the churchyard fence," referred to in The Maidenhead Advertiser, is an entrance which has existed for many years, with gravel properly laid up to it, giving direct access to the churchyard; and, whether at the time of the funeral the gates of the quadrangle were unfastened, and many of the attendants actually went through them?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have received a communication from the Vicar, from which it appears that the facts are correctly stated in the Question of the noble Lord. I may state that the Vicar writes that he has already written to inform the Bishop that he is willing, in deference to his Lordship, in future to permit such funerals to use the entrance through the gates of the quadrangle if it is desired. I hope this will put an end to any further difficulty.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—THE WEST INDIA COLONIES AND THE UNITED STATES.

MR. TENNANT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Earl of Derby had yet come to a decision on the points raised by the recent West Indian deputation, especially as to the inclusion of the West Indian Colonies in the favoured nation clause with the United States, and the proposed allowance of reciprocal trade or tariff arrangements between the Colonies themselves and the United States?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No decision has yet been arrived at on the points mentioned; but my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) is in communication with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and both the Colonial and Foreign Office are giving their earnest attention to the matter.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHING TREATIES—REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMISSION.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Anglo-French Commission, which has recently been sitting in Paris, on the subject of the Newfoundland Fishing Treaties, has made its Report; if so, whether such Report will be laid upon the Table of the House before it comes into operation; if not, whether such Report contains provision to render the assent of the Newfoundland Legislature a condition precedent to such Report having any operation; and, whether the Report denies, and sets at rest, the pretensions of France to any territorial rights beyond those expressly conceded on the seashore to the subjects of that nation by treaty, for mere fishery purposes?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The Joint Commission will not make any Report. It was appointed for the purpose of considering whether any arrangement could be made for the continued exercise of the French fishery rights in such a manner as to give increased facilities for British subjects and the development of Colonial industries. The British Commissioners have signed a project of arrangement, subject to the confirmation of the two Governments, and the Newfoundland Government will be consulted before the arrangement is confirmed. The two British Commissioners will go to Newfoundland to explain what is proposed. Papers will be presented to Parliament containing the Reports made to Her Majesty's Government by the British Commissioners and other correspondents. The French Government put forward no pretension to any territorial rights beyond those expressly conceded by Treaty for fishing purposes on the seashore, and Her Majesty's Government believe that the new arrangement, which keeps within the lines of the Treaties, will prove very advantageous to British interests.

In reply to a further Question from Mr. JOSEPH COWEN,

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: There are provisions in the projected arrangement which will undoubtedly require the consent of the Colonial Legislature to give them validity.

POST OFFICE—TELEPHONE LICENCES.

MR. GRAY asked the Postmaster General, Whether the licence granted by the Post Office to the Northern Telephone Company for a Telephone Exchange at Newcastle-on-Tyne contained a condition requiring the Company to sell to the Postmaster General, on terms to be fixed by arbitration in default of agreement, as many telephonic instruments as he might demand for use by him in any place and for any purpose he may think fit; whether such a condition exists in former similar licences; whether, at the time such licence was executed, the Department was in possession of and had official cognisance of the terms of the licences granted by the United Telephone Company, of which the Northern Telephone Company is a subsidiary Company to all its subsidiary Companies, one of the conditions of which is that the United Company shall not sell for use, or permit to be used, the telephonic instruments of which it controls the patents in the districts of the subsidiary Companies save through the said Companies; whether, at the time such licence was granted and accepted, the Department was in possession of a copy of the licence of the United Company to the Northern Company containing the above stipulations applicable, amongst other places, to Newcastle-on-Tyne; whether the Department was at that time officially aware that the Northern Company did not own, and had no right to sell, any of the telephonic instruments known as the "Blake Transmitters" and "Edison Receivers," having only the user of them for its district from the United Company; whether, under the circumstances, in the event of the Northern Company using the "Blake Transmitter" or "Edison Receiver" at Newcastle, he intends to seek to enforce the clause in the Post Office licence requiring the Company to sell to him instruments which it does not own and cannot sell; and, whether, in the event of the Department by any means obtaining possession of or control over "Blake Transmitters" or "Edison Receivers," it will attempt to use them in any of the districts of any of the subsidiary Companies to which the United Company has already sold the right of exclusive use of those patent instruments under agreements, of which the Post Office had official knowledge when it granted its licences to the said Companies?

MR. FAWCETT: I think it would not be possible, without describing in detail the policy of the Post Office with regard to telephone licences, to give a full answer to all the Questions which have been addressed to me by the hon. Member; and it is less necessary that I should do so in view of the Notice he has given of raising a debate on the entire subject when the Telegraph Estimates are considered. I may say, however, that the licence which was granted to the Northern District Telephone Company was in every respect the same as that which it was decided to grant, after the conclusion was come to nearly two years ago to allow any responsible persons, on conditions which were considered necessary in the interests of the public, to obtain a telephone licence. I was aware of the general nature of the relations existing between the United Telephone Company and the Northern District Telephone Company at the time the licence was granted to the latter Company for Newcastle; and it was, in my opinion, for the Northern District Company, who were in intimate relations with the United Telephone Company, to consider how they could carry out the stipulation which they agreed to accept. There has been no occasion hitherto for the Department to call upon the Company to fulfil the condition of supplying telephones which they are using; but I do not think it would be expedient for me to give any assurance which might fetter the action which, in future, it might be in the interests of the public desirable for the Department to take with regard to obtaining a supply of telephones and the manner in which they should be used.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)—
UNCLAIMED DIVIDENDS.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any steps have been taken to discover and pay to the proper owners the forty thousand pounds which is lying derelict in the Irish Bankruptcy Court?

MR. COURTNEY: I am sorry to say this matter is still unsettled; but steps are being taken to enable any bond fide claimant to dividends to search for and discover whether any sum owing to him is lying derelict in the Irish Court of Bankruptcy. I do not think the burden can be thrown upon the Court of searching out claimants, as notice is always given to creditors when dividends are declared.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked why the list that was annually made out was not published, so that the people might see what the dividends were?

MR. COURTNEY: The lists are quite open to the public.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA — COST OF ANNUAL CHANGE OF LOCATION.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the annual dates since the transfer of the Government of India to the Crown in 1858, of the migration of the Government of India from Calcutta to Simla, and the dates of its return to Calcutta; and, the extra annual cost imposed upon the taxpayers of India in consequence of this annual migration of Government? He would also ask, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the ages of the respective members of the Indian Council, their professions, the length of time which each has resided or served in India, and the period which has in each case elapsed since the termination of such residence or service?

MR. J. K. CROSS: There are no materials at the India Office which will enable me to give the first Return asked for; but the question shall be submitted to the Government of India. The second Return shall be presented, if the hon. and learned Member will move for it; and if he will consult me as to the form of the Return, it shall be made as complete as possible.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE RAJAH OF TENOM—THE CREW OF THE "NISERO."

MR. STOREY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any further news of the crew of the Nisero, of Sunderland; and, whether, in view of the fact that those British subjects have been prisoners now for some months, any and what effectual steps are to be taken to secure their release?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government have received Mr. Maxwell's Report of his mission to Tenom, which I regret to say has been "unsuccessful. It contains a copy of a letter, dated the 10th of March, from the chief officer of the Nisero, acknowledging the receipt of clothing and provisions, and stating that, although suffering himself in health, the rest of the crew were well. A telegram has since been received from Singapore, to the effect that the latest news of the crew was of the 31st of March, when it was reported that one of the crew—an Italian—had died, that three were ill, and that the party were in great straits for want of food. Telegraphic instructions were immediately despatched to the Governor of Singapore and the senior naval officer to make every effort to convey provisions to them. A telegram has been received in answer from Singapore, announcing that H.M.S. Pegasus leaves for Tenom to-day with supplies for three months. In consequence of Mr. Maxwell's report as to the origin of these hostilities, Her Majesty's Government have placed themselves in communication with the Netherlands Government with a view to offering their mediation, and thereby obtaining the release of the prisoners and a cessation of hostilities.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND —SYLLABUS OF LECTURES, &c.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there would be any objection to direct that every Fellow of the University and every Examiner who receives pupils should for the future print for public circulation a complete and explicit syllabus of his lectures, with a full list of the works to which in his lectures he is in the habit of referring, said syllabus to be carefully revised each session; that a copy of such syllabus be forwarded, at the expense of the University, to all candidates in the special courses; that the calendars of the several colleges to which fellowships are allotted shall be published before the next ensuing University examinations begin, the addresses of the establishments where they are sold to be inserted in The Royal University Calendar?

MR. TREVELYAN: So far as I have been able to ascertain, the preponderance of opinion among gentlemen in responsible positions in connection with the Royal University and the Queen's Colleges is not favourable to the proposition contained in the earlier part of the Question. The reasons given are rather of an argumentative character, and the very complicated nature of the proposals and of the objections to them—the Royal University being opposed, and the Queen's Colleges divided in the matter—renders the subject one which can hardly be satisfactorily dealt with in answer to a Question, but may properly be referred to the impending Commission. With regard to the suggested publication of the College calendars before the time fixed for the Royal University examinations, I believe that, in the case of the Queen's Colleges, this is already done. I am informed that they are published "two months, six months, and some months" before.

THE TRUCK ACT—SICK CLUBS AND PENSION FUNDS.

MR. BROADHURST asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the stoppage of a portion of workmen's wages by employers, for the purpose of contributions to sick clubs or pension funds, is a violation of the Truck Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that there had been a decision on this subject given by the Court of Appeal in February last; but he was sorry to say that it was somewhat complicated. The result seemed to him to be that the practice described in the Question would be within the Truck Act, unless the payments were made under written agreement to the effect that they should be allowed, or unless they were absolutely paid over to the medical officer of the Society.

RESTORATION OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY—LEGISLATION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is now able to state when the measure will be introduced which is to provide the funds required for the urgent repairs of Westminster Abbey?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that the Bill to provide funds for the restoration of Westminster Abbey was in a forward state of preparation. It would also provide for the maintenance of cathedrals generally.

Mr. Trevelyan

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO TREATY.

MR. HOULDSWORTH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the event of the Treaty with Portugal being ratified, the various Treaties and Engagements between Her Majesty the Queen of England and the chiefs and headmen of the Congo River and adjoining territory, recorded in the Paper, "Africa (No. 3, 1883)," will be thereby cancelled; if so, whether the said chiefs have given their consent; if not, how Her Majesty's Government propose to fulfil their obligations under these Treaties, or to enforce the stipulations contained therein in respect to the suppression of the slave trade and to freedom of commerce? He would further ask whether any representations have reached the Foreign Office from the Congo Natives by the steamer Senegal, which arrived this week?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have already answered this Question, and have stated that the Treaties and Engagements will be superseded by the Treaty with Portugal. The Treaty not only takes full security for the suppression of the Slave Trade, but contains new and valuable stipulations with that object. The Foreign Office has not received any information by the Senegal.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: My noble Friend has not answered the Question whether the Chiefs have given their consent to the new Treaty?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I stated the other day that they were not consulted.

THE CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS—AMALGAMATION.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is in contemplation to amalgamate the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments; and, if so, when the amalgamation is likely to take place?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, he was not at present aware of any such intention.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—FLOODS OF THE LOWER BANN.

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, When he expects to lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Board of Works upon the Floods of the Lower Bann, which, several weeks since, he mentioned as having been received by the Treasury?

MR. COURTNEY: The Government are giving their best consideration to the question how, and by whom, the present unsatisfactory condition of the Lower Bann is to be remedied; but as my hon. Friend thinks that it will be useful to publish at once the Report of the Engineer to the Board of Works, we have no objection to doing so, and I will lay it on the Table of the House as soon as possible.

AFRICA (EAST COAST)—THE SLAVE TRADE.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a Copy has ever been presented to Parliament of that "Draft Treaty for the development of commerce and suppression of the Slave Trade on the East Coast of Africa," which is stated by Lord Granville in his Despatch of January 23rd, 1883 (Africa, No. 2, C. 3885, pp. 9 and 10), to have "formed the subject of negotiation between the two Governments (of Portugal and the United Kingdom) between 1878 and 1881;" and, if so, whether he will kindly give the House a reference to the volume in which such Copy can be found; and, if not, whether he will now lay a Copy upon the Table of this House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The draft of the Treaty for which negotiations were initiated by the late Government and subsequently suspended, was not presented to Parliament, as it is contrary to the usual practice to do so. I may, however, add that the Articles referred to in the despatch which the hon. Member quotes are given at full length in a foot-note for the information of the House.

PUBLIC OFFICES—THE NEW WAR OFFICE AND ADMIRALTY—NEW DESIGNS.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he can give the House any further information as to the result of the recent competition for the erection of the New War Office and Admiralty?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that 128 persons had sent in designs, of which the judges had selected nine, the authors of which were to compete with more elaborate designs to be sent in on June 21, when judgment would be given.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—CONVENT NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Has he yet formulated his plan for increase of emoluments for Convent National Schools in Ireland; and, if so, will he give some particulars of his scheme?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, no plan has yet been formulated; but the Irish Government has been in communication with the Commissioners of National Education since the debate raised by the hon. Gentleman. I may state, however, that in the event of the Treasury consenting to any arrangement which would involve increased expenditure, the Estimates which are already before the House would not admit of such arrangement taking effect during the present financial year.

MR. BIGGAR: Could not the right hon. Gentleman bring in a Supplementary Estimate?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Treasury should be consulted, and I am afraid there would be considerable difficulty in getting them to consent.

NAVY—THE GUNBOAT "FORWARD."

MR. TOMLINSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the statement in The Times of the 20th March, to the effect that on the 9th March the Forward gun vessel, tender to the Channel Squadron, arrived from Malta and had to lie to for forty - five hours, being very much overladen, and had to throw overboard a large quantity of her deck cargo; and, whether the Board of Trade possess any jurisdiction over vessels belonging to the Royal Navy?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, the Board of Trade had no jurisdiction over vessels of the Royal Navy. As to the statement contained in the first part of the Question, he had been informed by the Admiralty that the Forward gunboat arrived safely at Suda Bay. The Admiralty had no information, confirmatory or otherwise, of the statement contained in the Question.

INDIA (MADRAS)—THE MYSORE TERRITORY—CONCESSIONS TO BRITISH OFFICIALS.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Madras Officials, who are Concessionaires of the gold yielding land conceded on advantageous terms to them by the British Resident of Mysore during the Regency of the Rajah, continue to receive their pensions and salaries; and, if so, whether this is in accordance with the rulings of the Secretary of State's Despatches, No. 22, of 25th November 1862, and No. 17, of 9th July 1863, categorically prohibiting Civil and Military Officers from holding land in the Mysore territory?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: The Government of India, some months ago, directed that the three officers connected with the Mysore concession who are still in the Service should at once sever such connection. They do not, however, think it necessary to go further than this, having no doubt that these officers acted in the bona fide belief that they were not contravening the orders of the Government in acquiring their shares in the concession. As regards retired officers concerned in the matter, Government has no ground for interfering with their pensions. The Papers explaining in more detail the views of the Government of India and of the Secretary of State are now complete; and if the hon. Member will move for them they shall be presented.

BOARD OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—BUILDING GRANTS FOR SCHOOLS.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the National Education Commissioners have made a rule under which assistance is refused towards the erection of any school, even though vested in local trustees, if the teachers employed in it are religious men or women; and, if so, what is the reason of the rule?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Under the rules of the National Education Board, schools taught by men or women belonging to religious Orders are ranked as convent or monastery schools, and are therefore ineligible to receive building grants. The rule in the matter is not a new one, but has been in operation for many years.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether it was a fact that any school belonging to private persons, although certificated teachers, were deprived of assistance from the mere fact that they were held by nuns?

Mr. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that that was a case that obviously would seldom occur, and he would not like to interpret off-hand the rule with regard to it. He would like to have a case brought before him, before deciding the point.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether, within the last few days, the Commissioners of National Education had written to a parish priest in the Queen's County, stating, with regard to a school vested in local trustees, that whether vested or non-vested, the school to get assistance must be taught by lay teachers.

Mr. TREVELYAN: Yes, I will inquire.

THE MAURITIUS (CONSTITUTION AND GOVERNMENT).

Mr. WODEHOUSE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether representations have been made to Her Majesty's Government in favour of changes in the constitution of the Colony of Mauritius; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the Table of this House any Correspondence relating to the subject?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir, there have been such proposals, and the Correspondence on the subject is being prepared for presentation to Parliament and is nearly ready.

THE NATIONAL DEBT—REDUCTION OF INTEREST.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, seeing that the Prime Minister, when Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1853, declared in his Budget speech, with reference to the reduction of the interest on the Public Debt, "that a large operation of a compulsory character was out of the question," he will explain whether the note appended to the National Debt Act of 1876, from which he now claims to derive compulsory power, has, since its enactment in 1752, acquired a new signification, or whether he derives such power from other, and, if other, what statute?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I have spent some time in reading the Budget Speech of 1853, and I am sorry to say that I have failed to find the words which my right hon. Friend quotes; but whatever the circumstances of 1853 may have been considered to be, those of 1884 are such as in our opinion justify the plan about the Debt which I have explained to the House. The Act—not of 1876, as my right hon. Friend says, but of 1870—consolidates the enactments relating to the Debt, and what he calls “a note appended to the Act” is the Schedule, the terms of which as to Consols and Reduced Three per Cents are explicit.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD: What authority has the right hon. Gentleman for the assumption that he has compulsory power for the conversion of Consols?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): It would be impossible to explain the arrangements as to compulsory conversion in an answer to a Question. I will give full information on this subject in debate.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any and what action, in the conversion of Three per Cent. Stock into Two and a-half per Cent. Stock, has been taken, consequent on “The National Debt Act, 1884,” and, if action has been taken, he will present to the House a statement of the amounts and terms of conversion, including the rate of interest at which the Terminable Annuities were calculated, and the amount and nature of the addition given beyond the equivalent value; and, whether, also, the operation has been with the public or the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): In reply to my right hon. Friend I have to say that under the National Debt Act, 1884, £4,000,000 Consols held by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt on account of the Post Office Savings’ Banks Fund were cancelled as from the 28th of March last, and the Commissioners received in exchange £4,000,000 Two-and-a-Half per Cent

Stock, with an annuity for 20 years of £35,121. A copy of the Treasury Warrant under which this conversion was made was presented to Parliament on the 3rd of April last, but was not printed. The market price of Consols being 102½, and the market price of Two-and-a-Half per Cents being 90½, the difference was 11½, and to this difference 2 per cent was added, under the arrangement between the Treasury and the Commissioners provided for by the Act. The rate of interest at which the Terminable Annuity was calculated was 1·4769 per cent for half a-year, that being the interest yielded by Consols at the price of 102½. The Acts authorizing the operation limit it to stock held by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt on account of Post Office Savings Banks.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked whether it was within the scheme to lay aside one-half per cent saved in interest as a sinking fund for the National Debt? The right hon. Gentleman did not refer to the matter in his Budget Speech.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS), in reply, said: On the contrary, I fully explained the point in my Financial Statement, and my remarks were accurately reported in The Times.

STREET TRAFFIC (METROPOLIS)—CONGESTION AT KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

VISCOUNT NEWPORT asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether his attention has been directed to the dangerously congested state of the traffic at Knightsbridge; and, whether he can make any suggestion for relieving it?

SIR JAMES M’GAREL-HOGG: If I am correct in assuming that the part of Knightsbridge referred to by my noble Friend is that close to Albert Gate, I may inform him that my attention has been called to a congestion of traffic there, although I should not go so far as to speak of it as dangerous. Looking, however, to other more urgent improvements which the Metropolitan Board is called upon to carry out, and to the great expense which widening the Knightsbridge Road would involve, I am not, at the present time, prepared to offer any suggestion for relieving the traffic there.

METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY.

MR. GREGORY asked the honourable Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens), Whether he will consent to limit the operation of the Waterworks Clauses Act (1847) Amendment Bill to the Metropolitan area, and to introduce Amendments to that effect in the Committee on the Bill?

MR. W. M. TORRENS, in reply, was understood to say that the promoters of the Bill would offer no objection to an Amendment limiting the operation of the measure as desired. They would thus be enabled to make applicable the provisions of the Valuation Act of 1869, which only extended to London. He further wished to state that if any doubt were entertained by the Companies as to their legal right to contest the ruling of the Assessment Committees or of the Assessment Sessions, no objection would be made to the insertion of a clause in Committee expressly giving them a locus standi for the purpose.

EGYPT—MR. O'KELLY, M.P. FOR ROSCOMMON.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as Mr. O'Kelly, M.P. is an accredited special correspondent of a London daily newspaper, and as he has been stopped at Dongola, on his way to the residence of the Mahdi, where he contemplated carrying out his instructions in regard to his correspondence with the aforesaid newspaper, he will telegraph to Dongola informing the Egyptian authorities there of the peaceful character of Mr. O'Kelly's intentions, and intimating to them that he ought not to be hindered from fulfilling his duties to his employers; and, whether it is to be understood that special correspondents of English newspapers may be prevented, by the Egyptian officials in the Soudan, from proceeding to the residence of the Mahdi?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: Might I ask whether Mr. O'Kelly is not the specially accredited correspondent of an American newspaper?

MR. LABOUCHERE: If the hon. Member asks me, I may say he is not. He is acting exclusively for a London newspaper.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have ascertained that, as I stated the other day, Mr. O'Kelly was not arrested; but that, on the 27th of March last, he was informed at Dongola by the Governor that he could not start for Obeid. It is believed he has started for Lower Egypt. The Egyptian Government, with our concurrence, acted entirely within their right in taking the above steps. The answer to the second part of my hon. Friend's Question would depend on the circumstances of each particular case. Mr. O'Kelly was not at all interfered with as a newspaper correspondent, and I need hardly say there is no intention of interfering with newspaper correspondents properly authorized.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I did not gather from the noble Lord on what grounds Mr. O'Kelly was detained; whether he, being an accredited correspondent for a London journal, was rightly and justly stopped by the Egyptian authorities; and I, therefore, ask on what grounds he was stopped?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: He was stopped on grounds of public policy, having reference to the relative positions of the Mahdi, Mr. O'Kelly, and the Egyptian Government.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I have not yet gathered any answer to my Question why Mr. O'Kelly was stopped, because Mr. O'Kelly had not then made the acquaintance of the Mahdi; therefore, I ask on what specific ground was he stopped?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am afraid I cannot give any clearer answer than I have already given.

MR. PARNELL: I wish to ask the noble Lord, whether he has not been informed, on good authority, that the commission which Mr. O'Kelly received from the London newspaper was a commission to reach the Mahdi, and to act as the correspondent of that London newspaper in the camp of the Mahdi; and, if so, how can he say that Mr. O'Kelly has not been interfered with as a newspaper correspondent?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question, it was assumed in the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) that Mr. O'Kelly was the correspondent of a newspaper, and I answered it on that assumption. In regard to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, it would be better if he would give Notice of it,

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Are we to understand that the English Government is at war with the Mahdi, or is he at war with any friendly Power; and, if not, will the noble Lord say whether any Englishman or Irishman could not proceed to his Court?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I think that Question involves matter of argument.

MR. O'BRIEN: Might I ask the noble Lord, whether he has any information that it was at the instigation of Mr. Clifford Lloyd that Mr. O'Kelly was stopped?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL—THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in the event of the Merchant Shipping Bill becoming Law, it would in any respect bring within the scope of its provisions vessels belonging to the Dominion of Canada and other of our Colonies?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, certain provisions of the Merchant Shipping Bill—for example, those relating to compulsory pilotage, to detention, and to inquiries—cannot apply outside the limits of the United Kingdom, but will apply to Colonial vessels within those limits. Certain other provisions, such as those relating to insurance, to liability, and to tonnage, which are not limited to the United Kingdom, like existing provisions on the same subjects in Acts already passed, apply to all British ships, including ships belonging to Canada and the Colonies, subject, however, to provisions in the Merchant Shipping Acts which give to Colonial Legislatures, should they think fit so to do, power to alter the law with respect to ships registered within their jurisdiction.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL PROPOSALS—PROPOSED RESTORATION OF THE GOLD COINAGE.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is the intention of the Government to take light half-sovereigns at their nominal value in exchange for sovereigns during the next three months; and, if so, whether there will be any limit imposed in respect either of the amount which may be tendered by any one person at any one time, or in respect of deficiency allowed on individual coins; and, whether the Treasury has received any precise information as to the number of half-sovereigns now in the Banks of Australia and other Colonies?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that, under the law as it now stands, light half-sovereigns are not current coin of the Realm, and that Government is debarred from giving sovereigns for them if they are not of their nominal value. If the Bill which I am about to introduce passes, we shall take steps, with the aid of the banks, to withdraw all light half-sovereigns at their nominal value, by giving a sovereign for every two half-sovereigns, unless they have been tampered with or are 4*d.* below that value, in which case they will be, as now, treated as bullion. We have no information as to the number of half-sovereigns which may happen to be at any given time in the banks of Australia or other Colonies; but the total amount of half-sovereigns issued from the Sydney and Melbourne Mints since their foundation is less than £2,500,000 worth, and half-sovereigns are not usually sent as remittances to or from the United Kingdom.

In reply to a further Question,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS) said, he did not think it would be possible to withdraw the whole of the light half-sovereigns within three months; but they would be withdrawn as soon as possible.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ARRESTS AT TUBBERCURRY, CO. SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the case of the eleven persons arrested at Tubbercurry, county Sligo, more than a month ago, upon a charge of conspiracy, the accused have been several times remanded after having, on each occasion, been brought before a magistrate in private, and although no evidence tending to criminate any of them was on any occasion produced on the part of the Crown; whether the accused have not been allowed to see their friends, professional or otherwise; whether the stipendiary magistrate who ordered the remands denies having made any order to debar the prisoners from receiving visits; and, if so, who is the person responsible for preventing communication between the prisoners, their advisers, and their friends; and, whether, with reference to the expiration, on Friday next, of the current remand in these cases, the agents of the Crown have been instructed to cause or assent to a public hearing of the charge, and to agree to the discharge of the prisoners from custody unless a case is put in evidence against them? He would further ask, in view of the undertaking given by the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion, that the examination of these men to-day would be held in public, and that the Crown would use every effort to have that done, whether the following telegram despatched to him (Mr. Sexton) that afternoon, from Sligo Prison, accurately represented what had taken place:—

“Remanded again in gaol to-day without going into evidence. We believe they intend to rob us first, and then try to convict us?”

MR. TREVELYAN: It is true that the prisoners have been four times remanded without evidence being adduced against them; but the remand in each case was upon affidavit, showing it to be necessary for the interests of justice. Their professional adviser and their immediate relatives have not been refused access to them, and the remanding magistrate denies he has given any instructions for such refusal, as none has taken place. I am informed that one further short remand until Monday next will be necessary, when evidence will be gone into against all the prisoners, and the investigation will be held in public.

MR. SEXTON asked if they might take it as settled beyond any doubt that that course would be taken next Monday?

MR. TREVELYAN: That will certainly be done.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES —THE BROOK STREET, LIMEHOUSE, SCHEME.

MR. RITCHIE asked the honourable baronet the Member for Truro, What number of the labouring class will be displaced for the purposes of the Brook Street, Limehouse, Scheme, confirmed by “The Metropolis (Brook Street, Limehouse) Provisional Order Act,” 1883, and upon what terms the land, when cleared, will be let for the purposes of the Act; and, whether it will be possible to arrange that the area may be cleared in sections, so that rebuilding may proceed pari passu with the demolition of the existing buildings?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: Sir, I beg to state that 562 persons of the working class will be displaced for the purposes of this improvement scheme; and the Board will have to let the site, when cleared, with reference to the fact that it has to be appropriated for the purpose of accommodating at least 562 of the labouring class, a circumstance which will no doubt render it necessary for the Board to accept much below the market value of the land. Having regard to the limited character of the area, there would be considerable difficulty in arranging so that the rebuilding may take place in sections pari passu with the clearance of the site; but the suggestion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) in this respect shall receive the consideration of the Board.

LAW AND JUSTICE—POLICE— LICENSED VICTUALLERS AS SURETIES.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the slur cast upon the body of licensed victuallers by a refusal on the part of Mr. Lushington, one of the magistrates at the Thames Police Court, to accept a member of that trade as security for a person bound over to keep the peace, not because he doubted the solvency of the publican, but because he made it a rule never to accept a publican as security for a person bound over to keep the peace; and, whether such a ground of refusal was justifiable in Law?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that, in his view of the case, the magistrate's discretion was confined to the amount of bail, and to the sufficiency of the security offered, and, therefore, a person who offered sufficient security could not be refused, on the ground of the particular nature of his employment. He would communicate to the magistrate that view, which was the view of the chief magistrates of the United Kingdom, and he had no doubt it would be acted on.

Mr. Sexton

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— BERBER.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have received confirmation of the following statements made by the Cairo Correspondent of The Standard, on the 29th :—

“The last act of the Soudan tragedy is evidently at hand. Mr. Egerton received a telegram late last night from Berber, stating that no sums of money could guarantee the delivery of any message through to Khartoum, all of whose inhabitants are now at the mercy of the rebels; four sanjaks or divisions of Shageeyah Bedouins, together with five hundred soldiers, have joined the rebels, leaving Khartoum helpless; the Governor of Berber, acting on instructions sent to him to evacuate the town, if possible, merely proclaimed the fact, with the result that the inhabitants fled northwards, while the troops marched out south to join the insurgents;”

whether the telegrams to the Governor of Berber, refusing him military aid, and telling him to evacuate Berber, were sent by the authority of the British Cabinet; whether General Gordon was first consulted; and, by what road the 2,000 women and children at Berber are to escape?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In reply to the first part of the hon. Member's Question, I have already informed the House that Mr. Egerton has telegraphed that no messenger could be found to proceed from Berber to Khartoum, and that the Shageeyah Bedouins who joined the rebels were at Berber, and not at Khartoum. The message to the Governor of Berber will be found in the Papers now before the House. I may add that it was not, of course, possible to consult General Gordon on this matter. There is only one practicable road at this moment from Berber—namely, vid Abou Hamed to Korosko.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Will the noble Lord be good enough to say whether the instructions to the Governor of Berber were sent by the authority of Her Majesty's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he had stated already that they would be found in the Papers before the House.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Surely the noble Lord can say that?

ACTS—MOVEMENT OF DISEASED CATTLE.

MR. HICKS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he is yet in a position to give the House detailed information respecting the movements of the 101 bullocks which arrived in Cambridgeshire during the night of 14th April, from the time they were taken out of the ship which brought them to England till the hour they were placed in the Railway trucks at Liverpool; whether he can now state (supposing they came in the ship Quebec, from Canada, as he informed the House on the 24th), what has become of the rest of the cargo; and, whether he will direct the Government veterinary inspector and the chief of police at Liverpool and, if necessary, at Birkenhead, to supply the authorities of Cambridgeshire with all the information they have been able, or may hereafter be able, to obtain?

MR. DODSON: Sir, we are now in possession of full information on this subject. These 101 bullocks formed part of two cargoes landed from Canada on the 9th and 12th of April. They were passed healthy by our Inspector on landing, and again by the Market Inspector, when they were exposed for sale in Stanley Market on the 14th, having been in a lair adjoining the market during the interval between their landing and exposure in the market. These 101 bullocks were sent to Cambridgeshire, and on the 17th of April foot-and-mouth disease appeared among them. Fifty-one of them went to Wimpole, and 50 were slaughtered at Cambridge. The rest of the two cargoes were distributed to various towns, and no outbreak has been reported among them. Thus this information accounts for the whole of both cargoes, and I shall be happy to furnish all or any part of it to the Cambridgeshire local authorities, if they think it would be useful to them.

MR. HICKS asked whether the lair in which those cattle were kept, from the time of their landing to the 14th of April, was at any time used for keeping cattle brought to this country for immediate slaughter?

MR. DODSON: The hon. Member must be aware that cattle from countries from which there is free admission—

Canada, for example—are not landed at the same places as cattle that come from other countries, and are to be slaughtered.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—KILMEEN ELECTORAL DIVISION, KANTURK UNION.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the successful National candidate for the Kilmeen Division of the Kanturk Union, at the recent Poor Law election, has received a letter from Mrs. Smith, of Blossomfort, stating that she was obliged to break her promise to vote for him in consequence of receiving two letters from her landlord, Mr. Richard Longfield, Justice of the Peace and Deputy Lieutenant, directing her to vote for his opponent, a rent-warner on a neighbouring estate, who himself presented to her the second letter from Mr. Longfield; whether he is aware that a Mr. Horgan, who remained neutral in the same contest, notwithstanding a letter from Mr. Longfield directing him to support his candidate, was afterwards requested by Mr. Longfield to return his letter, and, on his replying that he had mislaid it, was informed that his services as gamekeeper in Mr. Longfield's service were dispensed with until the letter should be returned; whether there is any legal remedy for intimidation of this description; and, whether Mr. Longfield's conduct will be brought to the attention of the Lord Chancellor?

MR. TREVELYAN: The facts appear to be that Mr. Longfield, junior, son of the gentleman mentioned in the Question, wrote two letters to Mrs. Smith, asking her to vote for the candidate whom he considered the more fitting of the two. This candidate was not, as stated, a rent-warner on a neighbouring estate; but his opponent, the successful candidate, did occupy such a position. Mrs. Smith emphatically denies that, in writing to the latter, she gave him the slightest grounds for saying that she was in any way intimidated by Mr. Longfield's letters. With regard to the case of Horgan, I am informed that Mr. Longfield, junior, wrote to him also on behalf of the same candidate, and that hearing, subsequently, that his letter was misrepresented, as conveying a threat, he asked Horgan to return it in order that he might see how it was open to such a construction. Horgan did not comply with the request, but he did not allege that he had mislaid the letter. Nothing was said to him about his being dismissed if he did not return it. His dismissal had no connection with this matter, but was on account of "extreme carelessness and neglect" of his duties as gamekeeper and bog ranger—on account of which he had been warned long before the election took place. He did not think there had been any intimidation for which there was a legal remedy, nor did he think that Mr. Longfield's conduct should be brought to the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. O'BRIEN asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would consider the advisability of introducing a Corrupt Practices Bill in reference to Poor Law Elections?

PUBLIC HEALTH—DEATHS FROM CHARBON.

MR. GRANTHAM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the frequent deaths among the men in one of the tan yards in Bermondsey, from a disease affecting cattle in foreign countries, called "charbon," and which is inoculated upon persons handling the hides of animals which were affected with the disease which is very fatal to human beings; and, as the families of the men so dying have been unable to obtain compensation under the Employers' Liability Act, if he will make such inquiries as will enable them to make better provision for the safety of the men working in these yards; and, if possible, to ensure some compensation to their families on their death?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We have not failed to observe the occurrence of anthrax or charbon among persons engaged in the hide and skin trades of Bermondsey, and have caused inquiry to be made by one of our Medical Inspectors—the Inspector who recently investigated the same disease as it occurred among wool sorters in and about Bradford. In all, during the past 11 years, between 40 and 50 cases of anthrax, about a quarter of them fatal, are known to have occurred in the Metropolis among persons thus engaged, about half this number of cases and of deaths having occurred during the last two years. They have not been restricted to one single tanyard. A Report on the subject has been presented to Parliament, and will soon be in the hands of Members. The more recent aspects of the matter, however, are now being inquired into. Pending this inquiry, it would be premature to consider whether the Employers' Liability Act should be extended to meet cases of persons dying from the disease referred to, so as to give compensation to their families.

THE COINAGE—MINT CHARGES ABROAD.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, as Master of the Mint, If his deputy has prepared a paper showing the mintage charge on the coinage of other countries; and, if he will make of it a Parliamentary Paper; and, if there are at the Mint calculations showing the average cost of coining (apart from metal) a single coin of each denomination; and, if he will give a Return showing that, or, failing that, the average cost (apart from metal) of coining one coin?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): A table has been prepared at the Mint, showing the Mint charges levied in the principal countries of Europe, and was printed in the Journal of the Institute of Bankers for the 19th of March, 1884. I will lay it on the Table as a Parliamentary Paper. It is impossible to form any trustworthy estimate of the cost of coining individual pieces of each denomination, as the average cost of the coins struck each year depends entirely upon the amount of coinage executed. But if my hon. Friend will peruse the valuable Joint Report of Mr. Graham, the late Master of the Mint, and Colonel Smith, the late Master of the Calcutta Mint, which was a Parliamentary Paper of 1869, No. 285, he will find the fullest information on this subject, and in the calculation then made the present Deputy Master concurs.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— KHARTOUM.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether communications have been opened with Khartoum by way of Massowah; and, whether the negotiations with King Johannes for the relief of General Gordon are progressing favourably?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; communications have not been opened with Khartoum by Massowah. No reports have yet been received of the progress of the negotiations referred to by the hon. and gallant Member.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

MR. DUCKHAM asked Mr. Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether a quarantine of ninety days will be adopted for store animals from scheduled Foreign Countries as now enforced by the United States, Canada, and Australia for store animals from this Country; and, if not, whether he will state the quarantine it is proposed to enforce?

MR. DODSON: Quarantine must be regulated in each case according to the disease to be provided against, and to the circumstances of each case. The countries referred to in the Question direct their quarantine specially against infected countries. The quarantine we are thinking of is one to be adopted as an extra precaution, applicable to specified regions concerning the soundness and security of which we have distinct and positive assurance.

GOVERNMENT ASSURANCE AND ANNUITIES ACT, 1882—INSURANCES UNDER THE NEW TABLES.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Postmaster General, When insurances and annuities under the new tables framed in accordance with the provisions of the Assurance and Annuities Act of 1882 will be ready for issue?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, the tables had been prepared, and he hoped that a scheme would be brought into operation early in June.

A MINISTER FOR SCOTLAND—LEGISLATION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he proposes to introduce the Bill to establish a Minister for Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): In consequence of the state of Business in this House, it is proposed to introduce this Bill in the House of Lords, and this will be done on an early day.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, CORK — THE VISITORS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can now name the visitors who will hold the promised special visitation at Queen's College, Cork; and, if the College authorities will be instructed to furnish the students appealing against the decision of the College Council with copies of the evidence obtained against them?

MR. TREVELYAN: I understand that most probably the Court of Visitors, which will sit on the 15th of this month, will be composed of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, His Grace the Duke of Leinster, Dr. Moore, President of the Royal College of Physicians, and Mr. Wheeler, President of the Royal College of Surgeons. The Government have no authority to give any instructions as to the course which the investigation may take.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY AND QUEEN'S COLLEGES (IRELAND)—CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMISSION.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is able to inform the House as to the composition of the Commission appointed to inquire into the working of the Royal University and Queen's Colleges in Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN: We are getting along as fast as possible. We are promised the services of three gentlemen out of five who have been named, and we hope to secure the services of two others in a few days.

MR. SEXTON: Has the right hon. Gentleman finally decided whether a Member of this House will be asked to serve?

MR. TREVELYAN: No, Sir; it has been decided no Member of this House will be asked to serve. Perhaps hon. Gentlemen will keep their minds open until they hear the names.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—THE CAPTIVES AT SINKAT.

MR. A. ROSS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the women and children captured by Osman Digna at Sinkat have been rescued from slavery; and, if not, whether the Government are still continuing their efforts to attain that object; and, whether any Papers on the subject will be shortly laid upon the Table of the House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The authorities have received instructions to do all they can in this matter. At the same time, I cannot give any great hopes as to the result. The hon. Member will find what has passed on the subject in the Papers just laid before Parliament.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—THE DAIRIES, &c. ORDER, 1879 —REGISTRATION OF COWHOUSES.

MR. CLARE READ asked Mr. Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether a bond fide farmer, who sells milk and keeps cows in an urban sanitary district is compelled to register his cow-houses, &c. under the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1879; and, if so, whether he is exempt from such registration if, although selling milk within the said district, his cowsheds happen to be outside it?

MR. DODSON: Sir, the local authority under the Order, or, rather, under the Act of 1878, is the Quarter Session in a county, the Town Council in a municipal borough. The registration which each local authority is to require and enforce is a registration not of premises, but of persons carrying on, in the district of the local authority, the trade of cow-keepers, dairymen, or purveyors of milk. A bond fide farmer who carries on this trade is to be registered in the same way as anyone else. The district in which the trade is carried on is, as I am advised, the district in which the principal or central seat of the trade is situated, not every district in which any portion of the milk is distributed.

EGYPT — ENGAGEMENTS OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT (DESPATCH, 19TH SEPTEMBER, 1879).

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, With reference to his statement that the covenants under which this Country has been acting in Egypt were not made by the present Government, and to the Correspondence "Egypt, No. 11"

(Despatch No. 1, paragraph 3), just presented to Parliament as an explanation of the above statement, whether the paragraph in question, which states that Lord Salisbury, in a conversation with M. Waddington, agreed "that the Native Government should receive our earnest support," is the only statement that can be construed into a covenant justifying the acts of the present Government in the Soudan?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the only passage, in terms that I have ever cited or referred to in this House, was a passage in a despatch that is now laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament. I must, however, guard myself against being supposed to mean that that is the only engagement that has been entered into. I consider that an engagement has been constituted and contracted by the proceedings connected with the dethronement of the late Khedive, and the establishment of a former Khedive. But perhaps I cannot better or more fairly explain the matter than by quoting the passage, which has now become historical, from the speech of Lord Salisbury, delivered in the House of Lords on the 15th May, 1882. The noble Lord is reported to have used these words—

"With respect to Egypt itself, it appears to me that Her Majesty's Government, both by the engagements which they themselves have entered into, and by the engagements which they have necessarily inherited from their Predecessors, are bound to give their support to the present Viceroy of Egypt, so long as his Government is in accordance with the principles which they approve. They are bound to give him that support, not merely as a matter of sentiment, not merely in words or in notes, but in something stronger if the need should arise."—(3 Hansard, [269] 651.)

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: In reference to the answer of the Prime Minister, I would ask him, Whether his attention has been called to Despatch No. 3, Egypt 11—Lord Granville to Mr. Malet, dated March 3, 1881—in which these words occur—

"England and France are disposed to give to the present Khedive all their support, and the British and French Agents are to concert measures for the purpose;"

and, further, to Despatch No. 4, Lord Granville to Mr. Malet, dated March 7, 1881—

"The policy laid down in this Despatch (referring to Despatch No. 2) is that which you have hitherto recommended and pursued, with

and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, taking into consideration these two despatches, whether they constitute a covenant, and whether this covenant was not entered into by Her Majesty's present Advisers?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will, without taking any objection to the words quoted in the Question of the hon. Member, say that the words used by Lord Salisbury in speaking of the engagement into which the present Government have entered, correctly stated the circumstances of the case. No doubt, in the development of the Egyptian Question, Her Majesty's Government had occasion to apply to new circumstances, as they emerged, the principles by which they thought themselves bound to act under the covenants which they found existing when they entered Office.

MR. GORST: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a Question, of which, if he cannot answer now, I will give him Notice—namely, Whether the engagement earnestly to support the Government of the Khedive, which was entered into by the late Government on the 19th September, 1879, or a similar engagement which was entered into by the present Government on the 25th February, 1881, and the 3rd March, 1881—whether those engagements were ever communicated, either by the late or the present Government, to the Sultan of Turkey?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and it would be very difficult for me to say from memory. I think perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman had better give Notice of the Question.

MR. GORST: I will repeat it tomorrow.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: I wish to ask the Prime Minister, Whether he considers himself and the Government, under the documents which have been laid on the Table of the House, as being under a pledge to support the dynasty, as well as the person and the Government, of the Khedive?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is a Question which hardly admits of being answered within the usual limits. But perhaps the hon. and learned Member will give Notice of it, and I will then answer it.

EGYPT—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTH COTE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true that negotiations are in progress for the assembly of a Conference on Egyptian Affairs; and, if so, what are the matters which it is proposed to submit to the Conference?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will endeavour to answer the Question as exactly as I can. Her Majesty's Government have proposed a Conference to the Powers upon certain Egyptian affairs. That proposal of Her Majesty's Government has been accepted by the Powers. In fully accepting that Conference in principle, the French Government has expressed a desire—I do not understand it to be a condition of the assent—but the French Government has expressed a desire that there should be some preliminary communications, some communications before the Conference actually meets, between the French and English Governments. M. Waddington having just returned from Paris, these communications will immediately take place, or, perhaps, even now for all I know may be taking place. Turkey, which has a distinct position, has been invited to join the Conference, but no answer has as yet been received from Turkey, and the distance of Constantinople would require a little more time than in the case of most other capitals. With regard to the purpose of the Conference, it is on the financial situation of Egypt, which, as I think, has been intimated in general terms on some recent occasions by myself, has required attention, and from that attention the Law of Liquidation cannot be excluded. I think I cannot do better than to read to the House the passage—the actual terms—in which that subject has been submitted to the Powers—

"It appears to Her Majesty's Government that to meet the charges necessary for the peace and good government of the country, and to fulfil the engagements already incurred by the Egyptian Exchequer, some change in the Law of Liquidation is required. Her Majesty's Government would therefore propose that a Conference should meet in London or at Constantinople to determine whether such a change is necessary; and what should be its exact nature."—[Egypt, No. 17 (1884), p. 1.]

I think I need only add that, with regard to the place of the Conference which is thus proposed to be either in London or at Constantinople, no decision has as yet been arrived at.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, if he can state without inconvenience whether the Conference will be called upon to consider any question but that of Egyptian finance, or whether it will embrace the wider scope of the whole Egyptian Question?

MR. GLADSTONE: The invitation, Sir, is limited to the subject of finance.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I wish to ask, have any communications been exchanged between the Governments of France and England as to the possibility of the participation of the French Government in the occupation or administration of Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: Nothing has come to our knowledge of any communication from the French Government which refers to that subject.

MR. BOURKE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether any Papers on this subject will be laid before Parliament in the next few days, because it is possible, when the House becomes acquainted with these Papers, it may wish to express an opinion upon the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir. The right hon. Gentleman has had considerable experience in the Foreign Office, and I am bound to say I think from that he must know it would be an entire deviation from precedent, that when Her Majesty's Government are inviting the Powers of Europe to meet and to consider a particular subject, they should, before the Powers have considered it, produce Papers relating to that meeting.

MR. BOURKE: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether, in the case of the very important Congress held at Berlin, it is not a fact that when the announcement of the Congress was made to this House, despatches were immediately laid on the Table, stating the basis upon which the Conference would meet, thus enabling the House to form an opinion as to the engagements the Government were about to undertake?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware that any Papers were laid upon the Table which, in the slightest degree, affected to indicate what were to be the deliberations or proceedings of that Congress.

MR. BOURKE: The basis of the Congress.

MR. GLADSTONE: Oh, with regard to the basis of the Congress of Berlin. Well, with regard to the basis of this Conference, I think I have stated the basis upon which it has been proposed by us. At the same time, if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to have that put in another form, probably, he will put a Question on a future day. In the Congress of Berlin there were most important preliminary objects of controversy, and very important military measures to be adopted by the Executive Government of the country, which made it necessary that these should be the subject of communication to Parliament. But that was very different indeed from the present case.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The right hon. Gentleman stated that the Conference would be limited to the subject of finance. Are we to understand that the subject of finance will be limited by the terms of the paragraph which the Prime Minister has read to the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have read the invitation, and I presume that the Powers, having accepted the invitation, the subject of the Conference will be limited accordingly. It is quite evident that if any question of an extension should arise, that must be an entirely new question, totally detached from anything that has hitherto taken place.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—RELIEF OF GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is now able to state to the House when the Government intend to send an expedition for the relief of General Gordon?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have nothing further to say.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: With reference to the despatches just placed in our hands about General Gordon, I wish to ask, if the Government are in possession of the text of a telegram from General Gordon to Sir Evelyn Baring, which does not appear in the Papers on the Table?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will give Notice of that Question, as it relates to Papers only presented this afternoon.

VOL. CCLXXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Will the Prime Minister allow me to ask a Question which very seriously affects the accuracy of information given to this House some days ago by him? I asked the Prime Minister about the condition of General Gordon on the 24th of April, as to whether the fall of Berber would not increase the peril of General Gordon; and the Prime Minister informed the House that, according to all the information in his possession, there would be no essential change in the position of Khartoum. I want to ask the right hon. in consequence of the change at Berber. Gentleman, whether his attention has been drawn to a despatch of Sir Evelyn Baring, dated the 20th of April, and received on the 20th of April, in which the following passage occurs:—

“Unless some prospect of help can be held out to Hassan Khalifa, there is some risk that he will be thrown into the arms of the rebels. This would seriously affect Gordon's position.”
—[Egypt, No. 13 (1884), p. 13.]

I wish to ask the Prime Minister, how he could possibly have given the answer he did with that information in his possession?

MR. GLADSTONE: The information communicated by Sir Evelyn Baring is completely in my recollection, and was in my recollection, I believe, at the time I spoke in this House, and was to be taken and considered by the Government in connection with all the other information the Government then possessed. That being so, my opinion, and, I believe, the opinion of my Colleagues, was, as I stated, that the fall of Berber—I do not know that I used the word “fall”—whatever might take place in Berber would make no essential change in the position of Khartoum. I do not doubt at all that the fall of Berber, affecting one of the routes of Khartoum, would affect Khartoum unfavourably rather than otherwise; but our opinion was, and is, that it would make nothing approaching to an essential change in the position of security of General Gordon.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: So that the House is to understand that the deliberately expressed opinion of Her Majesty's Envoy is absolutely and utterly worthless?

MR. GLADSTONE dissented.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: It makes no difference how long the Egyptian

Papers have been in our hands; they have been in the hands of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) for some time. What I want to know is, whether we have got all the despatches from General Gordon to Sir Evelyn Baring? If the noble Lord cannot answer, I will give Notice for tomorrow.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT: I would ask, whether the information which induces the Government to think that Khartoum is not in greater peril in consequence of the fall of Berber is to be found in the despatch of the Governor of Berber, dated April 23, in which he says—"If Berber falls, there will no longer be any hope of the Soudan?"

MR. CHAPLIN: I wish to ask, whether the Government still adhere to the opinion which they expressed on April 21 last, that the position of General Gordon at Khartoum was one of complete security?

MR. GLADSTONE: I adhere to the opinion I have given in this House more than once—that there is no military danger at the present moment besetting Khartoum, subject to the reservation, the only reservation, the single reservation, that our intelligence from Khartoum only comes down to certain dates.

MR. WILLIS: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether the time has come when the Government may properly take steps for the purpose of putting an end to the mission of General Gordon?

MR. GLADSTONE: In reply to the Question of my hon. and learned Friend, what I have to say is, that I am not, at present, in a condition to give any full answer to-day, for a simple reason which I will explain. My hon. and learned Friend is aware that General Gordon was sent to the Soudan—went to the Soudan upon a mission which involved the use only of pacific means, and that the first accounts which came from General Gordon were of a very encouraging character. Unquestionably, I admit that subsequent accounts have tended to throw doubt upon the prospect of accomplishing the objects of his mission by pacific means. But on that subject we some time ago addressed communications to General Gordon which we think will materially enlarge our information with respect to his views of any prospect he may entertain of accomplishing that pacific mission. Until we receive the replies to these communications I shall not be in a position to answer the Question.

Lord EUSTACE CECIL: Are these communications in the Papers?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If the noble Lord will only examine the Papers, they will answer a great many Questions which have been asked.

PARLIAMENT—THE "COUNT OUT" ON TUESDAY.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the simultaneous withdrawal from the House, on Tuesday last, of all the Liberal Members except two, when thirty-five Conservative Members were present, was by Ministerial arrangement; and, whether, to avoid for the future the repeated counts-out on Tuesday Evening Sittings, he will arrange for the attendance of some Members of the Government to assist in keeping a quorum?

MR. MAC IVER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, at the same time, what has become of the Commercial Treaty between Portugal and Spain?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to the Question of the right hon. and gallant Baronet, what I have to say is, to give an assurance that there was no arrangement whatever made by the Government with regard to the withdrawal of Members from the House. If there was such a process, so far as I know, it would be entirely spontaneous, and be suggested by the nature of the case. With regard to the "Counts-out" on Tuesday evenings, I should say that there may be special circumstances when, if a Motion were in danger, it would be the duty of the Government to attempt to secure, even on Tuesday evenings, the making of a House; but I certainly could not undertake the additional responsibility, which would be handed down, like Egyptian engagements, to our Successors in Office; and I do not think it would be fair to impose such an obligation upon the Members of any Government.

MR. MAC IVER: I will ask the Question on Thursday.

IMPERIAL AND LOCAL TAXATION—THE INCOME TAX—THE DEBATE OF FRIDAY, APRIL 25—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD: I must ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to a matter which concerns my personal character and honour as a Member of this House. In the animated speech of the Prime Minister on Friday evening last, he charged me with having intentionally used the vowels A E I O U, in referring to the different heads of the Income Tax Schedule, instead of the letters A B C D and E, in order to avoid disclosing that my scheme of adjustment would effect a further burthening of Schedule A; because, on the previous day, I had secured the support of the landed interest in this House. He said he thought it would have been better had I used the five letters of the Schedule and not gone to the five vowels, "in order to obscure the operation of the plan." Now, Sir, I need hardly say that the imputation of purposely avoiding the disclosure of any of the consequences of my plan involves a charge of untruthfulness, hurtful to myself, offensive to my constituents, injurious to this House, of which I have the honour to be a Member, and damaging to the cause which I have espoused, and for which I have laboured, however imperfectly, with absolute truthfulness of purpose. I defer to a fitting opportunity the exposition of the fate of Schedule A; but I do not delay my appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to do me justice. He has known me and I have known him longer than any person in this House, and I ask him to withdraw unreservedly the charge he has made against me, which from his lips has proceeded to the five divisions of the globe, and which is altogether undeserved.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am extremely sorry if my right hon. Friend thought that there dropped from me any words which could possibly constitute a charge against his veracity, and that no opportunity was given me, by his appeal to me at the time, of withdrawing any such words. I am glad to think that, at any rate, the charge could not have been a very obvious one, when it is now six days since the debate before he has made it the subject of complaint in the way of any public or other reference. If he had stated it to me in private, I would not have waited this appeal in the House, but would have myself stated to the House that I should regard, with the strongest disapprobation, the conduct of any man, and especially my own conduct, if I were capable of making any imputation on the veracity of the right hon. Gentleman. The utmost that I ever charged my right hon. Friend with, if I ever did charge him with anything, was this—that he had not made it his care to put forward into the most prominent position what I considered to be the real points of his case. I beg my right hon. Friend to accept from me the expression of great regret if I have used words conveying the impression he has described; for, in my opinion, there is no man in this House who less requires to defend his honesty, or his public or private character, in this or in any other respect than my right hon. Friend himself, and most happy should I have been in private to lay this explanation before him instead of waiting for his appeal.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. HENEAGE asked, when the Government intended to proceed with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: There will be no opportunity of going forward with that subject to-night; but the Government are very anxious to bring this and some other matters to an early conclusion, and to expedite the Business of the House. For this reason, I shall have to-morrow to make a further proposal to the House on the subject of Morning Sittings. Complaint has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), and by others, that no opportunity is given of deciding the question of Morning Sittings, at a proper time, and that the practice of deciding them one by one, at a late hour of the evening, is not always satisfactory and sufficient. Therefore, I propose to meet his views, and to move to-morrow that until the end of June, the House shall meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at 2 o'clock, and I trust the judgment of the House on the subject will then be fairly taken. One of the prime objects we have in view is to take the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, to which my hon. Friend refers.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Will there be a Morning Sitting to-morrow?

Mr. GLADSTONE: We shall not ask for a Morning Sitting to-morrow. The proposal will be made before the Orders of the Day. We shall take the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill if possible to-morrow.

Mr. BROADHURST: I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to give facilities for making a House on Tuesday night for the discussion of the Motion in regard to Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, with regard to which both sides of the House take a great interest.

Mr. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke need be under no apprehension. It is certain that when that Motion comes on there will be a House.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to give Notice that I shall oppose the Motion to take Morning Sittings.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Would the Prime Minister inform the House, whether his Motion will also include the proposal that all Select Committees, all Private Committees, and all Grand Committees are to suspend their Sittings at 2 o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays?

Mr. GLADSTONE: No proposal will be made on that subject. The ordinary Rules will remain in force.

Mr. SOLATER-BOTH: In what shape does the Prime Minister propose to bring forward the Motion to-morrow?

Mr. GLADSTONE: The only precedent is that of the course adopted by Mr. Disraeli, in 1867, who moved that until the end of June, the House should meet at 2 o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays. My Motion will come before the Orders of the Day in accordance with that precedent.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: What was the date when that Motion was made?

Mr. GLADSTONE: It was made on a late day in May, instead of an early day as we propose.

PUBLIC HEALTH—CHOLERA.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received any intelligence of the arrival of a troopship at Portsmouth, with cases of cholera on board?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No details have reached me on this subject; but I hope to receive them soon.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Has there been any case of cholera landed?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Has the President of the Local Government Board any information on the subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I believe there have been no cases on shore since the ship arrived at Portsmouth; but I cannot speak certainly with regard to it. The arrival of the ship was the subject of discussion in advance between the War Office and the Local Government Board, and rules were laid down as to the procedure which was to be followed with regard to the ship. It was ordered to come in flying the yellow flag, and was to be anchored at a special point. That was done, and no one was allowed to land until there was pronounced to be no danger of infection.

EGYPT—THE TELEGRAMS.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay on the Table the telegram of General Gordon, referred to in the last despatch of Sir Evelyn Baring, dated the 8th of April, in which he states "General Gordon evidently think he is to be abandoned, and is very indignant?"

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE, in reply, said, that the telegrams presented, in the Blue Book, which came down to a very late date, were simply those portions of telegrams sent by Sir Evelyn Baring to the Foreign Office. The full telegram of General Gordon referred to, had not, as far as he knew, been received by the Foreign Office.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, whether the full text of the telegram could not be given, now that Sir Evelyn Baring was in England?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that the hon. Member would see that, in accordance with the undertaking that was given, the telegrams presented were simply those portions of the telegrams received by Sir Evelyn Baring from General Gordon which Sir Evelyn Baring had transmitted to the Foreign Office. They fully stated what had occurred.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
BILL.—[BILL 119.](Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr.
Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

COMMITTEE. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming proceedings upon going into Committee.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR), who had an Amendment on the Paper, to the effect "That this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee," said, he did not intend persevering with the Notice of Motion standing in his name; but he desired in the most emphatic manner to enter his protest against the measure. After referring to some of the anomalies that would be created by the Bill, if it passed—such, for instance, as that of a freeholder of the Borough of Hackney continuing to give his vote for the County of Middlesex—he maintained that in dealing with this question the House ought to have a complete measure before it. It ought not to be a piecemeal Reform, and he objected to this measure on the ground that it was a "bit by bit" Reform. It dealt very partially with one branch of the subject only, and it did not attempt to grapple with those anomalies which had been pointed out by his noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners). The anomalies complained of would be very much increased by this Bill. The House was told by the Prime Minister that he proposed early next Session to bring forward the complement of the Bill. He had said that the Bill which would be brought in would repress all those anomalies in their representation, and that it would make the measure a complete one. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) could not, however, understand why the precedents of 1832 and 1867 were not followed in dealing with this Bill. Why had the House not a complete measure before it? The right hon. Gentleman promised the complementary measure next February; but what security had the House that the right hon. Gentleman might be able to fulfil his pledge? A variety of causes might occur between this time and next February to prevent its fulfilment. There were certain contingencies attached to life itself of which they did not wish to think; there were foreign complications and numberless other events. They knew that the Prime Minister, very much to their regret, had been absent from the House recently owing to ill-health; and he might not be able, when the occasion arrived, to be present in the House to carry the Bill. It was on grounds such as these, therefore, that he wished to enter his protest against the bringing in of a partial Bill, and one which dealt with only one branch of the question. In addition to the reasons he had given, he ventured to take exception to the time at which the Bill had been brought forward. He greatly feared that if the Bill passed into law the Government would take advantage of that circumstance, and of the strength which it might give them in certain counties to dissolve Parliament. The country would then be appealed to on the present Bill, and without an opportunity having been given to consider the whole measure. Having regard to the present borough representation, and to the fact that several county seats might be gained under the new Bill, it was clear that it would be to the advantage of the Liberal Party to go to the country at an early date on this question. This seemed to be a dodge of the Birmingham caucus. If such a course were pursued, it would be unworthy of a great Government like the present. He regretted not to see the Secretary of the Board of Trade (Mr. Holms) in his place. His hon. Friend, some years ago, published an article in which he recommended that five years, instead of seven, should be the duration of Parliament. In this connection he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) wished to point out that, shortly after those views were propounded, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government came into Office, and he selected the hon. Gentleman, and made him a Member of the Government. He thought, therefore, he would not be far wrong were he to assume that the views of the hon. Member for Hackney were not altogether disagreeable to the Prime Minister. The present Parliament had now existed for more than four years, and were the views of his hon. Friend to be carried out they would naturally look for a Dissolution at the close of the present Session. He maintained, therefore, that this was not only an attempt to force the Bill through a moribund

[Second Night.]

Parliament, but an attempt to foist the Bill on the country without allowing it to judge of the question. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade evinced some curiosity about a speech which Lord Salisbury delivered when, on a recent occasion, he dined at the Mansion House. What Lord Salisbury said on that occasion was said in private, and he should be guilty of a breach of trust were he to tell the House what was then said by the noble Marquess. He had, however, no objection to tell the right hon. Gentleman what he himself said on that occasion. It was that it seemed to him that Her Majesty's Government, in bringing in this Bill, had taken for their motto—

That was the motto of the Government in regard to this Bill, and he pressed earnestly upon the noble Marquess to use his influence with that Assembly, of which he was a distinguished ornament, to give the country an opportunity of judging of this Bill. He knew that course was not popular with hon. Gentlemen opposite. The hon. Member for Leeds, in a speech to his constituents, announced that the Government would not dissolve until they had passed all their measures. Considering the large number of measures of which Notice had been given, he considered the statement a somewhat extraordinary one. It certainly seemed to him that in a great change of this kind—the greatest change in our Constitution, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that had taken place since the Revolution of 1688—the country ought to be consulted. One of the leading Members of the Government had told the House that the passing of this measure would amount to a revolution. (He Mr. R. N. Fowler certainly thought that in such a case they were not asking too much that the country should be consulted. Hon. Members opposite said the country was with them in this matter. If that were so, why should they fear to face the country? Members on the Opposition side of the House were greatly desirous that an appeal should be made to the country. But hon. Gentlemen opposite, who persisted in saying they were sure of the verdict, yet shrunk from the opportunity of inviting it. Now, he would ask the House and the country to judge which Party had confidence in the country—those who earnestly sought an appeal to its decision, or those who shrank from it? He would remind the House that both the preceding great measures of reform had been brought in early in the existence of the Parliament of the time. In the case of the Bill of 1831, Parliament had only met in the preceding year, while as to the Bill of 1867, the question of Reform had been brought up shortly after a Dissolution. The Parliament was elected in 1865, and in the following Session of 1866, the right hon. Gentleman opposite had brought in his Bill. Therefore, the country had had the question of Reform before it on both occasions. The present Bill, on the contrary, had been brought in at the close of a Parliament. It was true that they had been told by the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) that it was the best Parliament that ever met at Westminster; but he doubted whether the opinion of the more experienced Members of the House would be similar. He hoped that before this great change was made they would be given the opportunity of knowing what was the opinion of the country. They would recollect that in 1868 the right hon. Gentleman opposite had brought in a suspensory Bill relating to the Irish Church which, after passing that House, had been rejected in the other House. The country had then been appealed to, and had decided in favour of the right hon. Gentleman, upon which the other House had given way. Similarly, he thought that if the country proved to be in favour of this Bill the other House should give way. He maintained that this measure ought not to be forced through the House when the country had not been consulted upon it. He thought that everyone must admit that at the last Dissolution this measure had not been a very prominent one before the constituencies. They had had the right hon. Gentleman opposite impeaching the policy of Lord Beaconsfield in Afghanistan, at the Cape, and everywhere; but there had been no question of a redistribution of that House. At that time they had not been aware what the Government might be; some people had thought that the noble Marquess, who was then Leader of the Opposition, would be at the head of the Government, and the Liberal Party had received a large amount of votes from those who thought that the noble Marquess was a man of great moderation. He objected to this Bill being rushed through a Parliament in its fifth year, without an appeal to the country, and he wished to make his humble protest against the course which had been pursued. He had placed his Motion on the Paper in order to have the opportunity of addressing a few words to the House on the subject, and, having gained that object, he did not propose to press it; he wished, however, to express his view that this measure ought not to be passed without an appeal to the country. Both sides had expressed their confidence in the result; then let it be tried. On that side of the House they looked with confidence to the result of that appeal; they thought that the country would stand by them. On the other hand, if hon. Gentlemen opposite were right in their views as to the opinion of the country they had nothing to dread, and if they did succeed, he hoped that those on his own side of the House would abide by the decision of the House, in the spirit of the illustrious Sir Robert Peel, who concluded one of his great speeches in 1832, in these memorable words—

"If, Sir, the people of England, after meditating on these things, on the condition of foreign States, on the signs and indications at home of the probable consequences of this measure of Reform, still insist on its completion, their deliberate resolve will, no doubt, ultimately prevail. I shall bow to their judgment with the utmost respect; but my own opinions will remain unchanged. To all the penalties of maintaining these opinions—the withdrawal of public favour, the loss of public confidence, the incapacity for public service—I can and must submit. The people have the power, as they have the right, to inflict them; but they have neither the power nor the right to inflict that heavier penalty of involving me in their own responsibility, by making me the instrument for the accomplishing of an act by which we, the life-renters of those institutions which have made our country the freest, the happiest, and the most powerful nation of the universe, are to cut off from those who shall succeed us the inheritance of that which we ourselves enjoyed."

MR. CHAPLIN, who had the following Amendment on the Paper:—

"That this House considers that to largely increase the electoral privileges of the Irish people, at a time when vast numbers of the population are bitterly opposed to the English connection; when the object of their leaders and representatives in Parliament, openly avowed, is to sever that connection, and establish the National Independence of Ireland; and when the Government dare not even trust them with the full enjoyment of their ordinary civil rights, is inexpedient and dangerous to the welfare of the State, and cannot fail, with the present proportion and distribution of seats, to give strength and encouragement, in the prosecution of their aims, to the Separatist Party in Ireland."

said, he held that the objections which had been made with reference to the action of the Bill upon Ireland were most serious, and, indeed, unanswerable. It was most necessary, now, that discussion should be raised upon that question. The senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had delivered a most powerful and effective speech on that point during the debate on the second reading, and not one single Member of Her Majesty's Government had even attempted to meet him in reply as far as he could see. That mode of proceeding, he had observed, was by no means uncommon with Her Majesty's Government; on the contrary, it seemed to be their invariable practice, whenever they were confronted with a more than usually awkward question, to do their utmost not to meet, but to shirk and evade it. This Bill was entitled "A measure to amend the laws relating to the representation of the people in Parliament;" but, for his own part, he would describe it very differently. So far as Ireland was concerned, it was simply a measure to facilitate the repeal of the Union, and to promote and encourage the separation of Ireland from England. He had not one single word of complaint to make against the course taken by the Irish National Party in the House upon the second reading, or the largely-added majority which they brought to a Division on that occasion. Naturally enough, the Irish National Party welcomed that Bill with open arms, because they observed and recognized quite clearly what its inevitable effects must be in Ireland. They were quite shrewd enough to see how large a step it had brought, or would bring them, nearer to the goal which they had in view. That goal was nothing less than the establishment of the national independence of their country. They had from the first never concealed it. He might deplore their objects, as well as the means by which they had sometimes sought to attain them; but he could not refuse to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his Friends full credit for the candour

and consistency with which they had always avowed those objects from the first; and, in that respect, he was bound to say their conduct contrasted very favourably with the conduct of some right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite. He maintained that to the Irish Party this Bill was welcome because they saw in it an effective instrument to assist them in carrying out their schemes; but to Her Majesty's Government, on the other hand, this Bill—with all the stimulus and encouragement of an added force which it must give to the cause of separation—was the price which they were willing to pay for the support of the Irish vote at the approaching General Election. He thought the Government were wise in their generation, for they might depend upon this, that they would require every single vote they could command when the appeal was made from this Parliament, which they were seeking to betray, to a country which distrusted them, and, he believed, was thoroughly disgusted both with them and their proceedings. The Government had stated, with the utmost frankness from the first, that the inclusion of Ireland in the Bill was a vital and fundamental portion of their scheme. He (Mr. Chaplin) wished to speak with equal frankness. If that was true, if that was the final position of the Government, if it was really impossible for the settlement of this question that the three countries should be separated, all this afforded, to his mind, an unanswerable argument in favour of postponing the question altogether until Ireland had become less disturbed, less hostile to this country, and more reconciled to the connection. Could anyone get up and say that Ireland was in that position of contentment, and tranquillity, and freedom from violent agitation, which all agreed was a most desirable, and many thought was an absolutely necessary, condition for the introduction of an organic change in the constitution of a country? The President of the Board of Trade during the Recess had used the argument that Ireland was never likely to be contented as long as they withheld that great act of justice, as it was called, from her. How long was it since Members of the Government had made that discovery? He would tell them. It was made by the President of the Board of Trade about two or three months before the assembling of Parliament, just after the Conference at Leeds had decided, so far as it was able to decide, that there should be some measure of Reform introduced in the present Session, and that, taking all things together, it was less dangerous to the interests of the Liberal Party, as a whole, that that measure should be extended to Ireland than that it should be withheld from that country. Now, they had not a shadow of ground for pretending either that the want of such a measure was the cause of disturbance and disaffection in Ireland, and that its adoption would be a remedy for those evils in future, or that it would be gratefully received by any portion of the Irish people, except in so far as it was likely to strengthen the cause of separation. Over and over again since he had been a Member of that House hon. Gentlemen opposite had come forward and said—"Oh, here is this great measure of justice to Ireland; it is imperatively necessary for the peace and tranquillity of that country; only pass this measure and all we be well." Even now his memory distinctly recalled the accents of the Prime Minister as to the "Upas tree"—the Established Church—which they used to be told was the bane, the misfortune, and the curse of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman asked them only to give him liberty to cut it down, and they would then see what they would see and have something approaching the Millennium in Ireland. Since then the right hon. Gentleman had had great majorities behind him, and had been able to do almost anything that he pleased in regard to that country. The Upas tree had been destroyed root and branch; but, unfortunately, instead of having the Millennium, they were on the verge of civil war in Ireland. That was not his own assertion, but the assertion of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, who stated not long ago, at a public meeting, that it was only the presence of the Queen's troops in Ireland which prevented an actual outbreak in that country. The Government had been warned again and again from the Opposition side of the House of what would be the inevitable results of the pernicious policy which they had been so long pursuing. Many of the measures of the right hon. Gentleman, so far from being acts of justice, had been the most flagrant acts of injustice which it was possible to conceive, the gravest departure from all the sound principles of legislation which, up to the career of the right hon. Gentleman and his Irish policy, had been recognized in all civilized countries in the world; and they were beginning at last, as was not to be wondered at, to bear their natural fruits. When the right hon. Gentleman first embarked in his policy towards Ireland he had a golden opportunity of promoting the regeneration of that country, such as was rarely offered before to any English statesman. They could judge to some extent of the use that he had made of that opportunity by the Ireland they witnessed to-day. The chief difficulties which English Ministers and Parliaments had previously to deal with in Ireland were mainly of a social and economical character. The position of affairs there at present was unhappily far more serious; now, the difficulty was undoubtedly political; and it was to his mind one of the most terrible misfortunes of the whole Irish policy of the right hon. Gentleman that, while he had done much to render all satisfactory solution of the social problems in Ireland impossible, the political and and far more serious evils and dangers of that country were mainly, if not entirely, of his own creation. He had brought things to this condition—that while the proposal to extend the suffrage in Ireland was viewed with avowed anxiety and dismay by a great many Liberals in this country, and even by the noble Marquess, his Predecessor as the Leader of the Liberal Party, as was evident from his speeches in Lancashire, there were vast bodies of the people of England who regarded it as a positive and a grave danger to the State. Was it at all surprising, then, when they recollected how all their previous predictions as to the future of that country, and all their fair promises had been so completely falsified, if people were not disposed to place reliance on the latest specific and panacea of the Government, or to accept what they told them in regard to the extension of the suffrage in Ireland? It seemed to him that they could not possibly have selected a more unfavourable time for the experiment they now proposed to make. He constantly received a good deal of information about the present state of Ireland from men who, he had every reason to believe were as competent to express an opinion on that question, and as well acquainted with it as any Member of the Government; and what he learned from one and all of them was that, except as far as open insurrection and disturbance could be prevented by the action of the Crimes Act, the state of Ireland at that moment was worse, more dangerous, more disloyal, and disaffected to this country than it had probably ever been before. Yet, in face of that, Ministers went down to the country and made smooth speeches, and said pleasant things, about the present condition of Ireland; and he believed that the President of the Board of Trade had recently said, to a great assembly in a northern county, that Ireland was in a far more improved state than it ever was during the last four years, and that except for the action of some troublesome Orangemen everything would be quiet and peaceful. He (Mr. Chaplin) would give a simple illustration of the real state of things by a circumstance that happened to come under his own notice. Not long ago, one of the principal land agents in the South of Ireland came over from that country to London, and called upon him on the very morning he arrived from Dublin. The land agent put into his hand a paper and said,—“Mr. Chaplin, no doubt you have been reading some of the speeches which Ministers have been making about the improved state of things in Ireland. What do you think of that?” On opening the paper, he found that it was a telegram which that gentleman had just received on his arrival in London from the chief inspector of police in Dublin, or of some other town—he forgot which—and it was to this effect—“We have received information that your life will probably be attempted while you are in London”—by an Invincible, he thought it said, or by an agent of some other association. “We have forwarded the information to the proper authorities in London; but it is absolutely impossible that you can take too great precautions.” And the land agent said to him—“In the face of things happening like this, and happening every day, though probably you do not hear of them, is it not too hard on us in Ireland that Cabinet Ministers should go into the country and say that the state of Ireland is much better now than it ever has been in the past four years?" That gentleman had for many years had the charge of immense estates in the South of Ireland; and he had had the reputation of being one of the kindest and, towards his tenants, the most liberal of land agents in the country. It had been his own good fortune to spend some time at that gentleman's residence in Ireland just before the introduction of the Land Act; and he should never forget the conversation they had together on that occasion. They were speaking of the anticipated Act. His friend said—"In the county in which I live we have never had an agrarian outrage or an agrarian murder, I believe, in the memory of man. I have never had a difficulty, I have never even received a threatening letter, and I have lived in perfect friendship and amity with all I am concerned with. But," he added, "if this measure, or anything at all like it, is introduced into Parliament and carried, I would not give two years' purchase for my life if I still continue to perform my duties." Since that time he knew that that man's life had been attempted more than once—he believed several times; and such was his position that when he came to England he was met with a telegram such as he had described. Even when he went a few yards from his house to church, he was accompanied by armed policemen, he believed, on either side. He might give the House many other similar illustrations of some of the consequences which had resulted from the policy of the Prime Minister, but it was not necessary. He would content himself with appealing to the highest authority—namely, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. Would that right hon. Gentleman get up in his place that night, and state to the House, that apart from the effects of the Crimes Act, he was able to discern any real permanent or lasting improvement in the condition of Ireland? If he could, why, then, did he continue to suspend the Constitution in that country? Some gentlemen had often asked him—"Why do you desire to withhold the suffrage from Ireland? Why make a distinction between the two countries?" When that question was put to him he always replied by asking another, and he should like to ask then the Chief Secretary, or the Prime Minister, or the Secretary for War—"Is the Crimes Act in Ireland indispensable to-day, or is it not?" If it was not, then it ought at once to be repealed. If it was, the Irish people were not fitted to receive the franchise, and those who asked him why he objected to its extension to Ireland had answered themselves. He should have thought that no body of men in the world out of Bedlam would support a measure like the Coercion Act side by side with a large extension of the suffrage. The two things were absolutely incompatible. It was impossible to contend that it could conduce to the interests, or the peace or prosperity of Ireland largely, to increase her electoral privileges when the Government dared not even trust the Irish people with the full enjoyment of their ordinary civil rights. What was the chief difficulty with which the Government had to contend at the present moment? It was that the present electorate of 200,000 and the Representatives whom they sent to Parliament were banded together, for the most part, for one purpose, which was by some means or other to compass the separation of Ireland from England. That purpose was perfectly clear to all who chose to see, and it was not less clear that a large extension of the suffrage would enormously strengthen the hands of the Separatist Party in Ireland. That fact was denied by no one single Minister or statesman in the country. There was one person, however—he referred to the President of the Board of Trade—who had thrown some doubts on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken somewhere in the country word of an ominous significance. He had said that whether the effect of the extension of the suffrage would be to strengthen the cause of separation or not was not the question. What the Liberals had to ask was, what was the object of a representative system, and if it were faithfully to reflect the views of the constituencies, and the country was convinced of the necessity of such a system, it ought to be made a reality and not a sham, no matter what the consequences might be. No doubt those were also the views of many Gentlemen opposite. But had they considered what such a doctrine must inevitably lead to? He would like to have asked the President of the Board of Trade if he were in his place, what course he would take if the present electorate, and still more, if the future electorate which it was proposed to establish, should return to Parliament a large majority of Representatives pledged to the cause of National independence in Ireland? Was he prepared to accede to the request for separation or not? If not, what became of his plea that the representative system should be made a reality at once? If he was, his object ought to be proclaimed, and the country had a right to know what were the views of the President of the Board of Trade on that question. He did not know whether there might, or might not, be some future Kilmainham Treaty, but if the right hon. Gentleman remained silent after the challenge which he had made, there would be no alternative except to believe that, in certain circumstances arising in the future, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and those who shared his views were prepared to accede to the demand for the national independence of Ireland. But up to the present time there was no public man in England who would not have been prepared to utter an emphatic "No" a thousand times to any such proposition, and nobody had seen that more clearly than the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War. The noble Lord had, on various occasions, expressed his opinion on the subject of the extension of the suffrage to Ireland. Not long ago in Lancashire he had painted in vivid colours the condition of the country at the present time, and pointed out how the government of the 5,000,000 in that part of the world offered problems by the side of which the government of the remaining population of the Kingdom fell to absolute insignificance. But what conclusion did the noble Lord draw from that state of things; where was his logical consistency? It had been proved almost impossible to govern Ireland with an electorate of 200,000, and so, in order to make it three times more impossible, the noble Lord was prepared to increase the electorate to 600,000. The conduct of the noble Lord in that matter was open to grave and serious reproach, even if no harsher term might be applied. The noble Lord said not long ago, even with regard to local government in Ireland, that it would be absolute madness to grant it, unless some assurance were given by the Leaders of the Irish people that it would not be used to weaken the authority of the central Government at home. Was it not perfectly obvious that every word that the noble Lord said with regard to local government applied with ten-fold force to the extension of the suffrage? The noble Lord perceived it himself, for he went on to speak about the suffrage in the same speech. He then said—

"There is no franchise possessed by the English people, there is no power which is either possessed or which may hereafter be conferred upon the English people which, from any national jealousy, we will withhold from Ireland so soon as we can be persuaded that the Irish people and their Leaders have reconciled themselves to the inevitable fact that they are and must remain an integral portion of the British Empire."

The natural conclusion from that statement was that, so long as the Irish people failed to fulfil that condition, the noble Lord would withhold the suffrage. But the speech of the noble Lord was soon followed by a declaration made at a banquet in Dublin by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). That declaration was full of energy and full of Irish aspirations, and expressed a determination never to rest for a moment until they had gained the objects they had in view. The hon. Member for the City of Cork said—

"Beyond a shadow of doubt it will be for the Irish people in England, separated, isolated as they are, and for the independent Irish Members, to determine at the next General Election whether a Tory or a Liberal Ministry shall rule England. This is a great force and a great power. This force has already gained for Ireland inclusion in the coming Franchise Bill. We have reason to be proud, hopeful, and energetic, determined that this generation shall not pass away until it has bequeathed to those who come after us the great birthright of national independence."

That was the reply of the Irish Leaders to the noble Lord, and in face of that reply he asked the noble Lord how he could reconcile his previous utterances with the action he was taking on that occasion? In reply to the suggestion that the question should be postponed altogether until the condition of Ireland had changed, only two answers had been made in the course of that debate, one negative and the other affirmative. The Chief Secretary said that it would be monstrous to deprive England and Scotland of their undoubted right of which they had already been deprived for many years because of the dislike entertained towards extending the franchise in Ireland; and the Prime Minister cast aside all obligation to produce arguments for the Bill, and said that the addition of every capable citizen to the constituency must inevitably give strength to the State. He (Mr. Chaplin) took issue with both right hon. Gentlemen upon the arguments which they had used. He denied altogether that the exercise of the suffrage, or the extension of it, was to be treated as a right. If it was to be regarded as a right, that position was inconsistent with the support of the Bill. It extended the suffrage to 2,000,000 more; but what about the rights of all the rest who were excluded? If it was a right in one case, surely it was equally a right in the other; and, therefore, the pretence that it was a right that could not be withheld was absolutely worthless. The Prime Minister was most unfortunate in his illustration of the grounds on which he supported the measure, for he alluded to America, where it was notorious that the prevalence of corruption deterred the most able and competent men from having anything to do with public life. The right hon. Gentleman said that addition to the electorate would necessarily give strength to the State; but would that be done by the increase of the electorate in Ireland? The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), in his speech at Edinburgh, pointed out that the position of Ireland was always a source of danger and anxiety, and that, in case of war or foreign complication, it would become one of absolute peril to the State. Would the condition of things be improved by the increase of the electorate in Ireland as well as England? But to come nearer home still, did the Prime Minister think that the last extension of the franchise had improved the condition of the House of Commons and made it more useful? If so, his memory ought to undeceive him on that point, for it was not so long ago that, owing to the terrible depth to which the House had fallen from its ancient traditions, the right hon. Gentleman had found it necessary to propose arbitrary rules for its government, without which he declared that the transaction of Business would be absolutely impossible. All this had arisen from the last extension of the franchise, the real effect of which we were only just beginning to perceive. He could not conceive how it was possible for the right hon. Gentleman to believe that in a further addition to the electorate there would be an accession of strength to the State. The proposal he (Mr. Chaplin) made was virtually a proposal not to exclude Ireland from the suffrage it was proposed to confer on England and Scotland, but to postpone the settlement of the question altogether, until Ireland was in a fit state to receive it. Surely hon. Members opposite, who were proud of the Irish legislation of their Chief, who sang pæans in praise of the measures passed, would be the last to suppose that the fruits of these magnificent effects of statesmanship, the halcyon days of Ireland, could be long postponed. Unless the Government was convinced that the vast majority of the Irish people were not bitterly opposed to the connection with England, that it was not the purpose of their Leaders in Parliament or the country to sever that connection and establish national independence, and that the extension of the suffrage would not largely strengthen the cause of separation between the two countries, he had made out a case for the postponement of this question. Whatever objections there might be to postponing it in England and Scotland, they would not bear comparison for a moment with the objections to extend the suffrage in Ireland at the present time. He had only to consider the course which on this occasion he should pursue. He knew perfectly well that he should have banded together against him the whole Irish Party and the whole Radical Party. Was that likely to further the ultimate object he had in view? It was not the part of a wise general, on any occasion, to court an overwhelming defeat. Believing that the full statements of the views he entertained upon this question might possibly have as much influence, and, perhaps a more favourable influence, than an overwhelming Division against him, he should not move the Amendment which stood in his name, but he should merely record his protest by saying "No!" to the Motion "That the Speaker do leave the Chair."

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not yet realized the full effect of the closing statement of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chaplin), which is, I may say, one of the most remarkable that I have ever heard in this House. The hon. Gentleman has compared himself to a wise general who has, on this occasion, undertaken to march at the head of the Party opposite in support of an Amendment; but who, at the last moment, has remembered that prudence is the better part of valour, and has announced to us that, after all, he does not mean to fight. But the hon. Gentleman, although he is most pacific in his acts, is undoubtedly very warlike in his words, and in his use of big ones. Of them I have rarely heard any hon. Gentleman favour this House with a more abundant supply. There are parts of what the hon. Gentleman has said which I must say I hope will receive very specific notice from those Irish Members to whom he has so pointedly alluded. The hon. Gentleman has put upon the Paper allegations, that vast numbers of the Irish people are bitterly opposed to the English connection, and that the avowed objects of their Leaders and Representatives is to sever that connection, and to establish a national and independent Ireland. Well, Sir, undoubtedly the majority of the Representatives of Ireland sitting in this House, would not consent to, or admit, the truth of either of those allegations. The majority of the Irish Members were returned at the General Election to support what is termed Home Rule; but there are many—I am not able to say how many—of those who support what they term Home Rule who have, at all times, indignantly repudiated the doctrine that Home Rule is equivalent to severance of the English connection. [“Hear, hear!”] I am glad to hear those cheers. I was going to say that the hon. Gentleman near me, the Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw), at the time when he was actively engaged in representing the feelings and opinions of the great body of the Irish Members in this House, made a speech which, I am certain, conveyed to the minds of those who heard it the firmest conviction that, while he was a supporter of Home Rule, he was the friend, and not the enemy, of the English connection. I believed then, and I believe still, that there are many, even of those who are considered the extreme Irish Party, that share that sentiment of my hon. Friend. It is for them, however, to make plain the position they hold. I am not at all sorry that they have been challenged by the hon. Gentleman, in the Motion which is printed on the Papers of the House, and which, I hope, and for my own part believe, to be a libel upon those vast numbers of the Irish people to whom it refers; but it is for them, I admit, to explain, defend, and vindicate themselves as they may think proper. I say so much, because, undoubtedly, it is needless for me to deal with a Motion which has vanished into thin air. I did suppose, when I heard and listened to the hon. Gentleman throughout his speech, speaking of his proposals, that he was really going to propose them. But I find that these are proposals the essence of which is that they are not to be proposed; because the hon. Gentleman thinks that, upon the whole, he may trust to the influence of the oration which he has given to produce, if not the outright conversion, at least, a fundamental change in the attitude of men's minds in and out of the House, the effect of which might have been marred if a Division had taken place. I only say this upon the withdrawal of the hon. Gentleman's Motion. He says that he withdraws it, because he would have had against him the whole Irish Party and the whole Radical Party. I believe he had other reasons for withdrawing it, besides his apprehension of those two Parties; and, that, among the reasons for withdrawing it, was the advice he received from the most prudent, and perhaps the most experienced and influential of those who sit on his own side. I was going to have asked the hon. Gentleman, what I need not ask now, what we are really discussing? Referring to his speech, which is the only thing we have to discuss, I shall only think it necessary to say a very few words. The hon. Gentleman accuses the Government of having brought in a Bill for the enlargement of the franchise in Ireland, and bringing it to a footing of equality with England and Scotland, at the price of the Irish vote at the coming Election. Is that a fair accusation? Is this the first time on which we have endeavoured to enlarge the Irish constituencies? Have we not again and again, during past years, and without the slightest idea or prospect of the Irish vote—have we not again and again supported the Irish Members in their endeavours to obtain an extension of the franchise to Ireland as regards equality? For be it remembered that, at this moment, Ireland does not possess that equality. Neither in the counties nor in the towns of Ireland is the Irish constituency to be compared, I do not say in numbers, but as to their legislative basis, with the constituency long granted to England and Scotland. I understand the speech of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman modestly described the gist of his own opinions, when he said his Party wanted to postpone altogether the question we are now debating; but, Sir, they go a great deal further than that, and the hon. Gentleman is entitled to much greater praise for verbal than for rhetorical courage; because the hon. Gentleman, towards the close of his speech, entered upon an indignant denunciation of the existing franchise in England and Scotland, stating it was only now that gradually we were beginning to develop and find out the mischievous effects of the franchise; and, in that view, though modesty prevented the hon. Gentleman from even printing the Motion, and withdrawing it upon the subject, yet he should have brought forward one for the repeal of the Act of 1867, for nothing less than that is the true outcome of the speech which he delivered, and from which he expects that such great political results will arise. Now, Sir, with respect to this Bill, as to which we are charged with having sought the Irish vote, I refer to our conduct during the past 10 years upon every occasion when the subject of the Irish franchise has been mooted in this House. With respect to the Bill, let me consider a little the objections taken by the hon. Gentleman against it. The hon. Gentleman says that Ireland is in a dreadful state, and that he will challenge any Minister to declare that its condition has improved, except through the operation of coercive measures.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I said any permanent or lasting improvement in its condition.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Undoubtedly. That leaves a refuge to the hon. Gentleman; because if I say or allege actual improvement, he may say it is not permanent or lasting. He calls the future to his aid when the present does not sufficiently bear him out, or answer his purpose. The fact of an improvement in the state of Ireland I should have thought, if that word "improvement" be rightly understood, is an undeniable fact. I do not deny that, in certain respects, it may be urged that the state of Ireland has not improved—that is to say, that the Parliamentary controversy between a large body of the Irish Members, who may in another Parliament become the majority of those Members, the majority of the rest of this House, is not yet solved—not, perhaps, yet even mitigated. I do not underrate the importance of that Parliamentary controversy. It may cause great inconvenience and great uneasiness. My share in it is nearly at an end, and it will last, probably, longer than the short residue of my political life. But what will be the upshot of it? Debating here, voting, cross voting, the disturbance possibly of a Ministry, and the Dissolution possibly of a Parliament? All these things may arise from the political controversy between the Irish Members and a certain section, especially if they be raised to a considerable majority, or a majority at all, of the Irish Representatives for the rest of Ireland. But what then? Does that imply that Ireland is lost, or that its state is less happy than before? When I speak of the improved condition of the country, I mean the improvement in the lives and conditions of the human beings who inhabit it. [Mr. ONSLOW: Loyalty!] That is what I understand by the improvement of the country. I speak of their lives and conditions. That constitutes the improvement of a country. Their political temper is another matter—a very important one—not one which I will take into view now, but I will presently refer to it. I affirm that great as the improvement in the condition of the people of Ireland now is, as respects personal and domestic happiness, as respects the hearths and homes, the very essence of human life, their condition as compared with the condition of their forefathers for many generations is vastly superior. If I may take the external evidence of that improvement, I do not deny that there is yet much to be desired; but hon. Gentlemen should know that the outrages perpetrated in Ireland are trifling in number compared with those that have unfortunately characterized former years. I believe I would be correct in saying not only that they have enormously diminished since the crisis of the great social struggle three years ago, but that they are less than half what they were at the time the present Government took office. The hon. Gentleman says—"Do not extend the political franchise to Ireland at a time when you have got an Act on the Statute Book in derogation of the civil rights and liberties of the people." The doctrine of the hon. Gentleman reaches a long way. If you are to withhold all extension of political franchise from Ireland, while there are exceptional laws abridging civil liberty, unfortunately you never would have given any political franchise to Ireland at all, for there has hardly been a period when some exceptional law or other of that character has not been in existence. I assure hon. Gentlemen opposite, I will not echo the doctrine of the hon. Gentleman; for I am sure I am correct in saying that, in 1868, when the political franchises of Ireland were extended, exceptional laws still existed, and I am not sure that the Habeas Corpus Act was not suspended in Ireland at that time. The hon. Gentleman refers to the case of gentlemen who are in personal fear in Ireland—personal fear and danger of their lives. It is not difficult under the thin disguise of the hon. Gentleman's description to imagine whose life had been threatened by some of those whom the hon. Gentleman calls "Invincibles." Does the hon. Gentleman really believe that these Invincibles are a fair specimen of the people of Ireland, or that the people of Ireland generally are in sympathy with their attempts? I believe, for my part, no such thing. I believe they are the greatest enemies of the people of Ireland. I believe the people of Ireland will more and more come to recognize them as their greatest enemies. I am sure there is but one course which can tend to identify the people of Ireland with these wicked men, and that is, that we should pursue a course ungenerous and unjust towards the people. The hon. Gentleman referred to America. I am always sorry when I hear severe imputations cast upon the institutions of America by hon. Members speaking in this House. We should not relish it, if the practice were applied to ourselves; and I question the taste as well as the justice of it, except with very great care and much reserve. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the United States have not had the same experience in legislative matters as we have had. I quoted the case of America for a purpose which I think was unimpeachable. It was to show how, in America, with a vast constituency, an enormous vigour and vitality had been developed by the Constitution of the country in the struggle of 1861 to 1865—a struggle, I believe, such as never fell to the lot of any other people in modern history. It was for the vigour and vitality given to the Constitution, for the strength, the tenacity, and the persistency which the people assumed over the working of the Constitution, for their devoted self-sacrifice, for their patriotism, which seemed to burn brighter and brighter in proportion as difficulties grew more and more embarrassing—it was for this purpose I quoted the American Constitution in my speech in introducing the Bill. I do not think the argument was misapplied, as it tends to show that a wide suffrage has a great effect in giving the Constitution a hold upon the minds and hearts of the people, and disposing the people to make the most manful and devoted efforts on its behalf. The hon. Member says the Americans are rather disadvantageously situated in point of purity. How long has it taken us to attain a decent standard of purity? I am not even sure that we have attained it yet. I am not quite certain that American elections would not one by one compare pretty favourably, even at the present day, with English elections. But America has a young Constitution compared with ours. She has for 100 years presented the picture of an independent and growing nation. She has undoubtedly, under very great temptations, shown from time to time weak points in the conduct of her public men and her local politicians, not all over the country, but in some particular localities. But we, at any rate, have passed through that phase, and if we have now emerged from it; for I am not certain that we have, in all respects, emerged from it. But, at any rate, it has taken us 200 years to get through, or to make any serious progress in getting rid of the political corruption. When America has as yet had experience of but half the time, I think really we might restrain the censorious tongue, and be a little more considerate in dealing with

[Second Night.]

America under this chapter. The hon. Gentleman says he sees danger to the State in the extension of the franchise—[Mr. CHAPLIN: To Ireland.] No; the hon. Gentleman, as I understood him, was general. He said—"I will not admit that raising the constituency is a means of strengthening the Constitution of the country." He seems to think that, with a sufficiently narrow franchise, the Government is pretty safe. But he follows up that opinion by the censure he has passed upon the Act of 1867, and the last great extension of the franchise. Sir, narrowing the franchise is not a protection against rebellion or revolution. There is a Republic in France, resting upon a franchise of the very broadest basis; and that Republic, so far as we can see, does not exhibit any sign of gross weakness or debasement. We are very fond of referring to bye-elections in this country. You see bye-elections take place in France. Do those bye-elections indicate that the people of France have changed their minds, and are ready to bring about a great change in their institutions? But they have now this enormously-extended franchise. What sort of franchise had they under the Bourbons? By right, Louis Philippe? If I remember the constituency was 80,000 under the Bourbons, and under Louis Philippe 150,000 or 200,000; and yet, as sure as 15 or 20 years passed, revolution came, though the franchise was limited in a manner to content the heart even of the hon. Gentleman. Do they show any great desire to go back to the former state of things? If, unhappily, a people are not attached to their institutions, then, whether the franchise be wide or narrow, that discontent and that want of attachment will make themselves fatally shown; but where a people are attached to their institutions, where every man in the country glories in belonging to that country, where the law stands in general respect and harmony with the views of the enormous majority of the people—where the desire of the people, upon the whole, is to improve, but yet, while improving, to preserve and to hand down in substance to their posterity that which they have received from their forefathers—there is a case which, happily, in the main corresponds with our case, and there it is, that to broaden the constituency is to strengthen the

Mr. Gladstone

Constitution. With respect to Ireland, the real question first is—is this, in our view, a United Kingdom? If it is a United Kingdom, is the hon. Gentleman in his right, if he gets up and demands from us that Ireland shall remain as she now is, with a franchise grossly unequal, with a franchise extremely limited as compared with the franchise enjoyed in England and Scotland? And I want to know on what principle—if, as I suppose, the hon. Member defends the Union with Ireland—on what principle is it possible to defend it, except upon the principle that the aim of that Act is to introduce Ireland to the enjoyment of equal rights with those of England and Scotland? It is impossible to maintain the Act of Union or any form of connection between the countries upon the principles of the hon. Gentleman. For the Irish people will not submit, and I must say—I am speaking, of course, of constitutional submission and constitutional resistance—but, speaking within these limits, I not only say that they will not submit, but I say that I rejoice they will not submit, to the inequality which the hon. Gentleman desires to inflict upon them, and, as I may say, as respects the franchise, to perpetuate in the form in which it now exists. There is one objection which I feel to speeches is one speech of the hon. Gentleman like the speech yet say a single word. on which I will amount of compliment I am vexed at the hon. Gentleman pays ment that the hon. Gentleman calls ex- to Irish Members of what mean by treme opinions—I do not mean that these compliments the great value in he sets upon getting their vote the the same Lobby with himself, but a compliment which is essentially involved in his whole strain of argument. He appears to think that Irish voters Representatives meeting English and Scottish voters' Representatives upon footing of equality, and with the principles of justice, alike acknowledge and applied on either side, are not only formidable, but are absolutely irresistible. He seems to think he will terrify us out of our senses by alluding to the state of things which will arise under the Bill, as to which he says there is to be a very large majority of Irish Members following the hon. Gentleman the Member for City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). [An hon. MEMBER: Do you not think it will so?] Yes; but I think I am entitled to put this question to the hon. Gentleman—Does he not also think there would be a large majority of Members returned in the same sense if he succeeded in maintaining the present system? The question between Great Britain and Ireland does not depend upon the comparatively paltry difference between 70 Members, or 80 Members, or 90 Members in a particular Parliament. It depends upon one thing more than any other, and that is the avoidance of injustice. Why are we to be told that 400,000 persons, added to the constituency in Ireland, are to carry all before them, and to prevent us from exercising in this, or a future Parliament, an independent judgment on the connection of the two countries? Why are we to be told this, when we bear in mind that if there are 5,000,000 in Ireland there are 30,000,000 people in Great Britain; and if there are 500,000 or 400,000 persons going to be added to the Irish constituency, there are 1,500,000 persons going to be added to the already vast English and Scottish constituencies? Why, then, should we be afraid to look in the face the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork and all his coadjutors? I know but one thing which can inspire craven fear in our minds, or which can for a moment weaken the position of England, or derogate from the power of the Imperial Parliament to govern this great country—England, Scotland, and Ireland—and all the Empire according to law and the Constitution. I know but one thing that can weaken it, and that is, if the hon. Member for the City of Cork is able to rise in his place, and say that we are attempting to inflict upon Ireland the brand of social and political inequality, and to make the Act of Union, which professes to be an Act of equality and peace, an Act, on the contrary, under which we are to maintain a set of laws which denies to Ireland rights which we grant to the rest of the Kingdom. That, I frankly own, is a view, and I believe it is the view of a majority of this House, and of the people of this country as well. I do not think the hon. Gentleman and those who are in alliance with him would do a little more justice, if not to themselves, at least to their country. If, for argument's sake, I am to regard this as a great controversy between the two Islands, I say to those who profess to represent the population on this side of the water, surely we are strong enough in numbers, in wealth, and in ancient tradition. That being so, there is but one other item that matters a feather weight in the case—let us be as strong in right as we are in population, wealth, and historic traditions, and we shall have abundant force to settle our accounts in whatever may be founded on justice, or can fairly be demanded for the people of Ireland, with their Representatives. I make no complaint of the hon. Member's raising this question. It is a perfectly fair question to be debated, and it may be said to have attracted only a limited attention in the course of the previous debates. But I must say that while I am sorry for many of the opinions which have been expressed by the hon. Gentleman, I rejoice that he has not seen fit to ask the House to assent to the terms of his Motion. It shows, after all, that we are making some advance in political knowledge and experience; and that, even if extravagant opinions can be vented in a speech, there is too much modesty, too much prudence and wisdom on the part of the speaker, to ask the House of Commons to inscribe them on its records.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) throughout the whole of his speech had treated the franchise as a right. He (Mr. Newdegate) remembered hearing the right hon. Gentleman defend it as a trust. He remembered the right hon. Gentleman as a Colleague of Lord Palmerston, who held to the last that it was a fundamental maxim of the Constitution that the franchise was conferred as a trust; and that it was essential that men, or rather classes, should be recognized as trustworthy citizens, before they were permitted to possess any share of political power. The right hon. Gentleman held up the example of the Republic of the United States to guide them who were anxious to preserve Constitutional Monarchy. The right hon. Gentleman cited the success of manhood suffrage in carrying the great Republic through the Civil War, but said nothing of its effects in preventing civil war, or of the success of the Constitution of this country, which had preserved its internal peace for nearly 200 years. The right hon. Gentleman must have gratified the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who was an avowed Democrat, and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. He (Mr. Newdegate) hoped he was not violating any confidence when he said that the first time he met the President of the Board of Trade, immediately after his election as Mayor of Birmingham, that right hon. Gentleman told him, within five minutes after being introduced to him in the presence of the assembled Volunteer officers of Birmingham, that he was a Republican. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was based upon Democratic principles. He (Mr. Newdegate) regretted that the late Lord Beaconsfield should have entered into competition with the right hon. Gentleman, in seeking the applause of Democracy, when he passed the Act of 1867. But there was a great reservation in that Act. The household and lodger franchise was not, by that Act, extended to the counties, which contain the majority of the people, especially in Great Britain. Now, however, the Prime Minister proposed to extend that franchise to the counties. What did the action of the late Lord Beaconsfield and of the right hon. Gentleman amount to, if not to mere competition for the favour of Democracy? He remembered the Prime Minister when he was a very different politician. The right hon. Gentleman, in an article written some years ago, in answer to a very able article by Mr. Lowe, now Lord Sherbrooke, eulogized the character and conduct of the House of Commons as it existed between 1832, when the first Reform Bill was passed, and 1852. After 1852, there was, according to the right hon. Gentleman, a deterioration. He (Mr. Newdegate) would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any improvement had taken place since 1867? In defiance of the warning of Lord Russell, the right hon. Gentleman was about to introduce that uniformity of suffrage which, according to his late Colleague, must create a mass of discontent among all those who were excluded. We were now on our way to the manhood suffrage of the United States. The right hon. Gentleman eulogized manhood suffrage, because it had carried the United States through a great civil war. The right hon. Gentleman forgot to notice the fact that, with our existing institutions, we had hitherto avoided civil war. Members sitting on his (Mr. Newdegate's) side of the House had rightly endeavoured to obtain from the Government some information about the intended redistribution of seats. If the Government were going to act on the principle of equality, the county population would demand a more adequate share of representation than it possessed at present. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] If such a change of the principle of equality was to be observed, it would involve a revolution. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] The right hon. Gentleman objected to his using the term revolution. Perhaps, when he next addressed the House, he might coin some new word to convey his meaning. The system that would then exist would approach very nearly to that of equal electoral districts, and would be another step in the direction of Democracy. Let the House remember that they were dealing with the majority of the English people. The population of the counties in England and Wales numbered 13,688,902, the county Members were 187, the borough population numbered 12,285,537, while the borough Members were 297. Why should the county population submit to this gross inequality of representation? He would warn the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), who was the present Leader of what was the Conservative Party, that they had had one great success, thanks to his hon. Neighbours from Ireland. When an attempt was made to introduce Atheism into the House, they acted on a specific principle for a specific object; then the Party was recognized again as Conservative of a great principle, and they succeeded. He (Mr. Newdegate) was the senior ex-organizer of the Constitutional Party in the House; and he warned the right hon. Baronet that the Liberal Party, from their very name, bespoke universal relaxation. The name of Liberal was derived from the Latin verb libero, and meant quod liberat, that which loosens. It would be an inconsistent and absurd attempt on the part of the defenders of the Constitution, if they tried to compete in Democratic concessions with the Liberal Party. He knew enough of Englishmen to believe that those were to be found who were not ashamed of the liberty which their unenfranchised fathers enjoyed when the franchise was limited, before 1832. Unless Conservatives were found who would maintain the principles of the Constitution against Democratic assaults such as were now being made, the present Conservative Party would lapse; and then, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) would have to make another whirl about and resume the character in which he (Mr. Newdegate) first knew him, that of a genuine Conservative.

MR. R. POWER said, he should not attempt to follow the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) through the rather wide discussion which he had raised; but he could not help expressing the feelings of gratitude and pleasure with which he (Mr. R. Power) had listened to the statement made by the Prime Minister. During the whole of the time he had been in the House, he did not think he had ever read a more extraordinary, or more extravagant, Amendment than that in the name of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), and its extravagance was only equalled by the extravagance of the language in which it was introduced. He could not congratulate the Tory Party upon their tactics on this occasion. They reminded him of the tactics of the Egyptian Army, when those in the rear cried "forward," and those in the front cried "back." Really, the Tory Party, in their opposition to the Bill, sought, by every means in their power, to dwindle down and whittle away the benefits which it would confer on the people of the Three Kingdoms; and though they were disgracefully beaten in their efforts on the second reading by a majority of 130, yet it ought not to be forgotten that in their future opposition to the measure they would have to contend with far smaller majorities; for he had no doubt, in their tactics and dilatory Motions, they would be ably assisted and cheered on by such Liberals as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) and the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey). It was now over 80 years since the Irish Members first came to that House to ask for their country the same rights and privileges which the people of England and Scotland possessed; and although they only asked for an equalization of the law, for a measure that in no way was revolutionary or novel, yet the Irish Members had, up to the present moment, found it impossible to get for their countrymen the same electoral privileges and rights which Englishmen and Scotchmen possessed. It was a sad, if not disgraceful, condemnation of the English rule in Ireland to find that after 80 years of so-called Union there were so many gross inequalities remaining between the two countries; and that, when they had brought forward Reform Bills and measures for the improvement of their municipal institutions, they had always carefully excluded Ireland from the provisions of those measures. When the late Mr. Butt first formed a Party in that House, his great idea was that, by united action, the Irish Members could compel Parliament to accede to their just and legitimate demands; and for many Sessions no man laboured harder or pleaded more eloquently in any cause, yet he (Mr. R. Power) regretted to say Mr. Butt passed away without having accomplished any of the reforms for which he so eloquently pleaded; and it was not till his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) took up a firmer attitude that English statesmen at last listened to the demands of Irish Members. The question now before the House—or rather the question which would be before the House if the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had the courage to stick to his Amendment was—Are you going to give the same rights and privileges to the people of Ireland, which you are prepared to give to the people of England? Are you going to say to the Irish people—"We do not intend to give give you those rights?" You must pay our taxes, fight our battles, obey our laws, and support our institutions; but we shall not give you those rights and privileges, because you are our inferiors in intellectual and moral qualities. The principle which he believed underlay this Bill was, that they could only exclude from the franchise those who were unfitted to exercise it through want, either of intelligence or integrity; and he maintained that the Irishman was at least equal to the Englishman in either of these two qualities. Let them, for one moment, glance at the gross inequalities which existed between the two countries on this question of the franchise. He should not weary the House with many figures, because he was aware the House disliked figures almost as much as he did himself. He should only take the five principal towns of Ireland. Dublin had a population of 267,717, and the franchise was enjoyed by only 12,310; whereas Leeds, with a population of 259,000, had 49,300 electors. Belfast had a population of 174,413, and yet only 19,633 electors; while Aberdeen, with a population of 88,125, had 13,738 electors. Cork had a population of 100,518, and yet it had only 4,445 electors; whereas Greenock, with half the population, had 7,614 electors. Lastly, Waterford, which had a population of 29,918, had only 1,414 electors; whereas Grimsby, with a population of 3,000 less, had actually 5,205 electors. He could give further examples of inequality; but, surely, if figures could prove anything, those figures must conclusively prove to an impartial mind the gross unfairness and injustice of the inequalities which existed. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire said reducing of the franchise was a dangerous and revolutionary measure, particularly as regarded Ireland. Well, that argument he (Mr. R. Power) had heard applied to almost every measure, however great or small, which had ever been introduced in that House, and it was always applied to Reform Bills. It was applied to the Reform Bill of 1832, and yet that Bill did not produce a revolution. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire might think Irishmen were not fit to exercise equal privileges with his own countrymen, and might believe them to be inferior in intellect and integrity or moral qualities; but the hon. Member might depend upon it that, the more England refused to them the demands of fairness and justice, the more irresistible and stronger would they make the claim of Irishmen for the legislative independence of their country. There was no danger in allowing the Irishman to exercise his vote; but there was real danger in shutting Irishmen out from the benefits and privileges of free representative institutions. They might depend upon it that the greater the rights enjoyed by Irishmen under the rule of the Constitution, the more would the Constitution be respected; and they would improve the social and moral condition of the Irish people, by giving them an interest in, and control over, the affairs of their own country. Conservatives, of course, called this measure revolutionary; and he (Mr. R. Power) was surprised that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire did not say something in his very discursive speech about the Pope. There were very few of the hon. Gentleman's long orations in which he did not bring up the name of that Potentate. Several hon. Members feared the influence of the Catholic clergy under the Bill. They tried to conjure up the nightmare of Catholic ascendancy; but he (Mr. R. Power) would ask the House to allow him to read to them a passage from a speech that was delivered a few years ago by a Gentleman who represented in that House, not only the Irish Protestant Party, but also the Irish Orange Party. Mr. W. Johnston, the Member for Belfast, speaking on the question of the franchise, said—

"The Protestant population of Ireland had no fear of their fellow-countrymen in other parts of Ireland, and they asked for equal and fair justice for all portions of the Kingdom, and, therefore, he supported the measure cordially."

He (Mr. Power) hoped his hon. Friend the present Member for Belfast would, upon this occasion, express some amount of liberality, and support the Bill before the House. There was more evil in excluding Ireland from the provisions of this Bill than at first might be apparent to many hon. Members. He did not conceal the fact that, among a certain portion of his countrymen, a feeling of the utter hopelessness of gaining anything from that Parliament was becoming stronger every day. If Parliament denied to Irishmen this extension of the franchise, it would declare that they were not the equals of Englishmen; and he would ask, if Irishmen were not their equals, why should they be there at all? Englishmen, he knew, were very fond of calling Ireland the Sister Country; but, to his mind, they treated it far more like a step-daughter than a sister. They had reduced the condition of political affairs to this—that they must either give the franchise to the Irish people, or govern that country by force of arms; and if they had to do that, they would find it a very expensive and very unpleasant undertaking. Depend upon it, if the people of Ireland were driven into illegal excesses, it would be because Parliament denied them equal privileges; and when the hon. Member for North Warwickshire spoke about all the horrors and evils that would ensue if the franchise were extended to the Irish labourer, he forgot the best safeguard against all those evils would be the very granting of the franchise to those people. The hon. Member seemed to forget that it was the curtailment of rights and privileges which, in every country and every age, had driven men into excesses and rebellion. He was no true friend of either England or Ireland, who, in that House, had not the courage to speak the opinions which he believed actuated his countrymen at home; and he (Mr. R. Power) would ask the House what answer were Irish Members to make to their countrymen in Ireland and abroad, when these asked them how it was that it took over 30 years to gain from the English Parliament a measure of simple justice, and when they sneered at them for going into an Assembly that had branded their countrymen with a mark of inferiority? These men who so sneered at them entertained more extravagant opinions than they (the Irish Members) did, and had little or no belief in Constitutional agitation; and the House of Commons, if it excluded Ireland from the Bill, would be the best friends of unconstitutional agitation in Ireland. Aye, the men of whom he spoke would welcome their action. They were watching many movements of that House, in the hope that England might refuse to give to Ireland the privileges they themselves possessed. It looked very like, indeed, as if some parties in that House wished always to have an Irish difficulty; but they ought to take care lest the Irish difficulty might some day become an Irish impossibility. The Conservative opponents of the Bill had two logical reasons, from their point of view, for opposing it. First of all, the Tory Party feared the people; and, secondly, they knew that the Bill must be followed by a Redistribution Bill, and that the Redistribution Bill must destroy many of the small boroughs in England, over which the Conservatives had so much influence. In some respects the loss of these boroughs would be a loss to that House; and he (Mr. R. Power) feared, as a result, that they might lose some of their most distinguished men. The hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) would no longer be there to whisper to them the secrets of every European Cabinet; and even his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) might also go away, without having accomplished the dream of his youth—the abolition of patent medicines. He was sorry to say that it was even possible they might lose the presence of his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands); and, thereby, no longer witness that interesting and consistent spectacle of an hon. Member vehemently denouncing the Government, and the next minute supporting them by his vote. Speaking seriously, he believed that if the Bill were passed they would strengthen the Constitution of England; they would bring into that House the true Representatives of the Irish people; and it would then be for them to declare, in an unmistakable way, the amount of self-government which they were prepared to give the Irish people in the affairs of their own country.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he did not think the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) required any answer from the Irish Benches, especially as it had been so effectively replied to by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister; but, as the right hon. Gentleman said he thought a duty lay upon the Irish Members to make some remarks upon the subject, he (Mr. Sullivan) would just submit a few considerations on the Motion to the judgment of the House. He did not, however, consider the occasion called for much exertion on his part, seeing that the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had not the courage to face a Division. The case against Ireland was so bad, that he dared not submit it even to an English House of Commons, and his arguments were utterly without basis or foundation. The hon. Member said that, inasmuch as the condition of Ireland at present was unsatisfactory, it should be allowed to remain so, except in so far as it could be made very much worse than it was at present. The hon. Member further urged that the Irish people were not well contented with English rule, and that additional power ought not to be put into their hands. But if the Irish people to-day were disaffected, how had that state of things been brought about? Was it not by the denial of justice, by the withdrawing of the rights of the people, by the denial to them of those privileges freely accorded to the people of England? It was those things that had made the Irish people discontented and disaffected; and the hon. Member thought he would improve that state of things by an act of flagrant injustice. He thought it was most extraordinary that such a proposal should be advanced with an idea of its being accepted by any human being possessed of reasoning faculties, or any assembly of intelligent men in that or any other part of the world. It was like telling a captive that he would have no relief from his chains, which were to be allowed to eat into his flesh until he did not care to be released. It was like telling a hungry man that he would have no bread until he did not crave for it. This was just a parallel case with that which had been raised by the hon. Member who had addressed the House a short time before (Mr. Brodrick). Well, he would tell the hon. Member, or any other hon. Member who was disposed to take the same view of the case, if they were to wait until Ireland grew content with injustice and with English rule as it now existed, they would wait for ever. The people of Ireland would never grow contented with slavery, and would never be satisfied with injustice. They would always continue to strive to the best of their ability, in order to gain that freedom which was the right of the nation. He was proud to know that the Irish people were not content with the slavery which had been inflicted upon them by a more powerful nation; and he said it was to their honour and glory that they continued to fight against this state of things and insisted upon their rights. Though they had been defeated upon every field, yet they had never surrendered, and they were determined still to keep their flag flying; and their hearts to-day remained unconquered, and would remain unconquerable. They had had a very touching picture drawn by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire of the fear and terror in which an Irish land agent had lately found himself. He was once a happy man; but now it seemed that he had got some threatening letters, and his life was in danger. Now, because that gentleman had felt those terrors for his safety, the House of Commons was, forsooth, to refuse an act of justice to the Irish people. The story which had been given of the agent was a one-sided story. There was a very important side of it which had not been presented by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire. In the days when that agent was happy and contented, was there happiness in the homes of the humble people over whom he held sway? All he (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) could say was, that in those halcyon days, when this agent was comfortable, there was fear and trembling amongst the poor people whom he ruled over. He would also say, for the peace of mind of that worthy land agent, that there was now some security for the honest toilers in Ireland, and greater peace and security amongst the people, than there had been in those days when the land agent was happy, and the people were terrified and miserable. They were told that to extend the franchise to Ireland would be to strengthen the hands of the Separatist Party in Ireland. Well, how would it be if the franchise was not extended to Ireland? He would ask the hon. Gentleman to answer that question. If there was danger that the extension of the franchise would strengthen the hands of the Separatist Party in Ireland, there was ten times more danger that the refusal of it would strengthen their hands—it would not only strengthen their hands, but give them an unanswerable case. There was no man in Ireland, of extreme or moderate views, who did not perfectly understand and believe that no better stroke of business could be done to strengthen the hands of the Separatist Party in Ireland than to inflict upon that country this insult and injustice. No better means could be chosen for the accomplishment of that end than the measure proposed by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire. The hon. Member asked, were the Irish Party in the House of Commons such a comfort to the Government that they should consent to increase their numbers and bring them a large reinforcement of strength? If the present Irish representation was not at peace with the House of Commons, he (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) said that it ought not to be, and he hoped it never would be, as long as Ireland was suffering wrong. If the Irish Members were such a trouble to the House, did the hon. Member think that the political situation would be improved by turning them out of the House of Commons, and refusing to the Irish people any representation at all? If the argument was worth anything, it went to that extent. He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) would ask, who believed that the peace and happiness of the people would be advanced by denying them their representation; and who believed that the Separatist Party would not find it to their advantage that there should be such a state of things? He said that the result of such a measure would be, even from an English point of view, most fatal, as it would aggravate all the evils which at present existed and produce greater troubles. No more foolish and insensate step could be taken. They would hear a good deal, no doubt, as the debate went on, about what was called the "loyal minority" in Ireland. The House of Commons would be asked, were they going to abandon those who had remained true and stood by them for so many years? Why, what, he would ask, was going to happen to the loyal minority in Ireland? What were they afraid of? What were they going to do with them? Were they going to put them into some dark corner and slaughter them; or what else was going to happen? Had they not a majority in that House, and another in the House of Lords? He really could not see what was in such arguments. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire evidently did not think that there was much in his arguments himself; for after all his inflammatory language on the subject he did not dare to press his Motion to a Division. He believed that in that, as in all other matters of English rule, England must be prepared to grant full justice to Ireland; for so long as she declined to do so, so long would Separatists, Extremists, and Invincibles be found in Ireland in the future as they had been in the past. No evil result could possibly arise from doing justice to Ireland; but any measure, such as had been proposed, which would be the very negation of justice and fair play, could not fail to bring about a bad condition of things. Separation had been talked about. He maintained the claim of the Irish people to that measure of independence which they had formerly enjoyed, with such modifications as recent experience had shown to be advisable. The people demanded the restoration of the Constitution, for the maintenance of which Henry Grattan had fought, and which had been taken away from the Irish people by means the most nefarious and infamous. The longer the measure of justice was denied, the more firmly resolved would the people become to obtain their rights, and the more extreme would become their demands. This Irish National question might have been settled at the time of O'Connell; it might have been settled later still under Isaac Butt; or it might have been settled through the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) before now. He hoped the House of Commons would not be misled into yielding to the representations which had been made to them, to deny to Ireland her claim to be placed, in the matter of the franchise, upon an equality with England and Scotland.

MR. J. R. YORKE remarked that the impalpable, shadowy grievances of the Irish people appeared to increase rather than diminish with every attempt that was made to meet them. Hon. Members representing Irish constituencies had told them that night that the extension of the franchise in that country was the one thing needful to make Irishmen content. ["No!"] There were two points of view from which this matter could be looked at—that of the public interest, and that of Party advantage. The public disadvantage that must result from the extension of the franchise in Ireland was palpable enough; and if Her Majesty's Government did not perceive it, it was not because some of their Colleagues were not fully aware of the character of the individuals whose hands the extension of the franchise in Ireland would strengthen. In a speech that he had delivered at Glasgow in October, 1881, the Home Secretary had said that the object of the Irish Party was not to benefit the Irish tenants, but to bring about a political revolution; and that the land agitation was fomented with the intention of breaking up the Empire, and of overthrowing the established Government of the United Kingdom; that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) demanded not the fixing of a fair rent, but no rent at all, and that he sought to get rid of the landlords with the object of getting rid of the

English Government. The Prime Minister had been equally definite in his description of the objects of the Leaders of the Irish Party. In announcing the arrest of the hon. Member for the City of Cork in October, 1881, the right hon. Gentleman had said that that object was to get rid of law, order, and the rights of property. These were the objects of the men whose hands the present proposal of the Government was calculated to strengthen. To introduce a large body of such men into that House would be merely to introduce traitors to the Constitution—that was to say, men whose avowed objects were hostile to the interests of the Empire. If they strengthened the position of Members who were actuated by such motives as were avowed by the Irish Party, they would fall into the condition of some foreign countries that had had to change their Governments three times a-year. It was idle to suppose that they would avoid that danger if the Irish Party of disaffection held the balance, and could control events, when they admitted that they did not consider the safety of the Empire their first object, and that they came here to promote their own purposes. It was necessary to revert to these things when they were ignored in rhetorical appeals from the Treasury Bench for justice to Ireland. Was it not a superficial view of the matter to say that they were doing justice to Ireland by giving it an equal franchise, when they held back the enjoyment of the ordinary privileges of social life? If a man could not be trusted to walk about with a stick, it seemed a strange thing to present him with a pistol. It was difficult to understand the infatuation which promoted legislation of this kind in the present condition of Ireland. It was wrong from a public point of view; but from a Party point of view it was easy of explanation. Indeed, it appeared that the conditions of the Kilmainham contract were being carried out. In that concluding paragraph which was read to the House at the instance of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) it was said that the accomplishment of the programme that had been sketched would be regarded as a practical settlement of the Land Question; would enable the Irish Members to co-operate cordially with the Liberal Party in forwarding Liberal principles; and would justify the Government in dispensing with coercion. The Members for Ireland were now co-operating with the Government in forwarding Liberal principles, and they would expect next year that coercive legislation should not be renewed. The Prime Minister had made a further bid for Irish support by promising Ireland more than its proportional share of Representatives; but he would probably find it impossible to carry a Redistribution Bill based on this injustice. When the Irish Members had been used to get the chestnuts out of the fire they would be thrown over; and, not for the first time, they would have been used to carry measures profitable to the Liberal Party, but disastrous to the best interests of Ireland.

MR. SALT said, he desired to consider the matter from a political point of view, using that word in the sense of what was best for the country, apart from personal or Party considerations. The change proposed was one of the greatest importance to the householder, and it became necessary to consider what was his position. It had been laid down by an authority no less eminent than Lord John Russell that the householder had in himself a right to the franchise; but that claim could not be too strongly repudiated. Because a man was a householder he had no right ipso facto to a vote—he had a right to good government, to freedom of speech, action, and thought. These were the things to which every man, woman, and child had an inherent right; but not to the franchise. The rule they should lay down in determining where to bestow it was in what way they could get the best House of Commons; for they must not forget that the House of Commons so created was not a Body dealing with the administration of a few Islands in the North Sea merely, but of a great Empire. He would make a large admission in regard to the householder; he had no objection to the householder in the country—he was as good as the householder in the town; but in admitting him largely to the franchise many considerations must be kept in view. He quite concurred in a remark which fell from an hon. Member in the early part of the evening as to the advantage of a wide basis of representation, so long as that basis was arranged on fair and intelligent grounds; but when it was said that the effect of placing the representation of the people on a wide basis had been to create a character in the people and a force which would not have existed otherwise, he could not help recalling the circumstances of their past history. A House of Commons elected by very narrow constituencies had carried on the Business of the country in times of great emergency. The country never was in greater danger than between the years 1790 and 1815, when foreign wars were being waged and great interests were at stake at home. Any large enfranchisement of the people, he maintained, must be subject to certain rules, acknowledged by all who had turned their attention to the subject; and though he could not go into those points in detail, it was fair to indicate what he thought they were, inasmuch as they guided him to the opinion at which he had arrived. The first was that of population. Another would be intelligence. Property was another element, and by property he did not merely mean large fortunes, but any property—it might be a cottage which a man desired to preserve and cherish. Locality and the peculiar interests of localities ought to be considered, and also variety in their representation. In addition to all these, there was a time for a Reform Bill. Opportunity was another point to be considered. He was not going to deal with the objection that the Bill was not a complete measure; it had been presented to the House as a complete measure on the highest authority—that of the Government, who were responsible for what it did and what it was. His objection to it was that on carefully examining it, not on Party or personal grounds, not for the purpose of present emergency, he believed it to violate nearly every axiom of representation of the people that had been laid down by our best statesmen. Coming to the question of its application to Ireland, he would like to speak of that country in the most kind and gentle way; but he wished to consider what a statesman would do as a matter of political and philosophical justice. He was willing to admit that Ireland had had many difficulties, and that those difficulties ought to be met with the utmost fairness and justice; in fact, he would go further, and say that they should be met with great consideration and generosity. What was the condition of Ireland? They had been told early in 1880 that Ireland was in a state of unusual quiet and total absence of crime; then had come a most deplorable state of things in that country; and two years afterwards they had been told, on the highest authority, that, so far from the country being in a state of comfort and content, the worst elements were then predominant and the best elements were suppressed. Great discontent was felt in the country; but he would ask the House whether the dissatisfaction of the Irish people, as expressed in Irish newspapers, was one which was to be remedied by an extension of the franchise? There was a phrase which had been uttered by a statesman of great eminence, which had given rise to a great deal of political discussion and animosity—namely, that “force is no remedy.” Of that phrase he took a very different view from that held by an immense number of people in this country. He thought that there were two interpretations of the saying; and unfortunately it was the worst one which had got about the country at large—that there was no use in applying force to produce order, because it was ineffectual. In that sense the words were mischievous; but there was another sense in which they might be understood—namely, that force was no remedy for the grievances which had caused the discontent. They might have to use force to procure order; but it was not a remedy without looking further. Taking that best view of the words, he had not been able to see in the whole course of Irish trouble anything that could lead to the conclusion that the extension of the franchise in that country would be a remedy. Forty or 50 years before, in talking to an Irish friend who knew the country well, he had remarked that he could not see any solution of the difficulties which existed in Ireland, and the reply had been—“Leave us alone; give us rest.” He believed now that the real solution of the difficulties of the country was to be found in rest and quietness; let them do what was just and right; but, above all, give the country rest. Let them do what they could to remove grievances and difficulties, and make improvements as fast as they could; but they should never take a single step without knowing that it would lead to greater contentment and peace.

MR. FINCH-HATTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had, in a debate previous to the Easter Recess, charged the Opposition that they were simply putting in force all the arts of Obstruction against the progress of the Bill before the House. He (Mr. Finch-Hatton) resented such a calumnious charge, and must be allowed to express the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would feel it but right to withdraw it as being wholly untenable. Turning to the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), he observed that probably in many minds throughout the country the interest of the whole subject of the franchise chiefly centred round the question of whether or not it was expedient to extend the franchise to Ireland; and the attitude of the Opposition in regard to the extension of the suffrage in Ireland must be carefully distinguished from their attitude in regard to its extension in other parts of the United Kingdom. They might have their doubts whether the large number of persons in England and Scotland which it was now proposed to enfranchise were sufficiently qualified to exercise that trust with due advantage to the State, and yet they might believe that those new voters were loyal subjects of the Queen, who would carry out their duties faithfully according to their lights. But the facts prevented their having such security as to the great mass of the electors whom it was sought to enfranchise in Ireland; and, moreover, they were met at the outset by this lion in their path—that the Prime Minister had not apparently withdrawn from the original statement which he had made to the House—namely, that he did not intend, or that he thought it unadvisable, to reduce the number of Representatives sent to that House from Ireland. He wished to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman still adhered to that statement; or whether he was prepared to modify it so far as to say that he would only give to Ireland such a number of Representatives as should seem fair, taking into consideration her population and her taxation; because when that subject was discussed before the Prime Minister, in answering the remarks of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) repudiated any idea of having made that declaration as a bid for the Irish vote, observing that the Opposition usually derived more support than the Ministry did from Irish Members. But when both sides of the House had their field day, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite bagged 130 more than his opponents, the Irish game was not discovered in the bag of the Opposition, and they were induced to look with some suspicion into the bag of the right hon. Gentleman, when the first 30 birds found there were Irish. Again, he wished to know whether the Prime Minister had abandoned his centrifugal theory with respect to Parliamentary representation? Although the right hon. Gentleman had maintained that places which were far off were entitled to greater representation, because of the difficulties of communication between the constituencies and their Members, it was a remarkable fact that the Division List of the House showed that the Members from Scotland put in an attendance at a larger number of Divisions than the Members from any other part of the United Kingdom. With respect to the number of Representatives from Ireland, the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had urged them to maintain the provisions of the Act of Union, and that, too, by the extraordinary expedient of passing a Bill the admitted result of which would be to introduce 60 more Members pledged to the repeal of the Union. Mr. Pitt said that if the different parts of the Kingdom were united in interests and convictions, it mattered little whether the number of Representatives from one part was smaller or greater. But was Ireland in that condition? Was she united to us in interests and convictions? The Coercion Act threw a heavy onus probandi upon the Government. If Ireland was unfit to be intrusted with the exercise of the ordinary rights of citizenship, how could she be said to be ripe for the most responsible privileges of citizenship? The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had said that the sooner the fact was recognized that there was a state of civil war between the English and the Irish people the better it would be for both. The Chief Secretary, at Galashiels, stated that nothing but the Queen's Government—by which the right hon. Gentleman must have meant the Prevention of Crime Act—stood between Ireland and civil war.

MR. TREVELYAN explained that he was then referring to the disturbances between the Orangemen and the Nationalists, which were quieted by the ordinary powers of the law.

MR. FINCH-HATTON said, that in that case the Government ought to withdraw the Coercion Act. So far as Ireland was concerned, the operation of that Bill ought to be suspended either until the Government could rule Ireland without a Coercion Act, or until it could be shown that the effect of the measure would not be to transfer the balance of power to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), or to disfranchise loyal minorities in the country, or to dismember the Empire. The people of this country, anxious as they were for the privilege of the franchise, would gladly wait if it was necessary until such time as they could obtain it without danger to the stability of the Empire.

MR. W. SHAW said, that the Speaker would very soon be allowed to leave the Chair, in order that the House might go into Committee on the Bill. The general question would be settled in the House of Lords; but he ventured to prophesy that their Lordships would not throw out the Bill. He imagined that the Gentlemen in that House, aided by the advice of Gentlemen in the House of Commons of great experience and sagacity, would hardly run the risk of throwing out this Bill, and repeating what occurred on a former occasion—namely, passing in 10 minutes a Bill of a much more extensive and drastic character than this. So far as England, Scotland, and Wales were concerned, the effect of this Bill would not be unfavourable to the Conservative Party. The electors in the country districts were a slow and ignorant class of people, who did not even see a penny paper until it was two days old; and he did not know any more suitable ground for Conservative organization. In fact, he was quite sure that the Conservative organization would get an immense deal of support from these country voters in England and Wales. But the question of more immediate importance to the House was the question of Ireland. Now, he should like to know as to the Amendment put upon the Paper by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), and as to the speeches by which it had been supported, although it had not been moved, did they represent the opinion of the Conservative Party? Was the House to look upon that Amendment as embodying the views they would hold if they got into power? If so, the logical thing for them to do would be to suspend the present Constitution, in Ireland and to take away the votes of those people who had them at present. That would be the natural thing for them to do if they believed in that Amendment. There was no doubt that the addition of electors in Ireland by this Bill would be proportionally much larger than in England or Scotland, because in Ireland the present franchise was much higher than in those countries. But was that a thing which Parliament could avoid? Would it be possible for any Government to bring in a Franchise Bill, and to avoid that? He did not think it would; in fact, the thing was perfectly absurd. It was not arguable. It had often been stated in the House that a General Election under the present franchise would bring a large addition to the ranks of what was called the Active Irish Party. He believed it would. He spoke only his own opinions; but he thought it would be hardly worth while to contest constituencies in three Provinces in Ireland against those Gentlemen if they were able to get candidates to contest them. He could speak for himself; and although he very much valued a seat in the House of Commons, yet he looked upon the importance of settling the Irish question as so great that he would vacate his seat to-morrow, and give it to any Gentleman who would come into the House in order to make a Party to bring that question to an issue. This was not a question which they could let lie on from year to year. The sooner that by this Bill, or by creating a large Party with this Bill, they brought Government face to face with the Irish question the better. The non-settlement of it was hindering the prosperity of Ireland, was demoralizing political Parties in England, and was working evil all round. Therefore, he said that if this Bill did nothing else than to bring into the House a party of 70 or 80 Gentlemen pledged to one object it would do good. The issue would be placed plainly before the House. It was said that that object had not yet been formulated. Probably it had not; but he thought the views put forward by the hon. Member for Westmeath, who was generally considered an extreme man, were views that would be generally accepted, and he did not believe there was any considerable Party in Ireland who looked to separation pure and simple as a solution of the question. He spoke from a general knowledge of the South and Midland Counties of Ireland. He knew pretty well the farmers and intelligent working-classes in these districts; and from intercourse with them his opinion was that they did not look to anything but a settlement of what was called the political controversy between the two countries. That was not a thing to frighten either England or Scotland. It was not a thing that should make Parliament deny a political right to the country, and keep it suspended for an indefinite time, thus creating a greater evil than the one they were now trying to avoid. He believed that if Lord Beaconsfield were alive the Irish would get what they wanted; and that if Mr. Pitt could have foreseen the future he would not have brought forward the Act of Union as it now stood upon the Statute Book. As the Act had worked, it had not been good for the country; and if it were left as it stood, without such modifications as were possible in the minds of political thinkers, and which might be easily worked out within the lines of the Constitution, it would be worse for England, and worse even for Ireland. Ireland was a poor country, and had, unfortunately, very little to engage the attention of her people. She wanted increased manufactures, and the sooner they could settle this question and Ireland could settle down to business the better. Then the minds of the people would be engaged, and their whole attention would not be devoted to political theories; but until the Irish question was settled there could not be a proper and legitimate connection between the two countries. He had before expressed his opinion that it would be a misfortune, and nothing but a misfortune, to separate Ireland from England. He believed it would be against the views of the great majority of the Irish people to go out, as it were, upon a sea of politics, and to have to construct a Constitution for itself upon new lines. They wanted only that the lines of the present Constitution should be modified and shaped in accordance with the wants of the country and the times in which they lived. There was nothing in this to frighten any thoughtful politician, or to make them for a moment think that the future of Ireland would be worse instead of better. The people who were proposed to be enfranchised in Ireland were not a bit worse than the people whom it was proposed to enfranchise in England. They were quite as intelligent, and were in every way as well conducted a people as could be found in England. But they would resent, indeed, the passing of a Bill of this character if a great number of their countrymen were excluded from its privileges. He looked forward to the near future with hope. He hoped there would be born an Irish Party, 70 or 80 in number, who would be able to formulate some plan, and put it before the House and the country, that should be consistent with the union of the two countries, and that peace should be brought about thereby. He himself had not the slightest doubt of it. He believed no one in Ireland really wanted revolution with a view to carrying out their purposes. Let the question as against England be once settled, and they would be able to work out with a fair purpose the political union of the two countries.

Mr. GORST said, he should not have troubled the House on the present occasion but for the fact that he wished it to be understood that the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), on which a Division was not intended to be taken, did not represent the views of the entire Conservative Party. The Prime Minister, when he introduced the Bill, called upon Parliament to trust the people; and as far as he knew there was no feeling of distrust among Conservative Members in the body of the people—in fact, his opinion was that the opinion of the general body of the people of Great Britain was Conservative; and that, therefore, when the Bill passed, if it ever did pass, an increased power would be given to Conservative opinion. If they were prepared to trust the people of Great Britain, he saw no reason why the people of Ireland should not be trusted also. He was most reluctant to believe in the disloyalty of the Irish people; and he did not know that anything had occurred within the last few years which would justify the House in pronouncing that the mass of the Irish people were disloyal. Was it, then, for the interest of the United Kingdom that the people of Ireland should be inadequately represented in that House? Why, clearly not. Whatever were the opinions of the Irish people, it was certainly desirable they should find utterance in Parliament rather than in the formation of secret societies. He should himself have been extremely sorry if the Government, while extending a large measure of enfranchisement to Great Britain, had found it necessary, as a matter of State policy, to refuse the same measure of enfranchisement to Ireland. He hoped that the last speaker and other hon. Members would not go away with the idea that the Motion which was put down on the Paper and not moved was in any sense an adequate representation of opinion on the Conservative side of the House.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN observed, that when the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Gorst) attempted to show that the Resolution before the House did not convey the general opinion of the Conservative Party he was not cheered by the Conservative side of the House. On the contrary, he was cheered a great deal more by the supporters of Her Majesty's Government. He thought that silence on the part of the Opposition well showed that the Conservative Party were pretty nearly unanimous on that point. He had observed, too, that when the hon. and learned Member remarked that he did not believe in the disloyalty of the large portion of the Irish people, the suggestion was received with marked and significant silence by those hon. Gentlemen who represented Ireland in the House. Personally, he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman to a considerable extent when he said he did not believe the whole of Ireland was disloyal. He had always emphatically maintained, and he declared now, that a large portion of the Irish people were loyal; and it was for this very reason that he objected to the franchise being extended to those portions of the community in Ireland who were hostile to England. Turning to the speech of the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw), he felt bound to confess that never since the days of Quintus Curtius was there such a display of self-abnegation and self-sacrifice as had been shown by the hon. Gentleman—for he had avowed himself the advocate of a measure which must infallibly terminate in his political extinction, and in the political extinction of every man who, like him, had a common sense and a common desire for the welfare of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman reminded him of another man of rather a later date, and perhaps of rather an apocryphal existence. He reminded him of Rip Van Winkle, for his speech went back to the days when he led the Home Rule Party in the House, and when the hon. Gentleman was the head of the Party to which he (Colonel King-Harman) belonged. Believing that the loyalty and common sense of the majority of the Irish people rendered them competent, to a certain extent, to manage their own affairs, the hon. Gentleman trusted to the Party, and believed in their policy until they rose up against him, and ousted him from his seat. The hon. Gentleman said he did not believe there was a large Party favourable to separation, and in that he agreed with him. He did not think that among Irishmen of capital, men of means and men of common sense, there was any desire to separate from Great Britain; but he maintained that amongst the large and ignorant class, who were misled by American agitators, and headed by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, there was an avowed determination to separate Ireland from England. He believed they would use, as their Leaders avowed they would use, every means in their power to secure that end. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), in a speech made at Cincinnati, said he would not take his coat off for the Land League—

An IRISH MEMBER: No; for Home Rule.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: He said he would not take off his coat for the Land League, if he did not intend to destroy the last vestige—

An IRISH MEMBER: The last link.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: If he did not destroy the last vestige of union between Ireland and England. The hon.

Gentleman knew he was quoting correctly. Whether they intended to carry out their threats, if they had the power to do so, and whether their dupes would assist them in doing so, he could not say; but such, at any rate, was the avowed intention of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. No doubt the hon. Gentleman would make use of any extension of power which Her Majesty's Government might in their consideration grant the Irish people to promote the disintegration of the Empire. If Her Majesty's Government believed this was the best course to adopt, of course, they must pursue it; but he must raise his voice on behalf of loyal Irishmen against extending the franchise to ignorant and misled people who, backed by an American agitation, were trying to sever Ireland from the Mother Country.

MR. WARTON observed, that the debate had been conducted entirely by Conservative Members, so-called Conservative Members, and Home Rulers. Not a single Liberal Member had spoken in all that great Government majority—and why? It was because they had given their consciences and opinions entirely to the Prime Minister, and were no longer a Liberal, but a Gladstonian Party. If they took the test of population or the test of property, Ireland was not entitled to retain the present number of Members.

MR. P. J. SMYTH: I regret to see that on the Motion to go into Committee on the Bill an Amendment has been placed upon the Paper alleging that Irishmen are not entitled to the same franchise as Englishmen and Scotchmen. Till hon. Gentlemen opposite prove—and they will find it no easy task to prove—that the Irish are a degraded race, they will try in vain to persuade those in this House to vote for the degradation of Ireland. This is the first Reform Bill which has been based upon a principle of equality, and which recognizes the fact that Ireland is a distinct part of the United Kingdom. In 1832 O'Connell's demand was for equality and identification. That demand was rejected, and there arose that mighty movement for the repeal of the Union which shook the Empire. This Bill means identification, and the proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Chaplin) implies separation. Half a century ago a noble Lord—a great English statesman —startled his hearers in “another place” by the astounding utterance that the Irish were aliens in blood, language, and religion. That utterance was immortalized by the retort which it drew from Richard Sheil in this House. What is the Amendment if it be not a repetition in another form of the Lyndhurst declaration? [Cheers.] Well, in Ireland, if we are aliens to you, you are aliens to us. We will be your friends as your equals, as aliens your foes. Let us understand each other, and whatever the consequences may be let justice and right be done. Adopt this Bill and provide after that a Redistribution Bill, a Bill which I hope will follow so closely upon the footsteps of the present that the two shall be virtually one, and that, therefore, all classes shall be fully represented in this House. Then you will rest future legislation upon a Constitutional basis when you have declared your intention to enfranchise the people.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The House always welcomes the views of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Smyth), and listens with pleasure to his eloquent speeches; but the question which anyone connected with Ireland naturally asks himself is, to what political Party does the hon. Member belong, or what political power in Ireland does he represent? The hon. Gentleman has told the House that the Irish people, if enfranchised, would be the friends of this Bill. Now, I believe that no sentiment ever uttered in this House could be more repugnant to those whom the hon. Member seeks to enfranchise in the county which he now represents. Anyone who has followed Irish politics within the past few years must note and record this melancholy fact—that the more bitter and the more hostile a man's utterances are against England, and to everything English, the more popular he becomes among certain classes in Ireland. If this Bill were to pass into law, and an Election were to take place upon it, every Member on the other side of the House who now represents an Irish constituency would, as the House very well knows, be forever consigned to political oblivion. In the earlier part of the evening we had a remarkable speech from the Prime Minister; a speech worthy of the right hon. Gentleman who made it, and worthy of the occasion; but it embodied the principle that the Union between England and Ireland can only be maintained by equal laws and equal institutions. Now, that is a new policy on the part of the Prime Minister. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to push that sentiment to its logical conclusion? During the 16 years that I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have seen, time after time, the Prime Minister come down and ask this House to assent to exceptional legislation, as far as Ireland is concerned, on the ground of the exceptional condition of that country. Our legislation for the last 16 years, with regard to the Church, the land, and social matters, has been exceptional for Ireland. During the last three years, so exceptional has been the land legislation of the Government, that it has touched the extreme limits of confiscation, and their repressive legislation has touched the extreme limits of coercion. Are we to understand that there are to be equal laws for England as for Ireland? Is the English Church to be disestablished because the Irish Church has been disestablished? ["Hear, hear!" from below the Gangway on the Ministerial side.] There are, no doubt, many hon. Gentlemen who wish to see it disestablished. Am I to assume, because exceptional legislation is enforced in Ireland, it will also be applied to England? The Government have suspended the whole system of trial by jury in Ireland? Are they anxious to try the same experiment in England? Silence follows my question. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to push to extreme limits, in the case of Ireland, the logical conclusion of his remarks in regard to Ireland? The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) has made a remarkable speech to-night; but he has been taunted by the Prime Minister with not having persevered with his Motion. The right hon. Gentleman should have recollected that even he himself, with his superb debating power, courage, and all his Parliamentary skill, has himself on several occasions been compelled to alter a proposal he had on the Notice Paper for many days when he found that the circumstances were not altogether favourable for its consideration. I can recollect one case when the late Government were in Office that the present Prime Minister placed four Resolutions on the Paper condemning their foreign policy. The whole Liberal Party came down—I do not know whether to support those Resolutions, but, at any rate, to hear the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, just in the same way as the Conservative Party have come down to-night to hear the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire. The Prime Minister, I suppose, judging from his own experience, said that no doubt the hon. Member had accepted the advice of the older, the more respectable, and the wiser Members of his Party. Therefore, I assume that four years ago the right hon. Gentleman accepted the advice of the older, the more respectable, and the wiser Members of the Liberal Party by withdrawing his Resolution. But I do not wish to push that point. The right hon. Gentleman is quite aware, from his great Parliamentary experience, that there are many occasions on which it is not only legitimate but statesmanlike for a man, however strong his opinions may be, not to put the House to the trouble of a Division, and the present was one of those occasions. I think my hon. Friend has been well advised in the course he has taken. There is not a single Member on this side of the House, except my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who does not believe that we are indulging in a most dangerous, if not reckless experiment, in reducing the franchise in Ireland. But there are two opinions which, to a certain extent, counter-balance and counteract each other. Some think that the condition of Ireland, making it dangerous to reduce the franchise, is a good reason for not bringing in any Franchise Bill affecting England and Scotland. But there are other persons who are of opinion that if a Franchise Bill is introduced, then that Bill ought, regardless of consequences, to be applied to Ireland. No doubt when there is this difference—a difference amongst us, so to say, on a minute detail—[A laugh.] Well, it is a minute detail. Hon. Gentlemen who interrupt me must recollect that we had a most favourable Division, which nothing can counteract on the point, and to which we attach the utmost importance, that redistribution should accompany extension of the franchise. We believe that any reduction made in the franchise ought to be accompanied by a redistribution of seats. In a Redistribution Bill the disaffected parts of Ireland would have their representation materially curtailed. We have had already, as I say, a favourable Division upon that point, because in a House of Commons with a nominal majority of 150 Her Majesty's Government had actually, in the Division to which I refer, only an actual majority of 27. Therefore the nature of our objections was covered by the vote which took place a few nights ago. What seems to me to be the objection against this Franchise Bill standing by itself is that there are two exceptional concessions made to Ireland. The Prime Minister, more than once, said that this Bill is merely the development of the great legislative judgment given in 1868; but the legislative decision arrived at in 1867 and 1868 was that a £4 franchise in Ireland was to be equivalent to household suffrage in England and Scotland; and, therefore, this Bill upsets that statement on which the Prime Minister himself originally relied, and the consequence is that by establishing household franchise in Ireland you would be approaching much more nearly to manhood suffrage than in England and Scotland. The Return presented to the House of Lords fully proves the truth of my observation. Therefore, under this Bill, you are giving to that part of Her Majesty's Dominions which is the most disturbed and the most disloyal a lower franchise than to those parts of Her Majesty's Dominions which are loyal. Another exceptional piece of favouritism shown to Ireland is that there is no Redistribution Bill. I contended the other night, and I think I proved, that if a Redistribution Bill is disassociated from this Bill you will not pass a Redistribution Bill in this Parliament; and if you do not pass it in this Parliament you will not pass one affecting Ireland for many years to come. When the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) comes back to this House with a following of 90 Members he would be unworthy of the sagacity and generalship which he has hitherto shown if he allowed a Redistribution Bill to pass though the House which would curtail his following. There was one observation made by the Prime Minister which, I think, is especially worthy of notice. He said that no doubt the result of this Franchise Bill might be that it would create a Parliamentary controversy in this House in reference to Irish matters at a period when, as he intimated, owing to his age, he might not possibly be longer amongst us. Now, I think that anyone who is proud of his career and of his Parliamentary position ought to think a little of the legacy he is bequeathing to those who come after him. Therefore, I want the right hon. Gentleman to consider what would be the position of the Liberal Party, and of the House of Commons, if we have 90 Members returned from Ireland all pledged to separation? It has been intimated by the Prime Minister that the Resolution which stood in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire was a libel upon the Irish Party. But that assertion did not elicit a single cheer. It is no libel at all. Those hon. Gentlemen know perfectly well that the one expression constantly cropping up in their speeches and Resolutions is that the House of Commons is a Foreign Assembly. What hon. Member from Ireland wishes merely to have such control over Irish local matters as they have in the United States? Does anybody suppose that any speaker in the United States would be allowed to describe the Congress of Washington as a Foreign Assembly, as the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) has described the House of Commons? Every day the violent Party is more and more getting the upper hand in Ireland. I have not got them with me now; but if any hon. Gentleman will note the Resolutions passed, and especially the Resolutions passed at meetings in England, attended by Irishmen, they will find that the simple repeal of the Union would not satisfy the Irish demands. Now, let us consider the condition of a subsequent House of Commons. What is the franchise but a means to an end, to give effect to the wishes of the people of Ireland? If the Nationalists of Ireland return 90 out of 100 Representatives, and demand the repeal of the Union with Ireland, will you refuse it? Can you refuse it? [Cries of "Yes!"] On what ground? You can only do it by force, and force alone. Yet force is the single instrument you repudiate. The Prime Minister says that, after all, if the worst comes to the worst, there will be 550 English and Scotch Members against 90 Irish. But will it be 550 English and Scotch Members against 90 Irish? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) declined to believe that any large body of the Irish people were hostile to the connection with England or disloyal. I recollect at the end of last Session that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), amid the cheers of his own Colleagues, asserted that the sooner it was understood that there was war between England and Ireland the better; and the only reason they did not give material effect to that war was that they had not the physical means of carrying it out. No doubt, if all the English and Scotch Members were to combine to deal as they ought to deal with the enemies of England and of English rule, one-half of the Irish difficulty would be solved. If English and Scotch Radicals would be true to themselves and their country, and would not enter into negotiations with those who avowed themselves to be the enemies of England and English rule, then the Irish difficulty would be easily solved. But exactly the same motives which induced right hon. Gentlemen opposite to negotiate the Kilmainham Treaty when only 30 votes had to be gained, will induce whatever Government may sit on those Benches, when 90 votes are to be obtained, to make even still greater concessions. That is the danger, if you grant a reduction of the franchise without a redistribution of seats. Nine-tenths of the Representatives of Ireland will come back favourable to separation; and in the course of time I believe we shall find ourselves unable to refuse our consent to that demand, although, to make use of the words of the President of the Board of Trade, our consent to that demand would mean civil war in Ireland or ruin to England. My firm belief is that if we pass this Bill in its present shape, without redistribution, we shall sow seeds of evil which will ultimately cause such a rift through the whole fabric of our Empire, our trade and commerce, as neither time nor human hands will be ever able to reclose.

Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

VOL. COLXXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title of Act).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF wished to know why the Government were obstructing their own Business? The hour was comparatively early, and there were loads of time for the Committee to go on with the Bill. Nevertheless, this precious Government, which stumped the country charging the Conservative Party with a desire to obstruct Business, was absolutely stopping this important measure on which, they asserted, the whole future of the country depended. At that hour the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was acting in a most extraordinary manner in asking the Committee to report Progress. He thought if any hon. Member on that side of the House had ventured to make such a Motion there would have been a very great outcry from the other side. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to reflect upon the dangerous course into which he was plunging. The Home Secretary, the other day at Derby, informed the country that nothing had been done in the House of Commons on account of the obstructive tactics of the Conservative Party. But what were the Government themselves doing? This was a measure to which the Government were pledged, and yet they were asking to have its consideration adjourned at that early hour. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider his determination, or to assign some reason why he had been induced to take this extraordinary course.

In reply to an hon. MEMBER,

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was probable that Supply would be taken on Monday next, and that the Army Estimates would be proceeded with.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Postponed Resolution [21st April] considered.

"(3.) That a sum, not exceeding £91,685, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in rising to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £2,000, in respect of the Wellington Statue, said: I hope the House will allow me to make a statement which, I think, will induce the House to consider that it is not desirable to pass this Vote. It will be in the recollection of the House that on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) there was a very near Division on this Vote of £2,000, which appears in the Estimates as a grant for the statue to the Duke of Wellington at Hyde Park Corner. That majority against the Amendment of my hon. Friend only amounted to three. On that occasion, I am sorry to say, as my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) remarked to me afterwards, there were two hon. Members who have studied apparently the new ethics of politics, and who having spoken one way voted the other, or there would have been a majority of one in favour of the Amendment. Now, what is this question? The question now before us is whether this sum of £2,000, which forms part of a sum of £6,000 to be voted next year, and part of a scheme which will involve an expenditure of £20,000—or, indeed, a great deal more—to be levied by public subscription, should be approved or not? Now, what I contend is that the statue of the illustrious Duke is public property. I maintain that it is a National monument. The public subscribed to it; it was made of metal taken in the course of the illustrious Duke's numerous campaigns, and being a National monument it should be treated as such by the House of Commons, and not by an irresponsible Committee. Now, I desire to speak in terms of the highest respect of those who are connected with that Committee, and also of my right hon. Friend opposite the First Commissioner of Works, because I honestly think that he has been a very good First Commissioner of Works. I think he has given careful attention to the subjects with which he has been charged, and I think he has carried out many great and useful Metropolitan improvements. I think it is only fair to say, without going further, that

I believe he has made a great mistake in this matter. He appears to have shrunk from the responsibility which belongs to his Office, and to have sheltered himself behind certain Committees—a General and an Executive Committee—and it will be in the recollection of the House that he has sheltered himself a very great deal behind the name of an illustrious personage, who, in the course of his speech the other night, the right hon. Gentleman quoted 17 times as being a high authority. I repeat that this is a National monument, and, therefore, it ought to be treated as such by the House of Commons, and not by an irresponsible Committee. The second suggestion I take from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman himself. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that it was the original intention of the Government to replace the statue where it was before. If the right hon. Gentleman had done that, all this bungling would have been avoided, and what would have been the consequence? Why, that the statue would have been where Her Majesty gave a solemn pledge to the Duke of Wellington that it should be; where the illustrious Duke himself wished it to be; where, I venture to say, the people of this Metropolis wish it to be; and where, I am confident, if you were to poll the Army, from the Commander-in-Chief himself down to the humblest drummer-boy, they would wish it to be. They would all say—"Put it back in its place where it was before"—namely, in the vicinity of Apsley House. Let the House recollect that three consecutive Prime Ministers of England agreed that the statue should be placed upon the Arch at Hyde Park Corner. Lord Melbourne, in 1838, advised Her Majesty the Queen to carry out the decision which had been arrived at by William IV., in 1832. In 1846, Sir Robert Peel sanctioned the erection of that statue upon the Arch; and in 1847, Lord John Russell, after a debate in this House, agreed that it should remain in the place where the Sovereign had given her pledge to the great Duke that it should be. But there is another objection that I make as regards this statue, and it is this—that the Government, having said that they wished it to go back to its former position, have, unfortunately, fallen into the mistake of consulting the Academicians. Now, the members of the Royal Academy, in my mind, are not people of very good taste. In fact, I am bound to say that I look upon a great many of the members of the Royal Academy of this day as a most degenerate and a meretricious body. I have received a number of letters from distinguished artists—although I must admit that they are not themselves members of the Academy, and therefore their complaints must be received a little cum grano salis—complaining that the Art opinion of many of the Royal Academicians is not worth much. Well, Her Majesty's Government having proposed to replace the statue, the Royal Academy stepped in, and the Royal Academicians said—"You must remove it altogether from the Arch, and now is your opportunity." I am sorry to say that my right hon. Friend has proposed to follow the advice of the Royal Academicians, having asked their opinion as to the statue. Many of them have said that the statue is a disgrace to British Art. ["Hear, hear!"] I shall show directly, if I am allowed to do so, that it is far from that. They say that it is a disgrace to British Art, and that it offends the canons of good taste. I recollect that on a recent occasion many of the members of the Royal Academy were examined in a Court of Law, and they all said that the busts called the "Belt busts" were a disgrace to British Art. But the Judges, the jury, and the public all took a different view of the matter. I recollect perfectly well the President of the Royal Academy saying in Court, when he saw one of the busts of Mr. Belt—and I only give this as an illustration of how little the President and his colleagues are to be entrusted in matters of Art—I recollect in the course of the Belt trial the Judge asking the President of the Royal Academy—"What do you think of that bust?" pointing to one of the busts of Mr. Belt. Sir Frederick Leighton, not knowing at the time that it was by Mr. Belt, said—"That is a bust worthy of Phidias." Upon which he was informed by counsel that the bust was by Mr. Belt; whereupon Sir Frederick turned round at once and said that it was not a work of Art all, but a disgrace to British Art, and not worthy of admission into an exhibition of the Royal Academy. What I have said is a positive fact. I would not venture to state it if it were not absolutely correct; and it proves to my mind that the opinion of the members of the Royal Academy is not worthy of the slightest consideration at the hands of this House. I maintain that it is not the opinion of the Royal Academy you ought to look to in this matter; but that in a question of a National monument it is the opinion of the House of Commons that ought to be looked to, and nothing else. This very morning we have had a paper delivered to us which is called a Petition of the Royal Academy. Well, now, it is a very curious document—it is almost as bad as their Art. A more fallacious document I do not think I ever read, and I shall be prepared to prove what I say. I only wish it had been in the hands of the House at the time of the last discussion; and I am surprised that the Government have not attempted to conceal it until after the discussion to-night, because it militates very strongly against the Royal Academicians who have petitioned the Government. If the House will allow me I will refer to one or two of the statements contained in this document. The Petitioners observe that—

"This displacement affords an opportunity for the removal from the summit of that Arch of the colossal equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington;"

and they say of the members of the Royal Academy—

"We should be wanting in duty did we fail to give emphatic expression to the strong desire and earnest hope entertained, not only by the artistic community, but by all those who are interested in English Art, that this reproach may at last be taken from among us."

This document goes on to speak of—

"The dismay of the intelligent in matters of Art, the vain protest of the architect whose work was to be marred, the efforts of Her Majesty's Government to induce the Committee to reconsider its disastrous decision, their offer through Sir Robert Peel to propose to Parliament a Vote of money to meet the expenses of a fitting pedestal, and the letter of Lord Morpeth to the Duke of Rutland acquainting him of the intention."

I will ask the House, in passing, to observe how untrue this statement—

"Of Her Majesty's Government to abide by their decision that the statue be removed."

This Memorial says that it was with dismay that the intelligent people of this country saw the placing of that statue on the Arch. The assertion is wholly a gratuitous one. One of the greatest patrons of Art at that time—Lord Francis Egerton—was, among others, a subscriber to that statue.

MR. A. F. EGERTON: May I be allowed to say that my Father was very much against the statue being placed upon the Arch?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I hope to be able to convince my hon. Friend that the statement he has just made is entirely at variance with the opinion expressed by Lord Francis Egerton at that time.

ADMIRAL EGERTON: May I also be allowed to interrupt the right hon. Baronet? I am bound to say that the statement of my hon. Relative opposite is entirely correct.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I do not at all venture to dispute the correctness of the statement. I only say that, as a judge of Art, Lord Francis Egerton at the time—and it is on record in Hansard—entered a protest in the strongest terms against the suggestion that the equestrian statue which had been made should not be placed on that Arch. That is on record; it is in Hansard, and hon. Gentlemen will be able to see for themselves whether my statement is not correct. The Memorial goes on to say that Her Majesty's Government—that is, the Government of Lord John Russell—had come to a decision to move the statue. I have looked into Hansard, and I can find nothing of the kind. On the contrary, this is a statement of the views of Lord John Russell, the Prime Minister who succeeded Sir Robert Peel in 1846. It is quite true that Lord Morpeth, who was then the First Commissioner of Works, wrote a letter saying that it was the intention of the Government to move the statue; but the Prime Minister came down to the House and said that, in consequence of a communication from the Duke of Wellington, the Government had made up their minds not to insist on the removal of the statue. Lord John Russell said that in the House; and what was the letter of the Duke of Wellington? I believe I can speak here with a great deal of authority. No man was more intimate with the Duke of Wellington, during 20 or 25 years of his life, than the late Sir Robert Peel. I have often heard the matter discussed and talked of; and what was it that the Duke of Wellington mentioned to Sir Robert Peel, and wrote to Lord John Russell? He wrote a letter which must be in the collection of the noble Lord's papers. He said that, as the Sovereign had given her solemn pledge to him that the statue should be placed upon the Arch, he desired to express his opinion that the removal of the statue might be considered as a mark of the disapprobation of the Crown towards himself; and therefore it was that Lord John Russell, as Prime Minister, came down to the House, notwithstanding the letter which had been written by Lord Morpeth, and explained that in consequence of what had been said by the Duke of Wellington the Government would not persevere in the matter. It is well known—and it may be seen in Hansard—that Lord Brougham said in the House of Lords, four days after the statement of Lord John Russell in this House, that he knew his illustrious Friend would feel hurt beyond expression if the statue were to be removed. I think I have shown pretty clearly that, at all events, the statement contained in the Memorial of the Royal Academy is very incomplete as regards what is said respecting the Government of Lord John Russell in 1847—namely, that they had determined to abide by the decision to remove the statue, because Lord John Russell himself had determined that it should not be removed. This document goes on to say—

“Still less is it needful in these days to dwell on the violation of every principle of propriety, and every canon of proportion, displayed in the existing haphazard combination.”

I think I see the Lord Mayor present. [An hon. MEMBER: He has just gone.] I do not intend to refer to him, of course, as a violation of every principle of propriety and every canon of proportion; but I wish the Lord Mayor had been present, because I desired to draw his attention to that hideous monstrosity in Fleet Street as one of those erections which offend against every canon of proportion. It is a curious matter of fact that when the President of the Royal Academy in this Petition states and maintains all through the argument that there is no precedent of this kind, everybody knows who has been on the Continent that the most splendid statue in Europe is in Venice—the statue of Coleoni in the Piazza San Giovanni. That is supposed to be a finer statue than any other, and it is erected upon an edifice. [An hon. MEMBER: But not upon an arch.] I had not finished the sentence. It is erected upon a construction similar to that upon which the Duke of Wellington's statue was placed, with this exception—that the arch is not pierced. So, also, with regard to the famous tomb of the Scaligers at Verona, upon a model of which the Brunswick Memorial is placed. In that case there is a series of arches, with the equestrian statue upon the top of them.

MR. MUNDELLA here made a remark across the Table, which did not reach the Gallery.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, is a great judge of Education; but I am afraid that his acquaintance with Science and Art is not so high. I saw this statue only the other day, and I know that what I am stating is quite correct. I maintain that the Brunswick statue erected at Geneva—the statue of the Duke of Brunswick upon horseback—is an equestrian statue on the top of the model of the tomb of the Scaligers from Verona. I do not think anybody can contradict that. I will not trouble the House with many further remarks on this subject; but I must say that in bringing the matter forward I am greatly interested upon one point, and I feel sure the House will agree with me if they will give me their attention for a few moments longer. I think it is a very dangerous thing for a country to begin to remove its National monuments. I recollect, during the Commune, seeing the column of the great Napoleon toppled over in the Place Vendôme by the Commune; and only the other day we read in the newspapers that the statues of General Bessières and Prince Murat, of Bonaparte's Army, erected at Cahors, had been removed to make room for a statue of Gambetta. When people begin to remove National monuments there is no knowing how far they will go. Therefore, I protest against anything of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works made a few remarks the other day, and in the course of his observations he made one which it struck me was not very well-founded in fact. He said that it would cost £25,000 to place that statue back again on the top of the Arch. Surely the right hon. Gentleman must have greatly exaggerated the expense. The statue weighs 40 tons with the pedestal, and 20 tons without the pedestal. It is in four parts, and I venture to say it could be put back again for £1,000 or £1,500, and then melted and moulded together on the top of the Arch. [A laugh.] That is how the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do it at Aldershot. Hon. Members laugh; but that is certainly what the First Commissioner of Works proposed the other day—namely, to cart it away in four pieces; and he said that with ease it could be erected at Aldershot. Now, I protest against a site at Aldershot. It was not known to the Duke of Wellington at all. I have heard a quotation which I wish to read in answer to the observations which have been made in regard to the character of this statue—namely, that it is a monstrosity, and that it offends against every principle of propriety and every canon of good taste. Here is a passage from an article which appeared at the time of its erection in The Times newspaper; and it is curious to see how much more this statue was appreciated then than it is now in these æsthetic days of a degenerate Academy. This is an abstract from The Times of 1846, when the statue was being erected—

“The general impression respecting the statue as a work of art was highly favourable, and several old companions in arms of the illustrious hero expressed opinions that it was the best likeness ever made of him.”

Well, I must say that after that we ought to hesitate before we break up this statue of the great Duke of Wellington. I am informed that Mr. Boehm is to have the commission for the new statue, although he is a foreigner. Who is Mr. Boehm? I confess that the name smells foreign, although it has an English ring about it. The name is written in a foreign way, and I do not know that Mr. Boehm is a man who ought to be entrusted with the making of a statue of the Duke of Wellington. I will tell the House the reason. He is at the head of a Franco-German Manufacturing Company. Now, I do not know if the French people were to be told that a National statue of the great Bonaparte were about to be made by an Englishman what the French people would say about it. But in this case the leading modeller in this German artist's studio is a Frenchman; and I do not think an artist of that nationality ought to be entrusted with a statue of the great Duke. ["Oh!"] At all events, we have two statues in London which have been made by this German sculptor—one of Lord Lawrence and another of Lord Beaconsfield. In the statue of Lord Lawrence there is a conspicuous absence of dignity, and a curious position of repose, which renders the whole quite unworthy of the man it is intended to represent; and I am quite certain that anyone who sees the statue of the great Lord Beaconsfield will admit that there is a want of character about it that is not at all in harmony with the subject. I move the rejection of this Vote, because I am opposed to this system of removing statues which have been erected to our great men. I trust that the House will endorse the opinion which I have expressed. In making this Motion I have had no desire to give offence to any person who may have been connected with any of the arrangements of the Committees—either the General Committee or the Executive Committee—or with any of the arrangements with which my right hon. Friend has been concerned. I merely move the Motion on public grounds. I think it would be a pity to see a statue erected to the great Duke removed away from London; and I hope that the House of Commons will give its assent to the suggestion I make—namely, that this Vote should not be allowed, in order that the House of Commons, if it thinks fit, may appoint a Committee to consider the whole matter.

MR. RYLANDS said, he rose to second the Motion; but he must, in the first place, say that he did so on different grounds from those which had been put forward by his right hon. Friend. He took it that in objecting to this Vote the House would by no means pledge itself to the opinion that the statue should be replaced upon the Arch at Hyde Park Corner. His right hon. Friend had put forward arguments in favour of the statue being maintained in the neighbourhood of Apsley House, though not necessarily replaced upon the Arch. It had been suggested to him—and he threw it out as a matter for consideration—that a new pedestal might be designed, and that the statue might be erected upon it, on the mound in the Green Park, under satisfactory conditions, in a position that would meet the requirements of the right hon. Baronet, being in the immediate neighbourhood of the residence of the Duke of Wellington. He wished to point out to the House that by consenting to this Vote of £2,000 they committed themselves to a course which was open to very serious objection. His right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works had declined to request other sculptors to compete for a new statue; but without objecting at all to Mr. Boehm, on the ground that he was a foreigner, he did maintain that if they were to have a new statue the best British artists ought to have an opportunity of competing for such a great National work. His right hon. Friend had said that the best English sculptors had refused to compete for the execution of the statue; but he should like to know who those artists were? Neither Mr. Birch nor Mr. Brock had declined to enter into the competition, and they were British sculptors, who had produced equestrian groups of high merit. He believed that another sculptor of distinction had prepared a model in anticipation of a competition taking place; and therefore, he said, the competition ought to be a general one among the British artists, if they were to have a new statue at all; but, at the same time, it appeared to him that it was a grave question whether there should be a new statue or not. He should vote against this item of £2,000, upon these grounds—first, because he entertained a grave doubt whether the statue of the Duke of Wellington should be removed from the vicinity of Apsley House; secondly, because it appeared to him that if they ought to have a new statue it should be decided upon after competition among the leading British sculptors; and his third ground was, that for a great country like this to refer a decision of this character to an irresponsible Committee was altogether contrary to the way in which the arrangements of the House ought to be conducted. He, therefore, begged to second the proposition of the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel), in the hope that the whole question would be referred to a Committee of the House to determine what course should be taken in regard to it.

Sir Robert Peel

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£91,685," and insert "£89,685,"—(Sir Robert Peel,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That '£91,685' stand part of the said Resolution."

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that, of course, he would not attempt at that hour of the night, or at any other time, to convulse the House with peals of laughter, such as had followed the humorous speech of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel); but he was in a position directly to dispute almost all the assertions which had been made on this subject by the right hon. Baronet. Like his right hon. Friend, he had no particular affection for Royal Academicians, and he had no doubt that they were no more perfect than any other body was perfect. But he was not going, at that time of the night, to ask the House to follow him into the details of the Belt trial, which had wearied the public over and over again for many months together. He was not going to ask the House whether the Royal Academicians were wise men or not; still less was he going to tread on delicate ground as to the position taken up in regard to this matter by an illustrious Personage who was, by circumstances, prevented from entering into Party politics, but who was anxious to show his desire to do good for the country in matters in which Party politics did not appear. His right hon. Friend spoke of the statue upon the Arch having received the sanction of three different Prime Ministers, and, among others, he mentioned that it had received the sanction of his own illustrious Father. Now, had that been the case, according to his (Lord Henry Lennox's) idea of the matter, he should, for one, have dealt very delicately with the subject; but he could not look upon the matter as one to which the late Sir Robert Peel had given his sanction, because he remembered that one of the first debates he ever attended in the House of Commons took place in the year 1846, when he heard Sir Robert Peel speak upon this very subject, and, perhaps, that was his excuse for intruding himself upon the House that night. On that occasion Sir Robert Peel expressed his disapprobation of the site, and altogether disapproved of erecting it on the Arch at Hyde Park Corner, offering to provide a site in any other part of London that might be chosen. Sir Robert Peel offered a pedestal so long as it was not put on the top of the Arch. Not only that, but if any hon. Member had any doubt as to the opinion of Sir Robert Peel in regard to the statute being placed upon that Arch, he would tell the House what was the opinion of a prominent Member of his Government. This was not, as his right hon. Friend asserted, a National monument, but it was a colossal statue, placed upon an arch against the wish of the designer and architect, and all the world besides. If any hon. Member entertained a doubt as to the opinion of the Government of Sir Robert Peel, he would refer them to the words uttered by Lord Canning, a Member of Sir Robert Peel's Government, on this subject. Writing to the Duke of Rutland, in 1846, Lord Canning said the remonstrances which had reached Her Majesty's Government against placing the statue upon the Arch were so strong, so many representations had been made by the architect of the Arch and statue, and the opinions of every other artist and architect and competent authority, who had been consulted, were so decided that Her Majesty's Government felt they were called on to make a final appeal to the Committee to change the site. If that were to be considered as the sanction of the Prime Minister to the scheme, he did not know in what stronger language a disapproval could have been couched.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the House would, perhaps, allow him to say that it was perfectly true Lord Canning did write that letter to the Duke of Rutland; but the Duke of Rutland said that the Committee declined to acquiesce in the representations contained in it, and Sir Robert Peel said that as the Committee declined to acquiesce he was not prepared to interfere in order to change the site proposed.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he thought the right hon. Baronet had interrupted him for no purpose. He had never said that Sir Robert Peel objected to the final decision of the Sovereign and the Committee. All he had said was that Sir Robert Peel disapproved of the statue being placed upon that particular site. Sir Robert Peel allowed one of his own Colleagues to quote the letter of Lord Canning; and he (Lord Henry Lennox) was present when it was quoted. He, therefore, did not consider that the site in question had the sanction and approval of one of the Prime Ministers who had been referred to. But he really did not know what this "storm in a tea-cup" was all about; because, after all that had been said and done, he did not doubt that if the statue had remained on the Arch, and there had not been any necessity for carrying out alterations, and if no pressure had been put upon his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works, it would still have remained in its old position. But the pressure in question had brought the statue of the Duke of Wellington down, and it was admitted on all hands that the statue itself was a perfect monstrosity. [Mr. CAVENTISH BENTINCK: No, no.] When he said that if it had been allowed to remain in its original position it would have been a disgrace to the Metropolis, another of his right hon. Friends, the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), turned round and said "No, no." But he (Lord Henry Lennox) said "Yes, yes;" and he would repeat that there was a great consensus of opinion that the statue where it was originally placed was a monstrosity. In the course of the present debate the right hon. Baronet had asserted that the views of the general public were in favour of the statue. He (Lord Henry Lennox) had a very different opinion, because, in the very debate to which he had listened, and which he had referred to, the House were told that it was quite indecent—that was the word used—to endeavour to force upon the country a site so dead against the feeling and wishes of the public. He was not going to detain the House by any long speech on this occasion, although, after what had fallen from his right hon. Friend, there were several subjects he should have liked to refer to. His right hon. Friend said the removal of the statue of the Duke of Wellington from the Arch might be construed into a desire on the part of the Government to reflect discredit and dishonour upon the most illustrious of all our patriots. He thought that there was one great answer to that assertion—namely, that the man who inherited his name, and almost worshipped his memory, was entirely in favour of the scheme proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works. If there were any possible chance that it could be construed into a slur upon the memory of that great man it could not be supposed that the son of the Duke of Wellington would have given his sanction to the scheme of the Government. More than that, could there be any slur or reproach upon this illustrious man's memory by erecting a new statue in his honour 30 years after his death? We should only have three statues of the Duke of Wellington instead of two. When the statue to which the debate related was placed on the Arch, looking down upon the crowded thoroughfare beneath it, it certainly was a monstrosity compared with the position it would occupy under the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. The new statue of the Duke of Wellington would be in proportion to all around it; whereas the old statue was out of proportion to everything that came near it. There were very few ornamental spaces in the Metropolis; and Her Majesty's Government ought not to lose this opportunity of improving the Park for the sake of a maudlin sentimentality. If there had been any question of the statue being ornamented or broken down, the case would have been different. But the statue was to be preserved, and at least they would have some chance of forming a conception of its beauty and proportions. Under these circumstances, he, for one, should cordially support the Vote of Her Majesty's Government for £2,000 for the statue, and for the appointment of a Committee to lay out the plans.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: When this Vote was last before the Committee there were several alternatives suggested to the proposal of Her Majesty's Government. Almost every Member who spoke had some alternative to suggest, and, as often happened, the many alternatives combined together were nearly able to bring about a defeat of the proposal. On this occasion the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Robert Peel), whose reference to the work of my Department I most gratefully acknowledge, has made a definite proposal, and a very simple one—namely, that the statue should be replaced on the Arch from which it had been removed, and on which it was placed much against the wish of many persons of taste, among whom was the late Prince Consort.

Lord Henry Lennox

Now, I venture to think that that is a course which even if the House should reject the Vote now before it it would not adopt. I will freely and frankly admit that if the statue had remained on the Arch, and things had been unchanged, I should not have thought it worth while to make any proposal in the matter. After all, time consecrates many blunders; and I do not think I should have been justified in sweeping away the statue simply because certain defects in it had been pointed out and condemned. But the case now before us is different, because, in consequence of the improvements which we have been carrying out, and which I believe are generally recognized to be very good, the statue has had to come down in the natural course of events; and there has, consequently, been a new departure. It, therefore, appears to me that it would be almost madness to adopt the course proposed by the right hon. Baronet. Now, I am at issue with the right hon. Baronet with regard to a good deal of the historical matter to which he adverts. It is true that in 1838 Lord Melbourne obtained the consent of the Queen to the statue being placed upon the Arch; but in 1846, when it was about to be placed there, a good deal of feeling was aroused, and a debate upon the subject took place in that House, and Sir Robert Peel, who was appealed to to prevent its being so passed, said he was "personally opposed to its being placed on the Arch;" and by way of alternative he offered there and then to take a Vote for providing a pedestal for it. Well, Sir, when the Committee refused that offer, Sir Robert Peel said that as Lord Melbourne had obtained the consent of the Queen to the site, he would not alter it. In the following year the statue was placed on the Arch, and no sooner was it done than there arose a chorus of condemnation with regard to it. There was a debate in that House, and the feeling there expressed was unanimous against it. The Government, represented by Lord Morpeth, Chief Commissioner of Works, announced that it was intended that the statue should be brought down. Amongst the first persons who objected to the statue remaining on the Arch was the Prince Consort, and by his advice the Queen ordered its removal. This was stated in this House by Lord Morpeth, who added that it was actually in course of being removed. The Duke of Wellington was then communicated with, and he told the Prince Consort that although he had never wished the statue to be placed on the Arch, yet, as it had been placed there, it was desirable that it should remain. The House of Commons, the Government, indeed, everybody, wanted the statue to come down; and I need hardly remind the House that for months afterwards it was the subject of numerous caricatures; it was said in France that Waterloo was at last avenged; and Mr. Decimus Burton was so seriously annoyed with the statue being placed on the Arch that I believe he was for many years prepared to give £2,000 to anyone who would cause it to be removed. The statue, nevertheless, remained on the Arch. But chance at last has offered an opportunity of bringing it down from its eminence; it has been taken down, and the question is as to whether it shall be replaced? I do not think the House will agree to its replacement; and, for my part, I respectfully decline to present a Vote to Parliament for that purpose. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the proposal of the Prince of Wales. I should be sorry if the Committee, or anyone else, thought for one moment that I have endeavoured to shelter myself behind the name of His Royal Highness. So far from that being the case, I have stated, over and over again, that I am responsible in this matter; and if I have named His Royal Highness it has been for the purpose of praising the public spirit with which he has come forward in this matter. Now, it appears to me that the proposal which His Royal Highness offers is, on the whole, the best solution of this question. But another alternative has been suggested, of placing the statue on a pedestal and allowing it to remain where it is, with regard to which I will say that the difficulty in the way of that course being taken is, that the statue is of such colossal size that it would completely over-top every other object in the space adjacent; and, therefore, I repeat that, in my opinion, the proposal of the Prince of Wales offers the best and most reasonable solution of the difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the appointment of Mr. Boehm. That gentleman has resided in this country for 30 years; he is a sculptor of eminence; he is naturalized here, and is a member of the Royal Academy; and therefore I think that, to all intents and purposes, he may be called an Englishman. It is not the first time in the history of Art in this country that an English sculptor of eminence has had a foreign name. Again, Mr. Boehm, I believe, is almost the only sculptor of the day who has executed equestrian works, one of which—the statue of the Duke of Westminster—I think is amongst the finest of its kind in the country. After all, equestrian statues are rare; and, therefore, it seems to me wise to commit a task of that kind to a sculptor who is renowned for his works in that branch of Art. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) has adverted to the question of competition; and with reference to that, I must again repeat that the original intention of having competition in this matter was abandoned for two reasons. In the first place, because I ascertained that three leading sculptors of the day refused to compete—I am not at liberty to mention their names, but it is a fact those gentlemen informed me they would not take part in a competition. But the second reason is that, the present Duke of Wellington is utterly opposed to the course, his own opinion being that it is impossible to get a good work of Art by competition, and he has said that, with such a condition, he would not have consented to take any part in the work. I say, then, it was desirable to get the cordial assent of the present Duke of Wellington to all the proceedings; and I am happy to state that all that is proposed to be done has met with his hearty approval. A letter which I received yesterday from the Duke contains these words with reference to that purpose—"I feel that full respect is paid to the memory of my Father." And I may add that this is one of a series of letters which I have received from his Grace on this subject. Under these circumstances, I venture to hope that the House will assent to the Vote, otherwise they must abandon all hope of decorating the place; and I trust, also, that this proposal will be accepted by the House as affording the best compromise of a very difficult and delicate question.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the Government were asking for £2,000 as the first instalment of the sum of £6,000 for the decoration of the West End of London at the expense of the taxpayers of the Kingdom; and upon that point, totally irrespective of the question as to whether the statue should be put up again or be placed on another site, he should, if no one else did, take the sense of the House. He was sure no one in the country wanted to detract from the honour which the nation paid to the Duke of Wellington, or forget its obligations to him; but he thought that the State had amply repaid that obligation. The statue of the Duke had been spoken of as a National monument; but the description was incorrect, because it was a monument raised by private subscription. The National monument was erected in St. Paul's Cathedral, at the Duke's death; and the nation likewise perpetuated his memory by that admirable Institution which bore his name. Rightly or wrongly, the Chief Commissioner of Works had seen fit to remove this monument; and the House was now asked to vote out of the Public Exchequer a large sum of money in connection with the site. His right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works used a word which really disclosed the whole matter. He said the money was wanted for the "decoration of this place"—namely, the wealthiest part of the wealthiest City of the world. If hon. Members went throughout the length and breadth of London, they would not find any place where property, freehold and leasehold, was of more value than in that part of the Metropolis. Notwithstanding that, and within a week of the presentation of the Budget, in which it was stated that the condition of their finance was such that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was compelled to recede from the pledges given to the people at large with respect to cheap telegrams, the House was asked for a Vote at the expense of the whole community for the decoration of London. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in one of his Mid Lothian speeches, alluded to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, he regretted to observe, had, together with the other Members of the late Government, left the House, in connection with a Vote of £2,000. The right hon. Gentleman said—"The Chancellor of the Exchequer who will not save £2,000 is not worth his salt." Now, here was a Vote for precisely that amount, as an instalment of £6,000, which the House might rest assured would not be the whole of the money required. The public would be again called upon in order to make up the deficiency. Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow, and other large cities and towns in the Kingdom, had their decorations and their statues of great men; but they never asked Parliament for any public money for the purpose. As a Representative of the taxpayers of the Kingdom outside London, he protested against their being taxed for the decoration of the Metropolis; and he trusted that all Liberal Members in the House would sympathize with him in his endeavour to put a stop to the mendicancy which London was never tired of resorting to for the purpose of getting itself decorated and maintained at the expense of the rest of the community.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he should not have addressed himself to this subject but for the observations of his hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler). The charm of Art lay in its being eclectic. He had, when this Vote was last before the House, shown his eclecticism by voting against the Motion of the Chief Commissioner of Works. He should on this occasion, however, support the Resolution, because he was always open to conviction, and because he thought common sense was better than consistency. Let the House get out of their heads the names of all those grand people who had been referred to in the course of the discussion, and make use of their own judgment. They had been told to look to the Royal Academicians, and to William IV., as great arbiters of taste; but he never troubled himself about either the one or the other; in the present case he looked simply at the facts as they stood before the House. They had this place in the central part of London. That was one fact; and another was that on that place there stood this monstrous horse, than which there had been no greater curse to any city since the horse of Troy. What was to be done with it? "Melt it," said some hon. Gentlemen; but would there be a majority in favour of that? ["No, no!"] For his own part, he would like to surround it with trees, paint it green, and try to forget it. But the fact remained; there was the horse, and the country must deal with it. The alternatives were to remove it; to put it upon a pedestal, and to replace it on the Arch. They were not in favour of putting it in the place again; they were not in favour of spending a large amount of money on it; nor were they going to leave it where it was. He thought the Chief Commissioner of Works had made a very reasonable bargain. He had no prejudice in this matter, which was simply a question of figures, and at those figures he desired to look. The Chief Commissioner of Works said that £15,000 or £20,000 would be subscribed by the public for the decoration of the place. ["No!"] Well, say £10,000. Therefore, in consideration of the expenditure of £10,000 on this central part of London, which, might, indeed, be regarded as the central place of the British Empire, the right hon. Gentleman asked the House to give £6,000 of public money. The House might be certain the place would not be allowed to remain as it was; it would have to be decorated; and, that being so, it seemed to him that the Chief Commissioner had made a reasonable and good bargain for them. The only reason against it which operated with him was that given by his hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler)—namely, that London ought to defray the whole cost of decorating the place. As Londoners, they had been perfectly free to wander about there, and look at the Duke of Wellington on his Arch; but it must be remembered that they had never been consulted about the alterations at Hyde Park Corner. They were the work of the Chief Commissioner of Works, who was responsible for them to the House of Commons; and, that being so, he hoped they would not "Spoil the ship for a ha'p'orth of tar."

Mr. W. LOWTHER said, he was very unwilling to trespass upon the time of the House; but he wished just to say a couple of words. He was aware that sentiment was more difficult to combat than many other things; but there were a great many facts in connection with this matter which they not to forget. They should remember that this equestrian statue was erected in honour of that very great man, the Duke of Wellington; and then they must bear in mind that it was put up in front of his Grace's house—a most unusual honour to pay to a man during his lifetime. They must not forget that the Duke of Wellington—one of the greatest men that England had ever seen—had looked upon this statue, and had approved of it and of its position. They were grateful—not only they, but the whole of England, nay, the whole of Europe, were grateful—to the Duke of Wellington for what he had done for them. The whole world was thankful. ["Divide!"] One moment more, and he had done. He very seldom, indeed, troubled them with any observations; and he did not think anyone had any right to complain of his obstructing the course of Business. He wished merely to say that though he did not advocate the replacing of the statue on the Arch, he still thought that the Memorial, whatever form it took, should be erected in front of Apsley House. In removing it from that position they would be laying themselves open to the accusation of wishing to shake off the hand of the dead man altogether.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, that, having been a Member of the Committee on this question, he felt bound to say a word or two. The Committee had given the greatest possible attention to the consideration of the matter. All proposals were examined with care and fairness, and everything was done by the First Commissioner of Works to enable them to come to a right conclusion. The present proposal had been looked into both by the Committee and a Sub-Committee. He was not going to say how many were in favour of the plan, and how many were against it; but this he might state—that it had the approval of a large majority. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had referred to London as mendicant; but he (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) could inform the hon. Gentleman that for this improvement at Hyde Park Corner, London had put her hand into her pocket to the extent of £20,000. Did she, then, deserve the phrase "mendicant?" Had she not paid her full, and more than her full, share for the improvement? To his mind, the improvement was an excellent one, and the sum the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works asked the House to give was a very mild and moderate amount.

Mr. W. Lowther

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he wished to move the reduction of Vote 3, in Class I., of the Civil Service Estimates by £6,525, on account of Kensington Gardens. He did not wish to discuss the matter at any length; but the point to which he desired to draw attention was this—namely, the increased mortality amongst the trees in Kensington Gardens. A few years ago these trees were in a most flourishing condition, and in the hottest days in the year extended a grateful shade to all; but all that had passed away now. Year by year the trees were dying, and it seemed very probable that before long there would be few left. It could not be said that the atmosphere of London killed them, for in the very heart of the Metropolis, in the squares and small open spaces, there were many very healthy trees. What, then, was the cause of the great mortality in Kensington Gardens? He had put Questions to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works on this subject on previous occasions, and had got he did not know what sort of answers, but, certainly, not a satisfactory one. He passed through Kensington Gardens almost every day, but failed to notice that the First Commissioner of Works was making any efforts, or even experiments, with a view to putting a stop to the increased mortality. He failed to observe that anything at all was being done to save the trees. He felt assured that if these trees were on a private estate, their owner would not sit still, with his arms folded, whilst they died and fell. He would call in the services of the tree doctor; he would appeal to men of science; dig about the roots, make experiments, and take every means to discover, if possible, what was the matter with the trees. He expressed a very earnest hope that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had taken this subject to heart, and did not mean to stand by and do nothing; but that he would do something towards discovering a remedy for the condition of things which existed. For his own part, he had had considerable experience of trees. He did not profess to be a tree doctor, but he knew something about them; and he had formed a theory of his own with regard to what it was that ailed them, and he believed—and this theory was supported by very good authority—that it arose through spreading over the roots of the trees the clay from the great number of new houses that had been built in the neighbourhood. His opinion was that the mortality among the trees was caused in that way. Covering the roots and shutting out the air often had this effect; and he noticed particularly that the few trees still flourishing were those not so treated. He, therefore, hoped that the great Officer of the Government who was in charge of this matter would see if he could not do something to discover the source of the evil, and, if possible, to try and remove it.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was afraid that he must admit that these trees were in a very deplorable state; and he was afraid it must also be admitted that a very great portion of them would at an early date be destroyed. He did not know of any remedy for the existing state of things. The trees would, no doubt, in the course of time, die, and it was impossible to arrest their decay; but so long as any of them showed symptoms of life he should be unwilling to remove them. He did not like to make a clean sweep of these trees. He believed that the cause of the calamity was that the trees had reached a sub-soil of some bad character; but he did not believe that it was due to the cause mentioned by the hon. Gentleman—namely, a certain multiplication of the drains through house building. No doubt, the result was a very unfortunate state of things.

Resolution agreed to.

COINAGE AND BANKING ACTS. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. COURTNEY, in moving—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to consider the Weights and Measures Acts,” said, he must explain that the Committee was to be set up to amend the Banking and Coinage Acts; but it was found, as a matter of fact, that they would also require to amend the Weights and Measures Acts in some respects, as those Acts spoke of the dimensions of the existing coin. Therefore, as it was proposed to alter the weight of the half-sovereign, it was necessary to amend these Acts.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to consider the Weights and Measures Acts.”—
(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) presumed that this Resolution was in connection with the Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer dealing with half-sovereigns, and that a full opportunity would be given for discussing it on some future occasion. He supposed this was merely a formal Resolution, which did not commit the House in any way.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS) said, it was only a formal Resolution, and certainly would not commit them in any way. Without it the Bill for dealing with the coinage could not be introduced. He would take care that ample opportunity was afforded for full discussion.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman state the terms of the Resolution which is to be moved in Committee?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): The terms are—

“That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to Coinage, Banking, and Weights and Measures.”

It is merely formal.

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

MR. COURTNEY moved—

“That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to Coinage, Banking, and Weights and Measures.”

Motion agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

NATIONAL DEBT ACT, 1870, &c.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the creation of Stocks of Perpetual Annuities bearing interest at the rate of Two Pounds Fifteen Shillings per centum per annum, and of Stocks of Perpetual Annuities bearing interest at the rate of Two Pounds Ten Shillings per centum per annum, and to authorise also the conversion into such Stocks of Stocks of Perpetual Annuities bearing interest at the rate of Three Pounds per centum per annum.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to make provision for the payment quarterly of the dividends of the said Stocks.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient that the said Stocks be issued on such terms as may be determined hereafter, and that provision be made by the creation of Terminable Annuities for the redemption of any increase of Capital of the National Debt caused by the said conversion.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend "The National Debt Act, 1870," and "The Sinking Fund Act, 1875."

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

MOTION.

SHOP HOURS REGULATION (LIVERPOOL) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WHITLEY, Bill to regulate the Hours of Labour in Shops and Warehouses in the city of Liverpool and the vicinity thereof, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WHITLEY, Lord CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON, and Mr. SAMUEL SMITH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 185.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 2nd May, 1884.

MINUTES.]—Took the Oath for the First Time
—The Lord Bishop of Liverpool.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Electric Lighting Provisional Order * (76); Public Health (Confirmation of Bye-Laws) * (76).

Second Reading—Marriages Legalization (Wood Green Congregational Church) (66).

Third Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Provisional Order * (61), and passed.

MARRIAGES LEGALIZATION (WOOD GREEN CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH)

BILL.—(No. 66.)

(The Lord Carrington.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARRINGTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was to make legal marriages which had taken place in this church through inadvertence, it not having been properly licensed.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Carrington.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he must repeat what he had said on other occasions when Bills of this kind had been introduced into their Lordships' House—namely, that in his view it was a scandal to the law that such Bills should from time to time be necessary in order to legalize marriages in places which had not been registered. He had been in communication with the President of that branch of the High Court of Justice which had matrimonial causes under its jurisdiction, and it was his intention shortly to introduce a Bill for the purpose of dealing generally with cases of this kind, and with others in which doubts might exist as to the validity of marriages, on merely formal grounds.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

PUBLIC HEALTH (CONFIRMATION OF BYE LAWS) BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to amend the Public Health Act, 1875, so far as relates to the confirmation of Byelaws—Was presented by The Lord CARRINGTON; read 1^a. (No. 76.)

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock,

NOTICE.

EGYPT (AFFAIRS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON'S MISSION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I beg to give Notice that I propose to make the following Motion:—

"That this House regrets to find that the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government has not tended to promote the success of General Gordon's Mission, and that even such steps as may be necessary to secure his personal safety are still delayed."

I shall on Monday ask the Prime Minister what facilities he can offer for bringing on that Motion.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE—SENTENCES ON CHILDREN—REFORMATORIES.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to the following case, as reported in The Edinburgh Daily Review :—

"On Friday April 26th, at Perth Sheriff Court, a boy ten years of age, who pleaded guilty to stealing one shilling from a lockfast drawer in the Railway goods office at Aberfeldy, was sentenced to ten days' imprisonment, and thereafter to be detained in a reformatory for five years. When sentence was passed the boy burst into tears, clung to his mother, and refused to be separated from her. It was only after the lapse of some time, and the use of force by the police officers, that the boy was separated from his mother and lodged in prison ;"

if he can say what is the total cost to the public of the maintenance of a child for five years in a reformatory; and, whether the Home Office still discourages the practice of convicting and imprisoning, as criminals, children of tender years?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have inquired into this case, and have received a report on the question. The boy seems to have been a bad boy, in the habit of thieving. This is not his first offence. He is one of five children, and his mother admitted that it was a good thing for the child to be sent to a reformatory. Therefore, there is no fault to be found in that case. But I take this opportunity of saying that I do think there are a great many cases of children sent to a reformatory for a long period for which there is no justification. It has not been sufficiently considered that it is a very serious thing to take away a child for five years from its parents, and when there has not been a sufficient inquiry made into the character of the home. Two cases have come before me recently, in one of which after the sentence had expired and the child had been taken away from its parents—and the home was not a bad one—the child was sent away for years without the knowledge of its parents, and he was sent on board a North Sea fishing smack. In the other case the child, who was a girl, was emigrated without the knowledge and against the wish of her parents. This seems to me to be a monstrous abuse. I need not say that I at once took steps to have the children restored to their parents. But I think that very much more care ought to be taken than is taken, and it ought not to be considered right in every case to send a child to a reformatory. My hon. Friend asked whether attention is still paid in the Home Office to juvenile offences. Yes, Sir. No case of the kind fails to come under my personal notice, and inquiries are made. I am happy to say it is very rare now that I can find a case in which, upon inquiry, there was no sufficient justification for the sentence. The magistrates have acted with me most cordially with the view of diminishing, as far as possible, the number of children in prison, and the number of children has largely diminished. In all England last week there were only four cases, and I think, therefore, that on the whole the matter may be considered to be in a satisfactory condition. A great deal has been done without legislation. But there is one thing also which I ask leave to mention. That is the habit of inflicting heavy costs in these cases of small crimes. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross), in his Summary Jurisdiction Act, made a most admirable rule that the costs were not to be inflicted except in special circumstances. But the magistrates' clerks always press to have these costs inflicted. This is a very great evil, because the parents are often unable to pay and the children cannot be sent to school.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman issued any Circular to the Judiciary clerks pointing out the provisions of the Act so far as costs are concerned?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I shall be very happy to do that. I have written over and over again on this subject. It is an immense grievance, and contrary to the intention of the Statute. It often happens that when a fine of 1s. is imposed, the costs amount to 20s. or 30s., and the man goes to prison in consequence of the costs. I would make an appeal to those who administer the Education Act. The way in which children for mere truancy, which ought not to be treated as a crime, are sent for years to a reformatory school and taken away from their home, even when the home is not a bad one, seems to be an extremely wrong one, and I hope the practice will not be repeated.

MR. ONSLOW: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman issue a Circular to that effect?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I think it better not to do so. I would rather leave it to the discretion of the magistrates.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, RATHDRUM UNION.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that, at the recent election of Poor Law Guardians for the Rathdrum Union, county Wicklow, voting papers were not in some cases distributed to persons entitled to vote whose political opinions were known to be on the popular side; whether it is true that voting papers were not supplied to two voters named Kane and Toner in the Newcastle Electoral Division of the Union; whether, when they went to the workhouse, a distance of fourteen miles, and applied for them, they were refused by the returning officer on the ground that the application was too late; whether such refusal was in accordance with the law; whether the returning officer, Mr. Bernard Manning, is the person who acted as returning officer in the election of a guardian for the Killiskey Electoral Division of same Union in 1882, when it was found on a scrutiny, that forty-seven votes were received by him in the Conservative interest in excess of the lawful number; and, whether, if it should appear that the returning officer has not properly discharged his duty on the present occasion, he will, as President of the Local Government Board in Ireland, take any and what steps to secure the holding of elections for Poor Law Guardians in Rathdrum Union in an impartial manner?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that the only cases in which voting papers were not distributed were those of the two voters, Kane and Toner, named in the second paragraph of the Question, who are voters for the Kilcool Electoral Division. There was no failure to distribute papers in other parts of the Union. In the case of Messrs. Kane and Toner, the Returning Officer admits that they were accidentally omitted in the preparation of the lists. Due public notice was given of the days upon which any person who did not receive his paper should apply; but these two voters did not apply within the prescribed time, and the Returning Officer could not legally entertain their claims. Their votes could not have affected the election, as there was a considerable majority for the candidates returned. The Returning Officer is the same person who acted as Returning Officer for the same Union in 1882. I have already informed the hon. Member that after the sworn inquiry held in that case the Local Government Board considered that the errors he then made were the result of misinterpretation of the law, and that he had no intention to do anything wrong. There was no question of political partiality; for in another Electoral Division he allowed a larger number of excess votes to the Liberal candidates. In this case nothing has occurred to show that the election was not held in an impartial manner, and the Returning Officer emphatically denies being influenced by any political considerations.

INDIA—THE KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether high legal opinions have declared that the sum of £276,000, and other funds realised from securities and jewels of the enemy, and retained by the Indian Government, are distributable as proceeds of the capture of Kirwee and its Chiefs; whether any judicial decision or dictum in any Law Court has overruled those opinions; whether the Treasury Board, when it decided, in May 1869, that these moneys were not booty within the meaning of a certain Indian Proclamation, was aided by legal assessors, or founded its decision on any judicial precedent; and, whether the Treasury Board retains any jurisdiction in matters of prize booty since the passing of Lord Collenham's Act, 3 and 4 Vic. c. 66, s. 22, which was framed to abolish this jurisdiction?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to the last Question of my hon. and gallant Friend opposite, I may say that the section of Lord Cottenham's Act to which he refers only empowers the Court of Admiralty to decide questions relating to booty of war when they are referred by Her Majesty in Council to its judgment, and without in any respect taking away from the Board of Treasury the power of returning such answer as it may deem fit to Petitions addressed to it. The Board of Treasury, therefore, was acting within its powers in hearing and adjudicating upon the claims of the captors of Kirwee as against the Secretary of State for India in Council in May, 1869. I may mention that these claims had no reference to funds realized from "jewels," the proceeds of which, and of similar property, were distributed as prize. The captors, on their part, dissatisfied with the decision of the Treasury, brought an action in the Court of Chancery against the Secretary of State for India, who demurred to their Petition on the ground that it rested with him, as trustee for Her Majesty, to declare what property taken in war should be treated as booty and distributed, as a matter of grace and favour, among the captors. Vice Chancellor Hall overruled the demurrer; but his ruling was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords, on the 19th of May, 1882, upheld the decision of the Court of Appeal. It is not usual to state publicly how far the Treasury is guided by legal opinion in making its decisions; but I may say that it was not without consultation with the most eminent legal authorities, and the fullest examination of precedents, that the Board arrived at its decision in 1869.

STATE OF IRELAND — MEETINGS OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE—INTRUSION OF THE POLICE AT DAVIDSTOWN.

Mr. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Sergeant M'Hugh persists in attending the meetings of the Davidstown (county Wexford) National League, although the meetings of other neighbouring branches are not so attended; whether said M'Hugh has any orders to do this; and, whether he is ordered to watch any particular member of the Davidstown branch?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Sergeant M'Hugh has no special instructions to attend the Davidstown meetings; and I am again informed that his presence has not been objected to by the members of that branch. He is not ordered to watch any particular members of it. New instructions on the general subject of the police attending indoor meetings have now been issued, which will meet cases such as this.

Mr. SEXTON: Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to state briefly the effect of these instructions?

Mr. TREVELYAN: The instructions are that in every special case an order must be given by the divisional magistrate, which must be in writing, and the police will have this order with them. In cases where the district is not within the jurisdiction of the divisional magistrate the order will be given by the Inspector General of Constabulary.

Mr. SEXTON asked whether every policeman whose presence was objected to at these meetings would be required to produce this order?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Yes, Sir.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—THE CONSTABULARY AT TULLAMORE.

Colonel KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that the County Inspector, District Inspector, head constable, acting constable, and all the men, except two, of the Royal Constabulary stationed at Tullamore are not Roman Catholics; and, whether any Protestant has ever made any complaint as to the preponderance of Roman Catholics, being good and loyal men, in any Constabulary district or station?

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: May I ask if there is not a vast majority of Catholics in Tullamore?

Mr. TREVELYAN: There is certainly a very large majority of Catholics in Tullamore. The Inspector General informs me that the County Inspector and District Inspector at Tullamore are Protestants, and the head constable is a Roman Catholic. Of the other members of the Force at Tullamore seven are Protestants and 17 Roman Catholics. Complaints of the nature referred to in the second paragraph of the Question are very rare.

POST OFFICE—TRANSFERRED TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

Sir HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will consider the propriety of extending to those telegraph clerks whose services were transferred from the Companies to the Department, and who (having not less than twenty-five years' service) have not received promotion consequent on the last revision, the same benefits conferred upon those whose appointments were abolished at the transfer—namely, retirement upon a pension of two-thirds of their present salary; and, if not, whether he is prepared to consider any means by which their position may be improved?

MR. FAWCETT: The telegraphists to whom the hon. Baronet refers would come under the provision of the Superannuation Act of 1859; and this Act, except on the score of ill-health, would not admit of their retirement on pensions of two-thirds of their salary or any other amount unless their appointments were about to be abolished, which, I need hardly say, is not the case. These telegraphists, in common with others, have lately had their positions and prospects very considerably improved, at a large additional charge to the Revenue; and, under these circumstances, I do not think I should be justified in holding out any hope that the question can be re-opened.

POST OFFICE—NORTHERN DISTRICT TELEPHONE COMPANY.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Postmaster General, If he could state to the House, the number of exchange and private telephone wires respectively there are in use by the Northern Telephone Company, worked and maintained by the Company at its own expense, at Newcastle on Tyne, according to the latest Return furnished by the Department; the amount of the royalties paid to the Department per annum therefrom respectively; the number of telephone wires similarly in use respectively by the Post Office at the same date; the cost of the same; the revenue therefrom; the royalties which the Post Office would receive therefrom, without cost to the Department, assuming them to have been erected and maintained by a private company, and to be charged the same rate for royalty as now charged by the Department to the Company in Newcastle on Tyne?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to my hon. Friend, I may state that on the 31st of March last the Northern District Telephone Company had 54 subscribers to their telephone exchange in Newcastle-on-Tyne, and £54 was returned by the Company as payable to the Post Office on account of royalties. At the same date the Post Office had 362 subscribers, who paid rentals amounting to £7,750 per annum. Assuming that there was the same number of subscribers, and that the same rentals were paid to a private Company, the royalty would be £775. The profit obtained by the Post Office is certainly larger than this amount. No return is rendered by the Northern District Telephone Company of private wires; and I am, therefore, unable to contrast the figures relating to such wires with those of the Post Office.

MR. GRAY: What is the cost to the Department of the erection and maintenance of the wires, and the profits above that?

MR. FAWCETT: I cannot say. I am sure the profit to the Post Office is greater than that of erection and maintenance.

INLAND REVENUE—ASSISTANT SURVEYORSHIPS—EXAMINATION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the examination fixed for the 6th May 1884 for Assistant Surveyorships of Taxes, comprising five subjects, is closed against the Lower Division Clerks in the Tax Survey Branch of the Inland Revenue who have passed in ten subjects (including bookkeeping, one of the five in the Assistant Surveyorship Examination), and is open exclusively to Second Class Excise Assistants who have passed in only six subjects, all of which are included in the ten passed by the Lower Division Clerks; and, what objection is there to the reduction from ten to (say) six years of the time which Lower Division Clerks in the Tax Survey Branch of the Inland Revenue are required to serve before they are eligible for promotion to Assistant Surveyorships, seeing that, since 1881, the Higher Division Examination for Assistant Surveyorships has been abolished, and the standard of examination reduced in the proportion of thirteen subjects to five subjects, one of which the Lower Division Clerks have already passed?

MR. COURTNEY: The examination for Assistant Surveyorships of Taxes, fixed for next week, follows the special regulations drawn up less than three years ago. These regulations were carefully considered, and it does not appear desirable to re-open them without a larger experience of their working.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO TREATY.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have any confirmation of the news brought by the mail steamer Senegal, which arrived in the Mersey on the 28th April—namely, that the proposal to hand territory on the Congo over to the Portuguese was becoming known among the Natives; that at Kinsembo and Ambrizette the feeling was very strong, and would probably result in forcible opposition to any attempt to carry the Treaty into force; and that at other parts of the coast, where the Natives are of a quieter spirit, they stated their intention to leave their homes, rather than submit to Portuguese rule; and, whether the Government have any information on the subject of M. de Brazza's proceedings on the Congo?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government have received no information on either of the points referred to in the Question.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: Have Her Majesty's Government ever taken any steps to obtain such information?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; there is no call for inquiry on the part of the Government. No doubt, the information that has arrived will reach the Foreign Office; and as regards M. de Brazza, there is no ground for making special inquiry.

INDIA (MADRAS)—CAPTAIN E. A. CAMPBELL.

MR. R. POWER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he would lay upon the Table the whole of the Correspondence of Captain E. A. Campbell with the Government of Madras, Revenue Department, dated March and April 1882, and February 1883, complaining of certain official irregularities; also the whole of the Correspondence on the same subject by Captain Campbell with the Viceroy of India in July, August, and September 1883, and with the Secretary of State for India, dated July and August 1882, February, July, August, September, November, and December 1883?

MR. J. K. CROSS: On the 8th of June, 1882, the Government of Madras informed the Secretary of State that Captain Campbell had entirely failed to substantiate the charges which he had made. In this opinion the Secretary of State, after full consideration of the Papers, entirely concurred, and informed Captain Campbell that he declined to receive any further communication from him on the subject, except through the Government of Madras. Under these circumstances, I must decline to lay upon the Table the Correspondence in question.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND)—THE RATE COLLECTOR OF THE BLACKROCK TOWNSHIP COMMISSION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will lay upon the Table Copy of the Report or Reports of the Local Government Board Auditor on the accounts of the Commissioners of Blackrock Township, dealing with the defalcations of their rate collector, Mr. J. D. Elliott? The hon. Member further asked whether the Local Government Board had yet resolved upon any course with regard to the future of Mr. Elliott?

MR. TREVELYAN: I learn from the Local Government Board that there are no Reports from their Auditor dealing with defalcations of Mr. Elliott; but that in the last Report of the Auditor, dated 25th February, attention was directed to the large amount of rates which appeared to be uncollected; and there is no objection to lay this Report on the Table if desired. With regard to the latter aspect of the Question, I have not yet heard of the state of the inquiry which was to have been instituted by the Blackrock Town Commissioners, or whether it resulted in any decision. I will not, however, lose sight of the matter.

MR. GRAY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that, besides being an officer of the Blackrock Town Commissioners, this Mr. Elliott was also an officer of the Local Government Board, of which the right hon. Gentleman was President?

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Government were in full possession of the facts, and the point raised by the hon. Member had not escaped his notice.

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS—
CAPTAIN HON. O. F. CROFTON.

MR. DAWSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that Captain the Hon. O. F. Crofton has been nominated for a place on the Irish Lights Board; whether Captain Crofton holds the position of Harbour Master of Kingstown under the Board of Works; and, whether, being a Government Officer, he is eligible to be a Commissioner of Irish Lights?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I was not aware of the nomination referred to, as the Commissioners are not required to inform, and never do inform, the Board of Trade of the nomination or election of members of their body; and I do not know the position of the gentleman named in the Question; but, so far as I am aware, there is nothing in the fact of Captain Crofton holding a Government appointment to make him ineligible as a Commissioner of Irish Lights.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—THE CONSTABULARY AT ARMAGH.

MR. LEAHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in addition to six promotions made by Mr. Garrett, County Inspector of Armagh, to the ranks of sergeant and acting-sergeant, whereof five were of Protestants and only one of a Catholic, as already stated in an answer of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, although the Catholics formed 59 per cent of the county force, the same inspector has since made six further promotions to the same ranks in the same county, whereof all were of Protestants, making altogether eleven promotions of Protestants and one of a Catholic, whilst Mr. Garrett had charge of the County Armagh Constabulary; whether Mr. Garrett was accustomed to place a number of Catholics at the bottom of his promotion list, so that if questioned on their exclusion from promotion, he could point to their occupying a low place on his list, whilst the upper places were all occupied by Protestants; and, whether he will inquire into these complaints?

MR. TREVELYAN: I find that there have been in the County of Armagh since the date of the former Question to which the hon. Member refers three promotions from the rank of acting-sergeant to that of sergeant. Promotions in this grade are, by the regulations of the Constabulary Force, made according to seniority, if the men are qualified. The three senior men were Protestants. As they were qualified, they were promoted. There have also been three constables promoted to be acting sergeants. These men also were Protestants. Two of them were the senior men of the rank, recommended by the District Inspectors. There was, therefore, only one promotion made out of the strict line of seniority. Mr. Garrett is not now County Inspector of Armagh, and the Notice given of this Question did not allow time for communication with him; but the Inspector General states that no doubt he considered the constable, who had upwards of 11 years' service, specially qualified for promotion. The Inspector General states that an inspection of Mr. Garrett's promotion lists shows that it is not the case that he was accustomed to place Roman Catholics in low places.

MALTA—MILITARY AND CIVIL GO-VERNMENT—THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he can state what portion of the civil duties of the Governor of Malta will in future be performed by the Lieut.-Governor; or what are to be the new powers and responsibilities in consideration of which the title of Colonial Secretary is to be altered to that of Lieut.-Governor, and the salary of the office largely increased?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The Governor is in future only to receive £3,000 a-year, instead of £5,000, from the Revenues of Malta. Out of the saving of £2,000 a-year an addition is to be made to the salary of the Chief Secretary, who will be also called Lieutenant Governor, and his status thereby raised. The Governor will continue to be the head of the Administration; but it has been thought expedient that the chief permanent civil officer under the Governor should occupy a position of higher influence and consideration than hitherto, with greater authority in matters of administrative detail. It is proposed that on ordinary occasions he should preside instead of the Governor in the Council of Government, which is the Legislative Body. The matter has been considered with the new Governor, and has his concurrence, and its announcement has been very favourably received in the Island.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH : If the Lieutenant Governor is hereafter to preside in the Council, who is to be responsible for the introduction and defence of Government measures ?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he did not know. The right hon. Gentleman should give Notice of the Question.

GENERAL GORDON.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government are in possession of any despatches or telegrams from General Gordon to the Government at home, or to Sir E. Baring, other than those already laid before Parliament; if so, why they are not included in the Papers now laid upon the Table, and whether they will be at once presented; if not, whether they will at once procure from Sir E. Baring any such despatches or telegrams as may have been sent by General Gordon to Sir E. Baring, and lay them upon the Table without delay?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government will lay upon the Table of the House the full text of General Gordon's Despatch to Sir Evelyn Baring, dated April 8th, and referred to in Sir Evelyn Baring's Despatch of April 18th (No. 24, p. 12), in which he says, "Gordon evidently thinks he is to be abandoned and is very indignant;" and, the full text of General Gordon's telegram to Sir Samuel Baker referred to in No. 25 ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : There are no despatches and telegrams from General Gordon to the Government at home, except those announcing his arrival in Egypt. All his despatches and telegrams to Sir Evelyn Baring are laid on the Table, with the following exception:—(1) Those which had been transmitted by Sir Evelyn Baring since March 25. These will be laid before Parliament in due course. As special interest attaches to the telegram referred to in Sir Evelyn Baring's telegram of April 18, mentioned in the Question asked by the hon. Member for Eye (Mr.

Ashmead-Bartlett), that telegram has been laid to-day, together with the telegram of April 18, from Sir Evelyn Baring, which has been accidentally omitted. The other exceptions are (2) some telegrams relating to the alleged intention of General Gordon to visit the Mahdi himself. These also have been laid to-day. The third exception relates to information of a confidential character, which, it is believed, would, if published, be a source of military danger to General Gordon, or to other important public interests of an international character, and which it is, therefore, not intended to lay before Parliament. Inquiry has been made of Sir Evelyn Baring, and he has informed the Government that he has sent home all the telegrams and despatches received from General Gordon.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS : How soon will the telegrams be delivered ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : I hope they will be in the hands of hon. Members on Monday morning.

MR. BOURKE : Are we to understand that all the telegrams alluded to as having been received since the 25th of March will be laid on the Table, or have they been laid to-day ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : No. Those will be laid in continuation of the Blue Book in the ordinary course; but I shall make every effort to avoid delay.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS : Why cannot we have all the telegrams by Monday morning ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : That is actually impossible; I cannot promise them.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR : Can the noble Lord state the latest date within the knowledge of the Government on which a communication from the Government reached General Gordon ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : I do not think that point arises out of the Question upon the Paper.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether information has been received that messengers have been despatched to General Gordon, as suggested in Earl Granville's telegram to Mr. Egerton of 23rd April; and, whether, should access to the General be possible, he will be distinctly informed that, the undertaking of military expeditions being beyond the scope of the commission which he holds, and at variance with the policy which was the purpose of his mission to the Soudan, Her Majesty's Government not only declines to furnish him with Turkish troops for such expeditions, but forbids them, as well as any attempt on his part to "settle the Mahdi power," as suggested in his telegrams to Sir E. Baring and to Sir S. Baker of last month?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Messages in keeping with the terms of telegram, No. 36, in "Egypt, No. 13," have been sent to General Gordon from Dongola and Suakin by two separate messengers in each case. There is no Report yet from Massowah, from which it was also proposed to act.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the noble Lord whether it is not the fact that the instructions of Her Majesty's Government to General Gordon embrace not only the retirement of the garrisons from the Soudan, but also the establishment of alternative Governments there and the protection of the ancestral Sultans?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I think the hon. Member might satisfy himself with regard to a great many of his inquiries by turning to the Blue Books.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I have asked the noble Lord a very simple Question with regard to the instructions on which the whole action of General Gordon rests; and I now ask you, Mr. Speaker, as a point of Order, whether I am not entitled to ask the noble Lord for a more direct answer to a Question of that kind; and whether it is in accordance with the practice of the House that a Member should be referred vaguely to a large number of Blue Books.

MR. SPEAKER: It rests entirely in the discretion of the Minister.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will state the reasons for which the Despatch of Sir Evelyn Baring, dated March 24th (No. 301), was not communicated to Parliament in the Ministerial Statements of April 4th, and especially the following passages:—

"General Gordon is evidently expecting help from Suakin, and he has ordered messengers to be sent along the road from Berber to ascertain whether an English Force is advancing;

"Under present circumstances I think an effort should be made to help General Gordon from Suakin:

"General Stephenson and Sir Evelyn Wood, while admitting the great risk, are of opinion that the undertaking is possible?"

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: This and the following Question of the hon. Member for Eye ask for reasons, and involve matter of argument. They are, therefore, opposed to the practice of the House, and I must decline to answer them.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I rise to Order. The noble Lord has indulged the House with a description of the position of these Questions as regards their right to be on the Paper. Now, Sir, they are on the Notice Paper by your authority; and I ask you whether the noble Lord is not bound to give some other answer?

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the noble Lord, to reply to the Questions, to state that, in his opinion, they were of an argumentative character, and that he declined to answer them to the full extent to which they were put. In that proceeding the noble Lord is perfectly in Order.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Does the noble Lord mean that the Questions are argumentative, or the answers the noble Lord might give? I looked at the Questions and thought they were very simple.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am asked to state "the reasons" in one of the Questions, and the word "why" is used in the other. That involves matter of argument which is not customary at Question time; and I do not see how I can reply without going into greater length than would be proper in an answer.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: On that point of Order, I would call to your recollection, Sir, the fact that the noble Lord—

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that I have already settled the point of Order.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Might I ask you, on the point of Order, whether, if a Member of this House asks a Member of the Government why some Papers are not produced, that can be considered an argumentative Question? If you will look at the Question you will see he asks merely why certain Papers are not presented.

MR. SPEAKER: I did not understand the noble Lord to say that. I understood the noble Lord to say that the Question involved so much of argument that it was difficult to answer it within the limits of an answer to a Question. Acting on his own discretion, the noble Lord decided he could not answer the Question.

MR. MACARTNEY: I would like to ask the noble Lord whether he considers that in the present state of intense interest and suspense with regard to the fate of General Gordon he thinks it proper, on the part of the Government, to take refuge in such a statement?

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS TO THE MAHDI.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has seen in the French Figaro, or it has been brought otherwise to his knowledge, that a French journalist has been stopped at Dongola and prevented from proceeding to the residence of the Mahdi; and, whether it is to be understood that French gentlemen, accredited as special correspondents by French journals, are not allowed, in pursuit of their avocation, to travel in the Soudan beyond Dongola?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to enter into subjects referred to in my hon. Friend's Question, relating, as they do, to statements in foreign newspapers and the action of French subjects in Egypt.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
RELIEF OF BERBER.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can state why Her Majesty's Ministers, in view of the urgent request of the Governor of Berber for military help, and of his statement that "if Berber falls there would be no more hope for the Soudan;" of Nubar Pasha's opinion that "two Egyptian battalions at Assouan should be sent on at once to Berber;" and, of the opinion of the British Generals that an Anglo-Egyptian Force could be sent to Berber, the British Government telegraphed to Hassem Khalifa, Governor of Berber, that no help could be given to him?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I replied just now to both Questions.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Am I in Order in asking the noble Lord whether he will kindly repeat the answer which he gave, for I failed to understand it? [Cries of "Order!"] Will he be so good as to inform the House why he declines to reply? [Cries of "No!"]

[No reply.]

PUBLIC HEALTH—BOROUGH OF LEICESTER—DRAINAGE OF NEIGH-BOURING RURAL DISTRICTS.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether a communication was received from the Corporation of Leicester on the 4th March, to the effect that an adjoining rural district has practically no sewerage or drainage system, in consequence of which serious nuisance was being caused to the inhabitants of the borough of Leicester; and, whether the Board has taken any practical action; and, if not, whether there is likely to be further delay by the Board in the matter?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We received a communication from the Town Council of Leicester to the effect stated, and we addressed a letter to the sanitary authority of the rural sanitary district referred to asking for their reply. Not receiving an answer from the sanitary authority, we wrote on the 15th of April pressing for a reply. We are still without an answer, and have again written to the authority requesting a reply without further delay.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—VOLUN-TEERS.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering that all Inspecting Officers of Volunteers concur in the opinion that nothing contributes more to the efficiency of the Volunteer Force than their attendance at Volunteer camps, he will not sanction the attendance this season of all Volunteers who have applied to go into camp, without restriction as to numbers, and grant to them the full allowance as in previous years, and in accordance with the Volunteer Regulations, 1881, section 29, paragraph 913?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is stated in the Regulations for the Volunteers that a portion of the Force will in each year be assisted to form regimental camps of exercise. The original intention was that each corps should be assisted to camp out once in three years. As at first only a portion of the Force made application, the corps applying were allowed to camp out year after year. But this year a very large number of applications to camp out have been received; and to keep the expense within the grant it has been necessary to place a limit on the number. Accordingly, instead of excluding entire corps, as would have been the case under the original intention, the number of permissions granted has been limited to 80 per cent of the numbers of the corps applying.

MR. TOMLINSON asked whether, since the arrangement described, some corps had not sent in an intimation that they could not go into camp with the reduced allowance?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could not without Notice give a full answer to the Question. He believed some intimations to the effect stated by the hon. Member had been received.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked whether, considering the great importance of camp training to Volunteers, the Government could not introduce a Supplementary Vote, so that all Volunteers who applied might be enabled to go into camp?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that was a question which could more properly be discussed on the Estimates.

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE—KEEPING A HOUSE —MORNING SITTINGS.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in proposing to take Morning Sittings at this early date, he will undertake to secure the opportunity for honourable Members having the first place on the Notice Paper for those days to bring on such Notice by keeping a House for them?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the hon. Gentleman put this Question under a misapprehension as to the power of the Government in the matter. I have no hesitation in saying, on the authority of my noble Friend (Lord Richard Grosvenor) and from my own experience, that if we were to undertake to keep a House for hearing the Motions of Members, which hon. Gentlemen are not willing to come down and listen to, we could not do it. What I would say is this—that if there be a case in which general interest is felt, I have no doubt a House would be kept; but if hon. Members should accidentally fail to secure a House, then, in the event of our obtaining a larger share of the time of the House than we require, the matter could be brought before the attention of the House.

EGYPT—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

MR. BOURKE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table the copy of the invitation to a Conference upon Egyptian affairs sent to the Powers, and the Replies thereto?

MR. GLADSTONE: If the right hon. Gentleman desires to have the document of invitation in the hands of the House, the Government would undertake to produce it. With regard to the answers, I consider the Question to be premature. They have not even yet been all received.

MR. BOURKE: Will the right hon. Gentleman say that the same course will be taken as in the case of the Conference at Berlin? That is to say, the answers and the invitations were laid before Parliament at the time the communication was made that the Conference would take place.

MR. GLADSTONE: I must defer my reply to that Question until the answers have all been received. I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should put such a Question before the answers have been received. He must know that it is not the custom to give undertakings to produce Papers that are not yet in the possession of the Government. The case of the Berlin Conference was in no sense a parallel one to this, because we are not going to ask the House for a large Vote of Money to support our action at the Conference which is to take place.

MR. BOURKE: In consequence of the answer of the Prime Minister, I beg to give Notice that, if I have the opportunity, I will call attention to the matter on going into Committee of Supply.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, consistently with the public interests, he can give the House an assurance that the Representative of Her Majesty's Government at the contemplated Conference will give no pledge, and enter into no covenant, which either will involve, or which may involve, the taxpayers of this Country in any expenditure or responsibility in connection with Egyptian finance?

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend will see that I cannot give an engagement of this kind. If we were to undertake that nothing should be done by us in Conference on one particular subject, other gentlemen, according to their opinions, would rise and inquire whether we could give similar engagements in regard to other matters in which they take an interest. The subject which my hon. Friend has mentioned is one of great importance; and I think he may rely upon it that we shall exercise due caution, and have due regard to what we know to be the feeling of the House.

PUBLIC HEALTH—DWELLINGS OF THE POOR—CLERKENWELL.

MR. FIRTH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the proceedings of the Clerkenwell Vestry, as reported in The Islington Gazette of April 29th, and to the statement of the Chairman of the Sanitary Committee that, in that parish, there were houses of the poor which were a disgrace to civilisation, and that the places reported by the medical officer as clean were putrid and black; whether such statement was true; whether it is true, as stated, that the sanitary inspectors have neglected their duty; whether the Vestry declined to accept the recommendations of the Sanitary Committee; and, what he proposes to do in the matter?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have no official knowledge of the facts reported, but believe that the report is accurate. I was already aware that the Sanitary Committee by a majority, and their Chairman, hold the view which I formed myself in November and December last on repeated inspection of the parish. The Vestry have, on former occasions, declined by a majority to accept various recommendations of the Sanitary Committee. On the recent occasion they appear to have adjourned the question. I have no power over the Vestry; but, as Chairman of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, I called the attention of my Colleagues to the matter, and the Chairman of the Sanitary Committee has been examined by the Commission.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked what would be the arrangement of Business for next week?

MR. GLADSTONE said, they hoped to take the Army Estimates on Monday, and the Navy Estimates on Thursday.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked what had become of the Merchant Shipping Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not understood that the Merchant Shipping Bill has foundered, or suffered any other particular accident, since the answer of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade upon the subject, which was to the effect that, as soon as the exigencies of Supply—in which, of course, Ways and Means must be understood—had been satisfied, a day would be named for proceeding further with the Bill.

MR. SEXTON asked when the Committee on the Representation of the People Bill would be resumed?

MR. GLADSTONE said, if the House agreed with the Motion he was about to make, he proposed to resume it at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday next.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the Prime Minister's answer was inconsistent with that given by the President of the Board of Trade, who had said that he proposed to proceed with the Merchant Shipping Bill as soon as the Speaker had been moved out of the Chair on the Franchise Bill, subject only to the exigencies of Supply. Were they to understand that the statement of the President of the Board of Trade was set aside by the new proposal of the Prime Minister?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the President of the Board of Trade had spoken in regard to the disposal of the time which was actually at the command of the Government, and his answer was exactly with reference to that time. But since their viewing carefully the state of Public Business, the Government felt obliged to make an additional demand, Consequently, the Merchant Shipping Bill did not enter in the same manner into the subject.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked after what hour the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill would not be taken?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have put aside effective Supply for the sake of this Bill; and undoubtedly we shall go on with the consideration of the measure if we have a chance before half-past 12.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT — SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE— MORNING SITTINGS.

MR. GLADSTONE, in rising to move, "That until the end of June this House will meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at 2 o'clock," said: When my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) gave Notice of his Amendment on this subject, I heard it without dissatisfaction, because I quite admit that when demands for Morning Sittings become frequent, it is not satisfactory that the Question of "Aye" or "No" upon them should be decided by a conversational and irregular debate, incomplete and incoherent, arising, perhaps, at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning; and therefore we considered our course, and examined what the precedents had been on former occasions. Certainly I am making a concession to my hon. Friend, though it is a concession I do not grudge, because in no former year has any Motion of this kind been made since the original Motion made by Mr. Disraeli in 1867. But this year, in consequence of the pressure of Public Business, the necessity of asking for Morning Sittings has become unusually strong; and therefore it is quite fair that we should ask the House to consider the question more as a whole, and with more than usual deliberation. I at once admit that I am asking for Morning Sittings—not, indeed, for the entire Session, or with the possibility of their lasting the entire Session—at a somewhat earlier period than has been usual in former years. Mr. Disraeli made his proposal in 1867, I think, on the 27th May. I am making the same request upon the 2nd of May. Mr. Disraeli then asked for Morning Sittings until the end of June. His reason for the limitation was that his plan was an experiment. It was an experiment which I, for one, approved and supported; when he made a renewed demand I thought it a good plan; and, on the whole, I believe it has served materially to enable the House to face the constantly-increasing demand on its time and patience. I do not call it a perfect plan, and I know that it may be considered anomalous and inconvenient, having regard to the work that has to be done by private Committees; but still it is a plan that, upon the whole, has produced a very great balance of good. As we are making a demand which I admit to be, to some limited extent, in excess of former demands, I think it is fair that I should point out to the House what I conceive to be the changes in the course and state of Business that have made this demand a necessity, for I do not hesitate to say that it is a consideration of public necessity, and nothing else, that has led us to make it. The House knows that, with regard to Monday and Thursday evenings, we already have ample demands upon them before us. Even if it were only the demands of Supply and Ways and Means that had to be met there would be very little time to spare between this and Whitsuntide. But we have got on our hands a Franchise Bill of the greatest importance—a Bill with regard to which no one, I think, will deny that it is desirable to carry it to a speedy issue, and with regard to which it is perfectly plain that, if it is to be dealt with in detail, there is no chance of carrying it forward except at Morning Sittings. It was for this very purpose, in a time of far less pressure, that Mr. Disraeli made his request in 1867 for Morning Sittings; and it was in the Morning Sittings of that year that the Franchise Bill was, if not wholly, yet mainly and substantially disposed of. I do not recollect if there was at that time any other Bill of great importance before the House; but we have many Bills of importance before the House—Bills either already produced, or about to be produced. There is, for example, the London Government Bill. That measure, affecting 4,000,000 of population in this Metropolis, must be felt to be a measure of first-class importance. In other years, and in times of less pressure, we have been able to pass not only one, but two or three measures of first-class public importance in one Session of Parliament. In 1870 we passed the Irish Land Bill, the Education Bill, and the Ballot Bill; and all those were measures requiring most minute attention in Committee. We have thought it our duty to do the best we can. We should be delighted if such were the assistance given to us by the House that we could this Session also pass three great measures—the Franchise Bill, the London Government Bill, and the Local Government Bill. To give the great measure introduced by the Home Secretary a fair chance, it is absolutely necessary to ask for a larger share of the time of the House. I will not dwell greatly upon the Cattle Diseases Bill, which we have likewise in view, because that will not now make any large further demand upon our time. It is a matter of interest to look back and to consider what have been the changes as regards the position of the Government and its command of public time that have taken place in recent years. Looking back, I find two points in which the Government have gained time. One of them is of recent date and the other of long standing. The one of long standing is with respect to the time to which the House now ordinarily extends its application to the principal subject of the evening. The House, for the most part, in the absence of disturbing circumstances which sometimes arise, now usually continues the principal subject of the evening until towards 1 o'clock. The Government have certainly somewhat gained in that, because for the best part of the 50 years since I entered Parliament, the late Mr. Brotherton, the Member for Salford, was accustomed to rise shortly after 12 and insist on moving the Adjournment of the House, and by his pertinacity, or rather consistency, he acquired a power in that respect. All that was overturned by the hardihood of Lord Palmerston, because he was always ready to sit to any hour in the morning; and he succeeded in effecting an extension of time. There is one other change made by the House which has been of important value to the Government—I mean the change with regard to the power of going into Supply on all except certain nights—namely, Mondays and Thursdays. That was an important change.

I do not disguise the benefit of it, nor do I wish to understate it. But what are the other changes which have taken place within the last 30 years? I will state them very shortly. In the first place, there is the practice of Questions. I am not going to speak of Questioning as distinct from the abuse of questioning. Without any disrespect, questioning as distinct from catechizing, which is threatening to take its place, has become really a necessary and essential part in the conduct of Public Business; but do not let us disguise from ourselves the position. The House will bear me out when I say that on Mondays and Thursdays, which are Government nights, Questions occupy one hour on the average, and frequently go on for an hour and a-half or two hours. Even take them at only one hour, that, in itself, is a sheer destruction of one-seventh or one-eighth of the time at the disposal of the Government. That is a very serious matter. Then, again, last year and this year certain Members have been pleased to devote a period of three weeks or so in the discussions of matters connected with the Address; and I know of no more fatal example for the future of this country—that future in which almost every man who hears me has a far greater interest than I—I know no more fatal example than the course adopted in that respect in the last two years. Three weeks taken from the Session means another ninth part cut off from the time available for real Business; and that produces a confusion in the proceedings of the House from which it is almost impossible to obtain a subsequent extrication. There is another subject connected with the Rules of Procedure of the House to which I cannot help referring. I have already stated that the Rule with regard to Mondays and Thursdays has been very successful, and has, undoubtedly, increased the responsibility of the Government by giving increased means of putting forward Supply; but the Rule with regard to the Adjournment of the House at Question time has, thus far, been a perfect failure. It was not so at first, so, perhaps, it seems inconsistent to speak so; but I should say that it has been increasingly a failure. During last Session, according to a Return I hold in my hand, the Adjournment of the House was moved five times, and the requisite number of 40 Members was always to be found. We have not now nearly completed one-half of the present Session, and the Adjournment has already been moved six times; and, therefore, as regards that formidable instrument of invasion of public time, a great deduction has to be made from the time at the disposal of the Government for bringing forward Public Business. I am now going to refer to another very serious change, not to be lamented, because it grows out of arrangements good in themselves; but at the same time it is well, I think, that the House should have the exact state of the case before it. That change is the very great increase in the time which the House is now required to devote to Committee of Supply. That is due in some respects, no doubt, to the increase in our expenditure, and I wish our available time could increase as much as our expenditure does. Unfortunately, it is not so. But it is not due alone to the increase in expenditure; it is likewise due to the method now adopted of dealing with Supplemental Estimates for the purpose of closing the account on the 31st of March. I hold in my hand a Return comparing the first 10 or 12 years, immediately after the Reform Bill, with the last 10 or 12 years, taking in each case the nights on which discussion took place, whether it occupied the whole night or not. In the 11 years from 1833 to 1843 the maximum number of nights spent in Supply was 13, while the minimum number was seven, the average being 10. Well, I now take the last 10 years, and I divide them into two fives; and in the years 1875-9, when the late Government were in power, the average of nights spent in Supply, instead of being 10, was 22. Nor has that diminished during the last four years the present Government have been in power; but the 22 has risen to 24. This is a very great increase in the demand upon the House in connection with that portion of Public Business which the Government is compelled to bring forward. But there is another very important change to which I must call the attention of the House, than which I do not know of any change more adverse to the progress of Public Business. I admit that the old system dealt somewhat ruthlessly with the rights of private Members, and for that reason we do not propose to revive it; but we propose, in lieu of that, to resort to this method of Morning Sittings. The old system was this—that whenever great questions were raised requiring more than one night's debate, such debates were carried on de die in diem, and the difference produced thereby was enormous. For instance, last year, or the year before, we thought it our duty to propose a Resolution in support of the Irish Land Act, and that Resolution was opposed. Four nights only were required for the debate, and yet one fortnight of the Session passed over before the Motion was agreed to. That is only an illustration, and I know what the answer of hon. Gentlemen opposite will be. It will be said that it should never have been proposed. But that is not to the purpose. The same Gentlemen who would say that would also say that in 1831, when Lord Ebrington proposed a Motion in this House with regard to a vote in another House, that it ought never to have been brought forward. But, nevertheless, it was passed by a large majority in one night. Sir, some hon. Member said the other night that there had been eight nights' debate upon the Reform Bill of 1859. But there was also a great political question mixed up with that Reform Bill. The debate upon that Bill was really a debate upon a Vote of Confidence as well as upon a Reform Bill, and the debate lasted upon the second reading for seven nights, and not for eight nights; but those nights were consecutive nights, with the exception that, of course, Wednesdays were not included. Now, Sir, this is an enormous change; and it is a change of which we feel the consequence in such a way that we are hardly able to cope with it. These, then, are the details with which we consider it necessary to trouble the House in order to exhibit the altered position in which the Government now stand, and to show how it has lost greatly the command of the time which the House was formerly pleased to place at its disposal. It is on that ground that we feel it necessary to make the request which is embodied in the Motion I have put upon the Paper; and I say the grounds of the Motion are grave and serious, and I hope the House will acknowledge that fact by agreeing to the Motion by a very large majority.

Mr. Gladstone

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That, until the end of June, this House will meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at Two o'clock."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR, in moving, as an Amendment—

"That, previous to the 1st of June in each year, no Morning Sitting on Tuesday or Friday shall be taken except by Resolution of the House, moved, after Notice in each case, at Half-past Four,"

said, the right hon. Gentleman defended his Motion, which he admitted was of a very unusual character, on two private grounds—namely, first, the general opportunities of the Government for carrying on their Business; and, secondly, the particular position of the present Session. As regarded the first ground, he was prepared to admit that the difficulties of the Government had in many respects increased; but the right hon.
 Gentleman had said that the practice of putting Questions had enormously increased, and was a serious tax on the time of the House. He admitted that the number of Questions had increased, and that the power of putting them had been to a certain extent abused; but he must point out to the House two mitigating circumstances. In the first place, the very much curtailed power of private Members to bring on subjects on Supply necessarily drove them to discuss matters of interest at Question time; and even if private Members had abused the system of putting Questions, he did not think the Members of the Government always consulted economy of time in the House, either by the conciliatory character of their replies, or by the brevity of the language in which they were given. The Prime Minister referred to what he termed the failure of the Rule regarding Motions for the Adjournment of the House, and said that many more Motions for the Adjournment failed last year than this. But this only proved that Members did not now risk moving the Adjournment of the House unless they were sure that 40 Members would support them. The right hon. Gentleman mainly based his case on the precedent afforded by the fact that Mr.
 Disraeli, on the 27th of May, 1867, made a Motion that the House should meet on Tuesdays and Fridays until the end of June. But there were two wide differences between that case and this.
 In the first place, Mr. Disraeli's Motion was made on the 27th of May, whereas this was being made on the 2nd. And, in the second place, Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill was of a very different character from that now before the House.

 By bringing in a Reform Bill which did not deal with redistribution, the whole burden of the task was being relegated to another year. The present Reform Bill was a very simple Bill; the Government had simplified it by omitting several matters with which it ought to deal; and he apprehended that in Committee it would not be found that there was much room for discussion. The Prime Minister said that unless this Motion were carried the Government could not find time for the London Bill. He did not know before this that the Government ever had any serious intention of passing that Bill this Session. He had been under the impression that the function of the London Bill was at an end now that the Home Secretary had been allowed to make the speech which for three years he had carried about in his pocket. The Prime Minister had treated the whole subject from the point of view of Government Business. He appeared to think that it was the essential Business of the House to carry Government measures, and that the House existed for no other purpose than to carry the Bills that the Government proposed.
 But the House had many other important functions, such as ventilating, by means of Motions, subjects of public interest, and it was the power of performing those functions that would be curtailed by this Motion. Whatever might be said of Government facilities having diminished, they had not diminished in so great a ratio as those of private Members. The power of private Members to call attention to matters on the Motion to go into Committee of Supply was much diminished by the new Standing Order. If this Motion were carried private Members would have no opportunity during the remainder of the Session—for they all knew what the 30th of June meant—of calling attention to any subject which they had in hand except at 9 o'clock in the evening.
 A more wasteful arrangement of public time, from the point of view both of the Government and of private Members, could not be conceived. The Government subjected themselves to talk-outs, and the convenience of private Members was equally neglected. The Prime Minister said that if the Motion on the Paper was of public interest 40 Members could always be obtained to make a quorum. But even Government measures would be talked out at 9 o'clock after a Morning Sitting were it not for the pressure of the Whips. He agreed that the Government could not, and ought not, to undertake to keep a House; but he maintained that these Evening Sittings commencing at 9 o'clock ought not to take place at all. It was all very well for the Government to state that there were special circumstances that necessitated this Motion. But in future years the precedent would be remembered and the circumstances forgotten, and the Government would come down to make a similar Motion to this on the 1st of May, relying on this precedent. He begged to move the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper.

LORD EUSTACE OECIL seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the word "That," in order to add the words "previous to the first of June in each year, no Morning Sitting on Tuesday or Friday shall be taken except by Resolution of the House moved, after Notice in each case, at Half-past Four,"—(Mr. Arthur Balfour),

—instead thereof.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he hoped the Motion would be agreed to, and did not think it could be used as a precedent against private Members, unless in the very justifiable case in which the Government was engaged with a Bill for Parliamentary Reform. At the same time, he trusted that the Government would afford facilities for the consideration of the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) dealing with the practice of putting Questions to Ministers. He would only add that he hoped the Government would not take the Cattle Diseases Bill after half-past 12.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, there was another important question which the House should not forget in considering this matter—the question of Grand Committees. He maintained that it was not fair to hon. Members to have Grand Committees sitting when Morning Sittings were being held on Tuesdays and Fridays during the remainder of the Session, because that was what the Motion of the Prime Minister really amounted to. The pressure of work on Members was so heavy at present that to ask them to undertake the work of Grand Committees, in addition to their other work, was to ask them to do more than they were able to bear. He should, therefore, support the Amendment.

MR. HENEAGE said, that, although the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) and other hon. Members interested in the Motion in favour of marriage with a deceased wife's sister were much disappointed at losing part of Tuesday night, they had decided to vote for the proposal of the Government; but they considered that in doing so they would on Tuesday have a great claim on the Government not only to make a House at 9 o'clock, but to assist in obtaining the judgment of the House on that Motion even at a late hour.

MR. PELL said, his experience as a working Member of the House for 16 years led him to the conclusion that Business would not be much advanced if the proposal of the Prime Minister were accepted. It was a merciless proposal. He had been sorely tempted to take notice of the matter in a way which would interfere with the progress of Business; but though he should not do so, he thought that private Members could not do better than lay to mind the indifference which was shown to their interests by the present Government. No reference had been made by the right hon. Gentleman to the work being done by hon. Members in the various Committees now sitting. In the event of this Motion being acceded to, he would ask how it was possible for hon. Members to devote the necessary time to the consideration of the important matters before the Committees if their attention was to be diverted by the Business going on in the House itself? He did not think the Government had done what was requisite to recommend such a proposal as this to Members sitting on the Opposition side. When a private Member had had the good fortune to obtain a night for the discussion of an important subject, and when the Motion brought forward had been carried, the decision of the House was treated by the Prime Minister with indifference, and no further notice was taken of it. Many right hon. Gentlemen opposite, some of them belonging to the Cabinet, had won their spurs and made their mark simply by means of the opportunities afforded to private Members. He would therefore appeal to the Government not to deprive private Members of those rights, or of the opportunity of doing their duty by their constituents. He would support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, the speech of the Prime Minister was a suggestive comment on the new Rules. The House spent a great deal of time—had, in fact, a Winter Session to adopt a fresh mode of transacting Public Business, which the Government promised would remove all their difficulties, and send the legislative machine smoothly ahead. This Code of Procedure had been in operation nearly two years, and they now had the Leader of the House and the main author of the Rules confessing that Government experienced as great difficulty as they ever did in making progress with their work. He did not say that this showed that all the Rules were faulty; but it did show that it was unwise to attach too much importance to the best devised regulations. The Prime Minister complained of the number of Questions. He admitted the value of the privilege of questioning Ministers; but he thought it was abused. He (Mr. Joseph Cowen) quite agreed with him. It was abused at times, but there were reasons for it. First, the Government had taken away from private Members the right of raising discussions on going into Committee of Supply, and this led to a multiplication of Questions. This was one reason. The second reason was that Ireland was under a state of siege. The people of that portion of the United Kingdom were denied their Constitutional rights, and they had no means of getting redress but by fetching their grievances before Parliament through the instrumentality of Questions. The Prime Minister had quoted a number of figures to show that the time at the disposal of the Ministry was not as great as it formerly was. They could make figures bear almost any meaning, and the figures that had been quoted only showed one side of the question. It was a fact, as the history of Parliament attested, that the privileges of private Members had been steadily decreasing for years. A quarter of a century ago the time of the House was divided between the private Members and the Ministry, the former having the larger share. Ten years ago this division was kept up. Now, however, the private Members had not one-third of the time of the House. Indeed, two Sessions ago they had not one-fourth, and every year there were encroachments. One time they took a day, then two days, then a week. These demands were made on the ground of exceptional circumstances; but a demand having once been acquiesced in was used as a precedent the year after, the exceptional circumstances under which it was granted being forgotten. Hon. Members on his side of the House used to be the special champions of the rights of independent Members. They had ceased to be that now. These encroachments, insidious, gradual, and persistent, on the privileges of private Members, would in time shut them off entirely, and make them almost as extinct as the Dodo. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and others were unceasing in their watchfulness over those rights when they sat on the other side of the House. The late Government never asked for the slightest concession that was not resisted. The present Government never asked for any concession, however extravagant, that was not granted. His hon. Friends and other private patriots sat there, in the face of these encroachments, mute and motionless. That might be all well enough at present; but the day would come when the position of Parties would be reversed. The whirligig of time would take the Liberals to the other side and bring the Conservatives there. And where would Liberal independent Members be then? They would have applied to them the restrictions that they had been instrumental in framing during the tenure of Office of their Leaders. This was no small matter; and when the pinch came they would admit it, although they looked at it so indifferently now. He knew the answer his Friends would give. They would contend that the legislation of the Government met their approval; and, therefore, they were prepared to adjust the Rules of the House to help it forward. But the Rules, once broken or relaxed, might be used for objects that would not meet with Liberal approval at other times. Complaint was made that the Liberal Members did not utilize the time they had. There was some truth in the statement. The frequent Counts out which took place, perhaps, justified the accusation. But there was an explanation for that. Personal and local questions had an equal chance in the ballot with national questions; and it often happened that these local questions, of limited interest, got the first place, and the general body of Members would not attend to make a House for their discussion. This explained some of the Counts out. He did not think the evil would ever be cured until the House decided, as the Prime Minister had often suggested it should do, upon some plan of selecting its Business. There was another reason why there was less interest in these discussions than there formerly was. The Liberals had got more faith in the Government than they once had. They were more official than they used to be. They trusted too much, in his judgment, to the making of new laws, and to the augmentation of the power of the Executive. The narrower they defined the sphere of Government the greater scope there was for personal exertion and individual enterprize. They made too many laws. ["No, no!"] He admitted that in the present complicated and complex state of society they must have laws adapted to the circumstances; but there was reason in everything, and they overdid the law-making. They had better strive to create a condition of mind that would render fewer laws necessary. Not one-tenth of the Bills that had been passed in that House in recent years had had any effect, and some of them had had an injurious effect. He had no sympathy with this constant running after legislative restraints. There never was any trouble but they flew to the Government to remedy it. The time would come when they would ask for a law to cure the toothache. This unnatural and excessive demand for new legislation led Liberals to encourage the Government in making fresh laws—whether good, bad, or indifferent. And their policy was their Party, right or wrong. His policy was with the Government when it was right, against the Government when it was wrong. The craving after legislation and the obsequious obedience to Party Leaders was one of the reasons why the rights of independent Members had been entrenched upon, and with such impunity. He was willing to give the Government any reasonable facilities for advancing the Franchise Bill; but he thought that, instead of taking two half-days, it would have been better to take one whole day. It would have saved the chance of having their Business talked out. But if they insisted on having the two half-days, they should, at least, give some guarantee that at the Night Sitting a House should be made.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he trusted the House would not agree to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. In his (Baron Henry De Worms's) opinion, the rights of private Members were being curtailed in a most dangerous manner. The speech of the Prime Minister had been most ingeniously framed with the view of lending colour to the statements with regard to Obstruction that had been circulated throughout the country with the object of damaging the Conservative Party. The right hon. Gentleman had said that there had been a great increase this Session in the number of Motions for the Adjournment of the House; but those Motions had been made in accordance with the new Rules, and they merely showed that there had been greater cause this Session for making such Motions, owing to the impossibility of obtaining from the Government any clear disclosure of their Egyptian policy. The Prime Minister had also laid considerable stress upon the time occupied by Questions; but if Tuesdays and Fridays were taken from private Members the time occupied in asking Questions from a reticent Government who only returned evasive answers to Questions put to them must necessarily increase. Unless private Members were to take some part in the proceedings of that House he did not see the use of their constituencies sending them there. Little by little the time at the disposal of private Members had been whittled away; and he, for one, must enter his protest against this plan for securing a Liberal autocracy.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that the question now before the House excited much interest throughout the whole country, great dissatisfaction being felt at the inefficiency of the labours of the House, and at the waste of time and power that nightly took place there. He gave his firm and cordial support to this proposal of Her Majesty's Government, and ventured to express his regret that, instead of being limited to two months, their demand for Tuesday and Friday mornings was not extended to the whole of the Session. Legislation by private Members was a thing of the past, and in the future all legislation must be effected by the Government of the day. He had heard with regret the Prime Minister remark that no more time ought to be occupied in the discussion of the Estimates.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member for Wolverhampton has misunderstood me. My observation was to the contrary effect.

MR. H. H. FOWLER remarked that he was glad to be corrected by the right hon. Gentleman, because he thought that far more time should be devoted to the consideration of the Estimates. In his opinion, there was no ground for complaining of over-legislation. With reference to making a House on Tuesday nights, there never would be any difficulty in regard to matters in which the House felt any real interest. There would be no difficulty in making a House next Tuesday night; but the country was tired of debates on subjects in which nobody felt the slightest interest, and the country did complain that this gigantic legislative machine should be used for waste instead of for the public advantage.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to point out that the reason there was such delay in the progress of Public Business was because, under the present Rules, they gave up some 16 hours each week that might be devoted to Public Business. The evidence of the late Speaker and Sir Thomas Erskine May before the Committee of 1878 showed that, instead of Public Business being advanced, it was considerably delayed by the introduction of the half-past 12 o'clock Rule. On Wednesdays also Public Business was stopped at a quarter to 6 o'clock, and the result was that if an objection was raised to the third Order on that day hon. Members discussed the two first Orders—though possibly of no interest or importance—until the hour for closing, and by that means the whole day was wasted. The same thing frequently occurred at Morning Sittings, and his belief was that the real cause of the delay of Public Business was because upon every day in the week they had an hour for closing, which was made worse on Morning Sittings, from the fact that they had two hours for closing—one at 7 and the other at half-past 12 o'clock. If the half-past 12 Rule were abolished, and after the interval at a Morning Sitting the Speaker was permitted to call upon an hon. Member to resume the debate which had been suspended, he believed that Public Business would be as expeditiously got through, as was the case in the days of Lord Palmerston, when the Rules were different. He, therefore, could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hertford, because he could not find it in his heart to recognize that Public Business could be properly conducted until hours of closing were done away with on every day in the week.

MR. BRYCE said, he felt so strongly the value of the rights of private Members, and the services which might be rendered by the discussions of their Bills, that he should vote for the Amendment if he thought it would seriously damage those rights. But the fact was that under the present system of procedure, and especially through the operation of the Half-past 12 o'clock Rule, a private Member could do little good; because if he had a Motion which came out second or third on the ballot, with some unimportant Motion preceding it, the House was sure to be counted out before his Motion was reached, while no Bill could get beyond the second reading if it incurred the hostility of even a single Member. Now, the Business of Parliament was conducted more by chance than anything else, and matters would not be better until they substituted a system of choice for that of chance. No real advance in the mode of doing Business would be made until they left it to a Committee or to the House itself, instead of to the ballot, to decide the questions which should be brought on. It was clear that before long they must have a complete revision of their arrangements. He admitted that the New Rules of Procedure framed 18 months ago had broken down. They might as well not have been framed at all. Three reforms were now urgently called for—an effective system of closure, a limitation of the length of speeches, and some means of determining with regard to their comparative importance the topics which private Members might bring before the House.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he thought that some effort should be made to utilize the time now wasted between 4 and half-past on days when there was little or no Private Business. It was a matter of grave doubt whether so sweeping a proposal as that of the Prime Minister, which meant the complete and absolute extinction of the rights of private Members for the remainder of the Session, would have the effect desired. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might have been satisfied to ask the House to surrender a somewhat smaller portion of the rights of private Members. For instance, the Government might be content to take private Members' Tuesday mornings, and then the Government would have no difficulty in keeping a House for their own Business on Tuesday evenings. If Members were ruthlessly deprived of their rights, they would find other means of making their voices heard, and might be compelled to assert them in a manner which the Government would not like; and, therefore, he appealed to the Prime Minister to make some modification in this sweeping extinction of the rights of private Members. Let the Government take one day, Tuesday or Friday, and give private Members the other; They would in this way be far more likely to command the assent and support of Members on both sides of the House.

MR. RYLANDS said, he had always maintained the rights of private Members, and though he intended to support the Government he had not altered his opinion as to the jealousy with which any attempt to curtail those rights should be regarded. When the House was asked to decide whether they would give the Government a portion of the time generally allotted to private Members, they ought to consider each case upon its merits. The hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) and the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) thought they should invite the Government on each occasion, when they required to encroach upon the time of the House, to make a Motion to that effect, and place their reasons upon record; but, he asked, had not the Government sufficient reasons? If he understood the Prime Minister they were going to put down Supply for Mondays and Thursdays, and discussion would be then invited. It was very important that Members should examine the expenditure of the country; and, at the same time, he considered that his rights as a private Member would be sufficiently protected by the plan proposed by the Prime Minister.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I should like to trouble the House with a few observations; but it seemed to me that, as this question was one mainly affecting the non-official Members of the House, it was desirable to hear as soon as possible the views those Gentlemen held. I was also rather curious to hear the sentiments of hon. Members opposite, and particularly hon. Members below the Gangway, because we know the line they have taken before when these proposals have been made, and we were anxious to hear what they would say now, perhaps for the last time; for if this Resolution passes they may not have an opportunity again of expressing their views so freely. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford must feel rather in the position of the man who prayed for a shower and brought down a deluge. The matter began with the proposal of the Government to take Tuesday for a particular purpose; but the hon. Member said it was inconvenient that Tuesday should be taken in that way, and suggested that there should be some solemn record of the fact, and that Tuesdays and Fridays should not be taken without some such record. The Prime Minister comes down to-night and says—"Your suggestion is excellent. It is inconvenient to have these Motions one by one, and to have discussions and debates on them. I tell you what I will do—I will take them all. I will take all the Tuesdays and Fridays till the end of June, and this may lead to their being taken to the end of the Session." That is going rather far. It is said that we are to have Mondays and Thursdays for Supply; but we want some further explanation as to that, for it is not quite consistent with what fell from the President of the Board of Trade on the subject of the Merchant Shipping Bill—it is at variance with it, for that, I understand, is to be taken in the regular course of Business. This taking up of Morning Sittings is very inconvenient to the House in more ways than one. There is not only the extra labour, but those who have to attend Private Bill Committees are placed in a position of very great difficulty and inconvenience when Business is put down in which they are interested, and to which they cannot attend. I will give the House an illustration. The Business we are to consider is the Representation of the People Bill, and one of the first Amendments is one in the 2nd clause, a most important Amendment, with regard to the limitation of the time when the Bill will come into operation, proposed by my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley). He is Chairman of a Private Bill Committee, and he cannot attend the Morning Sitting. That is one instance of the inconvenience which the proposal entails. The right hon. Gentleman says that he makes it upon a precedent set in 1867; but the Reform Bill of that year was a different Reform Bill. It did not consist of about a dozen clauses, but was a Bill of great length and great complexity, in which it became necessary to propose that Clauses 4 to 34 should be postponed. The proposal was confined to that particular Bill; but the Prime Minister says he will not do this; he will get through as many measures as he wishes. He says it is a very reasonable wish to hope that we may pass three great measures—that is, the Reform Bill, the London Government Bill, and the Local Government Bill. We have not even got that yet. Apparently we are to give up all our Tuesday and Friday mornings for the sake of these three measures, and really I think it is rather beyond the necessity of the case. The suggestion is made at a very early period of the Session compared with that of Mr. Disraeli, and I think the House should look with jealousy on any such proposal. It is said that the House wastes time, and I have no doubt that sometimes this is the case; but these attempts to curb a proper and legitimate development of private Members' rights always end in more irregular proceedings.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I wish to ask the House to consider the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hertford. He does not say that Morning Sittings are not to be taken; he differs from the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in that. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No!] Well, I understand the right hon. Gentleman to be against Morning Sittings altogether, and I was surprised to hear that argument from the right hon. Gentleman, because he will remember that he was in the Government that invented Morning Sittings. But the hon. Member for Hertford admitted that Morning Sittings were permissible in certain cases, though on each occasion you must make a Motion to that effect at 4.30. A more certain method of wasting the time of the House could not be conceived. Everybody knows it would be debated for two or three hours, and would necessarily lead to such a waste of time that it would be hardly worth while asking for it, because the time that would be taken up would be almost equal to the time gained. It seems to me that if the House really desires to save time it cannot and will not vote for a proposal of this kind. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) that legislation is useless. The Business of the country cannot be carried on absolutely and altogether by eloquent speaking. The hon. Member for Newcastle may be a great benefactor to his species; but more ordinary men must pay some little attention to the business of practical legislation. It has been said that a House cannot be made for private Members in the evening. But how is that? As the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) pointed out, when there is a Motion before the House which commands any interest there is no difficulty in making a House. Government numbers some 30 or 40 Members, while the private Members amount to 600; and I do not see why among that gallant 600 there cannot be found a sufficient number to rally to the great cause of private Members' rights, of which at 4 o'clock we hear so much and at 9 o'clock hear so little. This plan of Morning Sittings is much better than taking away the whole of a private Member's day. I venture to say that if we really want the Business of the House to go on we should not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hertford.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he thought that the House would agree that the right

hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had afforded one admirable illustration of his words—that the Business of the House was not to be advanced by eloquent speeches. He had not been fortunate enough to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Hertford; but the effect of the hon. Gentleman's Motion was clear, that previous to the 1st of June Morning Sittings should not be taken except by Resolution of the House. The Home Secretary had said that this must lead to a waste of time. For his own part, he did not think that it would do so in the least degree. It was most improper that the Government should come down at that period of the year and deprive private Members of their rights. [Cries of "Divide!"] Hon. Members would have an opportunity of dividing before very long, and possibly more than once before these proceedings terminated, for he intended to do all in his power to protect the rights of private Members. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the rights of private Members could always be vindicated. So they might, but by irregular means. Did the Home Secretary mean that private Members should be driven in their own defence to adopt those irregular methods rather than take those means which the sense of that House had placed at their disposal?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the Home Secretary, in his speech, had somewhat mistaken, not only the Motion of the hon. Member for Hertford, but also the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon. He had stated that the right hon. Gentleman had opposed Morning Sittings altogether. The right hon. Gentleman had done nothing of the kind. He had said that at that period of the year they led to a great and cruel interference with Members who had to serve on Committees upstairs, and so were unable to attend in the House. But why had the right hon. Gentleman laid such stress upon the time of the year? Because experience showed that as the Session advanced private Members were not so much divided between their duties upstairs and their attendance in the House. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Hertford only imposed the restriction until the 1st of June. After that Government could claim the privilege without stating their reasons for doing so.

He thought that the Home Secretary by his speech had weakened the case of the Prime Minister rather than strengthened it. With regard to private Members themselves, if they chose with their eyes open to vote away their rights and privileges, they must never again make any complaint. If that Motion were carried now, it would be not only for the present Session, but it would be a precedent for next Session. It might be, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton had told them, that the time had gone by for private Members; that they were no longer any use; that the Motions they might make with regard to foreign or other great interests of the nation were unworthy of the attention of Her Majesty's Government. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had appeared to imply that there were only two objects to be looked to—namely, Supply and legislation; but, for his own part, that was a view which he refused to take, and he should, therefore, support the Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE thought that the real difficulty complained of did not rest with the meetings of the House, but with the prolixity of speech. They had passed a Standing Order providing for the application of a clôture, but that clôture was too harsh for application. If the House were able to express its opinion as to whether a Member was wasting the time of the House, Obstruction would fail. While thanking the Prime Minister for having submitted the Motion to the House, he should vote for the Amendment, because he thought that the House had not fallen so low as that it could not be intrusted day by day with the disposal of its own time.

Main Question again proposed.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he had intimated in the few words that he had previously spoken that he would ask the House to divide again. He had been under the impression that he would be able to move the omission from the Prime Minister's Resolution of the words "Tuesdays and," so as to limit it to the Fridays; but he found that it was not competent for him to do so, and, therefore, he would not trouble the House to divide again.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE wished, with the permission of the House, to make a suggestion, which, however, he was not quite sure would be considered practicable. The Government was endeavouring to take the Tuesdays and Fridays for Morning Sittings, leaving the evenings on those days to private Members. The result of that arrangement, as experience showed, was that the House would be frequently counted out at 9 o'clock. He proposed, therefore, that the mode of procedure at the Evening Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays should be of the like character to that followed on Wednesdays—namely, that the Speaker should take the Chair at 9 o'clock, and, if the House was not then made, that the Speaker should wait a certain time to enable a sufficient number of Members to come down to make a House. The reason why the House was counted out was often because, immediately on the Speaker taking the Chair, his attention was called to the fact that there were not 40 Members present; whereas, if an interval of about 20 minutes were given, a sufficient number of Members would probably arrive to form a quorum. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had said there never was any difficulty in securing a House when a question of general interest was to be discussed. But such questions often stood second or third on the Paper; and Members who took an interest in them would come down shortly after 9 to join in their discussion. He would suggest that when the Speaker came down at 9 o'clock, and there were not 40 Members present, he should sit for one, two, or three hours. If there were several Motions, a certain time might be fixed in which to make a quorum for each Motion, so that in the course of time some Motion might be reached in which the House was interested enough to make a quorum.

MR. GLADSTONE: The suggestion of the noble Lord, so far as I have been able to follow it, has all the marks of a work of genius; but, at the same time, it is involved in a certain amount of obscurity. The precise relation between the times and the Motions on the Paper have not been quite clearly laid down by the noble Lord; and though the noble Lord has devoted himself in a very patriotic and impartial spirit to the subject, I am afraid that without long Notice and some explanation we could not do justice to it.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he did not think that the Prime Minister had done justice to the suggestion of the noble Lord, for whose proposal there was a great deal to be said. He desired to enter a protest against the course taken by the Government. The vote just taken was unfortunate and deplorable, and illustrated the degradation of the House, and proved the tyranny of the Government and the servility of a large number of their supporters. If Members of the Government would avail themselves of their brief holiday to take a trip to Australia or India, instead of going, for instance, to Copenhagen, they would have their views of these subjects greatly widened, and they would feel the indignation and resentment that prevailed in our Colonial and Imperial Dependencies with regard to the neglect with which questions relating to the Colonies and the Dependencies had been treated.

MR. PARNELL said, that he and his hon. Friends near him had voted with the Government on this Division, because of the general importance of the Government programme; but, at the same time, he was bound to say that the Government had not during the past two years, and apparently did not intend during this Session, to devote any fair proportion of the Government time to their own Bills relating to Ireland; Bills which they had announced their intention of bringing forward, and which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had admitted the importance of. Now, under these circumstances, he thought he was entitled to express the hope that the Government should see their way to devoting some portion of the extra time which they had now obtained in going forward with their own Bills relating to Ireland. It was announced some time ago by the Chief Secretary that he had a Bill ready with regard to the important question of Irish education; the other day he also announced that he had a Bill ready with regard to sites for schools; and on last Wednesday they had the further important announcement from the right hon. Gentleman that in a fortnight he would introduce a Bill with regard to additional facilities for the purchase of land by tenants in Ireland. Now, these were all questions which could not be disposed of without the allocation to them of some fair proportion of the Government time. Last Session they had practically no time devoted to Irish Bills except a day or two at the end of the Session, and the Bill then passed was thrown out by the Lords on the ground that they had no time to discuss it. Now, he hope the same mistake would not be made this year; and he thought the Government, in arranging the Irish programme, in choosing the Irish Bills which should first be presented to the consideration of the House, might fairly take into consideration the general opinion of the Irish Members on all sides of the House upon it. The Government had expressed their own preference for the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. Well, that was a question on which he had always remained neutral, and he intended to remain neutral on the present occasion, although he believed the majority of his own constituents were opposed to it; but he thought the Government, before they decided that the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, or the Bill for the Purchase of Lands, or any other Bill should be taken first, might fairly take into consideration the prevailing opinion of Irish Members on all sides of the House. By doing so they would be lifting from their own shoulders a great load of disagreeable responsibility in the matter, and would not, in any Bill they then introduced, be running foul of any important section of Irish opinion.

SIR JOHN HAY suggested that the House should revive a Sessional Order which had been adopted in some former Sessions, to the effect that at Evening Sittings the Speaker should remain in the Chair for a quarter of an hour after 9 o'clock before counting the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER differed from his right hon. and gallant Friend. Although the practice referred to did exist for a short time it was soon dropped, and it was felt to be a mistake that it had ever been adopted. The suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for South Wilts (Viscount Folkestone) was really only the discarded plan referred to by his right hon. and gallant Friend. If a House could not be formed at 9 it was a hint that the House did not care for the subject. He entirely agreed with the Prime Minister that it was incumbent upon private Members to keep a House for themselves. To compel the Government to do so would be an act of tyranny on the part of the House. With regard to the noble Lord's proposal, he was sure that it would lead to a system of scheming and intrigue and locks-out which it was most undesirable to introduce. Of course, Members interested in Motion No. 2 would take care to be conspicuous by their absence; and, perhaps, the supporters of Motions Nos. 3 and 4 might by various processes succeed in obtaining special favour. He hoped the Government would not re-open the question, and that if it were re-opened they would not let it be thought that they were in favour of either of the suggestions that had been made.

MR. WHITWORTH said, he would not have spoken if it were not for the remarks of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). The hon. Member said that a majority of his constituents were opposed to the Sunday Closing Bill. Now, he (Mr. Whitworth) believed that a canvass of the inhabitants of Cork City showed that there were five to one in favour of the Bill. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not in Order. The House is not discussing the merits of the Sunday Closing Bill.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, until the end of June, this House will meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at Two o'clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PARLIAMENT—PARLIAMENTARY ELECTION (CITY OF HEREFORD).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. RAIKES, in rising to call attention to the circumstances connected with the withdrawal of the Petition against the last Parliamentary Election for the City of Hereford; and to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to investigate the same, and to report thereon to the House, said, it was with regret that he found himself obliged to undertake the duty of bringing this matter before the House—a duty which he had hoped would have been assumed by the Attorney General, as it affected the Privileges of the House; but he had unsuccessfully appealed to the Attorney General to bring the matter forward. The circumstances in question occurred in the spring of 1880, and it was not until two years after that time that he was returned to the present Parliament. He would have preferred to leave the matter to those who were responsible for prosecuting offences against the Privileges of the House; and he did not feel himself compelled to move until the document, which was the foundation of the case, was cited in the House, as it was on the 7th of March last. So complete, however, was the publicity which this matter had attained, that the document setting forth the corrupt agreement had been posted on the walls of Hereford more than a year ago. He had no personal feeling in the matter, had received no offence, had no desire to give pain, and had not the honour of the acquaintance of either of the Members for the City of Hereford. It was generally understood that the election for the City of Hereford in 1880 was an expensive one to both Parties; and rumours were rife as to the enormous amount that had been expended on behalf of the successful candidates. In consequence of these rumours, a Petition was presented against the return. But before the Petition was presented, and while it was in the air, influential and eminent members of the Liberal Party in Hereford expressed to some of the Conservative leaders their extreme desire that no Petition should be presented, and their readiness to make a compromise. A gentleman, whom he would rather not name now, offered to one of the Conservative leaders that if they would withdraw the Petition that was threatened against the return, then the hon. and learned junior Member (Mr. R. T. Reid) would vacate his seat as soon as he had the opportunity of offering himself for a Scotch borough. That proposition was considered and discussed; but it was not accepted, and the Petition was accordingly presented. On the last day for the filing of the recognizances and affidavits the same gentleman met the agents for the Petitioners close to the Royal Courts of Justice in London, and entreated them to delay the filing to as late an hour as they could, because he hoped he would be in a position to make an arrangement which would be satisfactory to them. This second proposal was communicated to the Conservative leaders in Hereford in the course of the evening. It was to the effect that the hon. and learned junior Member should retire from the representation of the borough at the close of the present Parliament, and that he should not offer himself again. That proposition was also refused, the recognizances and affidavits were filed, and the decks were apparently cleared for action. About this time Mr. Sydney Myer, one of the principal ornaments and supporters of the Liberal Party, met Mr. Garrold, the Conservative agent, who was to conduct the Petition against the return; and Mr. Garrold advised Mr. Myer to put himself into communication with Mr. Ralph, an ornament of the Conservative Party. Mr. Ralph and Mr. Myer had a meeting at a tavern, and they could not arrive at a satisfactory agreement. It was determined that they should meet again, and on the 22nd of May, by an appointment made through Garrold, they met in his garden, approaching it through a back street and entering by a side door. Mr. Myer commenced business by exhibiting a roll of bank notes, and intimating that Mr. Ralph might have as many of them as he desired if by his influence the Petition could be withdrawn. Mr. Ralph was at the moment proof against the temptation, and said it would be impossible that he could use his influence unless satisfactory terms could be made for the Party. These terms he defined to be, that one of the sitting Members should apply for the Chiltern Hundreds about Easter, 1882, that the Conservatives were to be indulged with a walk over, and that at the next General Election the Liberals should bring forward only one candidate and allow the Conservatives to have the second seat. These terms Mr. Myer said he thought were hard, but he would see what he could do. He was told that a document must be drawn up, and that it should be signed by the leaders of the Liberal Party. Mr. Myers then went away, but happened to leave a roll of twelve £50 Bank of England notes on a bench in the garden where the conversation had taken place. He further covenanted with Mr. Garrold that in the event of the Petition being withdrawn he would find a sum of money which should defray the costs of the Petitioners, both taxed and untaxed, which he (Mr. Raikes) understood were considerably in excess of the £600 deposited in the peculiar manner just described. Mr. Myer seemed to have had difficulty with his friends at first. However, after a short time, he communicated to Mr. Ralph the terms of the agreement which had been quoted in the House by the hon. Member for Evesham (Mr. Dixon-Hartland). The following was the document which formed the basis of his case:—

"May, 1880. (1.) One of the present sitting Members for the City of Hereford to apply for the Chiltern Hundreds before Easter, 1882. (2.) If a vacancy occurs in the representation of the City of Hereford during the present Parliament the first shall be filled up by the Conservative Party without opposition from the Liberal Party, and each Party shall thus continue to have one Member in the present Parliament. (3.)"—

he wished to call attention to the wording of this paragraph—

"At the next General Election the Liberal Party shall nominate one candidate only for the City of Hereford, and the Conservative Party shall nominate one candidate only, and both Parties pledge themselves to support the return of such two candidates only. The undersigned approve of the terms above written, and severally engage to use our best endeavours to carry them into effect."

The following were the signatures attached to the document:—Sydney Myer, William Mason, M. J. G. Scobie, who had been appointed an Official Receiver to the Board of Trade, and was Secretary to the Hereford Liberal Association, J. R. Dillon, James Bowers, William Barker, J. L. Barling, Henry Lane, Henry Rogers, Robert Reay, O. Shellard, Thomas Cane, S. Packwood, a gentleman remarkable in the history of elections at Hereford, James Haim, William Prosser, F. H. Merrick, John Bowers, E. W. Fenton, J. M. Pearce, and Thomas Carless. Those were the names which were ultimately attached to the document. The transactions to which he had referred all took place in the last week of May, 1880. On the 28th of May proper steps were taken to withdraw the Petition. The necessary affidavits were put in by the two Petitioners, and affidavits in answer were signed by the two hon.

Members for the City of Hereford. Those hon. Gentlemen, of course, disclaimed any corrupt action on their part, and the Judges before whom the affidavits came presumably had no alternative but to dismiss the Petition. He imagined that this transaction took place subsequent to the Gloucester Election Petition. The Report of the Judges upon the Gloucester Election was as follows:—

"In these circumstances we are not satisfied that the abandonment of the case against Mr. Monk was not the result of an arrangement made with a view to the withholding from us of evidence of the extensive corrupt practices which there is reason to believe prevailed at the election."

The House of Commons, upon that Report, appointed a Committee to investigate the circumstances; but the case which he had laid before the House carried the matter a great deal further. The House, perhaps, would like to know where the bank notes were likely to have come from. Mr. Myer, who had possession of the notes, was the gentleman who first introduced the senior Member for the City of Hereford (Mr. Pulley) to the constituency. Some of the bank notes, of which he had the numbers, were dated the 16th of July, 1879, and the others September 16, 1879. They all bore the familiar signature of "F. May." He found that they were issued to the National Provincial Bank, with which the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Hereford had an account; and, as far as he could ascertain, they were again issued by that bank at the Hereford branch.

MR. PULLEY: May I ask the date?

MR. RAIKES said, the date, when he first found them in circulation, was the 22nd of May, 1880. That was the day on which Mr. Myers handed them to Mr. Ralph. He thought that was an interesting circumstance in connection with this matter. In 1882 the persons who had made this arrangement on behalf of the Conservative Party became a little anxious as to its fulfilment. A letter was accordingly written to Mr. Scobie, who was then the Secretary of the Liberal Association, calling his attention to the agreement and claiming its fulfilment. In reply, Mr. Scobie wrote a letter, dated March 17, 1882, stating that the persons who had signed the agreement had no intention of departing from the future terms of the agreement. Mr. Scobie inclosed two letters which he had received, dated from the House of Commons. The first was from the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for the City of Hereford, who stated that the agreement was not drawn up with his consent or knowledge, and that he should not apply for the Chiltern Hundreds. The other letter was from the junior Member for the City of Hereford (Mr. R. T. Reid), who also stated that he had no intention of applying for the Chiltern Hundreds, and that the agreement, to which he was not a party, was signed without his knowledge or consent. Both the letters were dated March 15, 1882. The Hereford Times, a Liberal paper, on the 20th of May, 1882, said—

“We learn that at a specially convened meeting of the Hereford Liberal Association, held at the Liberal Club Rooms yesterday, a letter was read from Mr. R. T. Reid, M.P., announcing his intention to retire from the representation of Hereford at the end of the present Parliamentary Session.”

MR. R. T. REID: I never wrote any such letter; and a denial was posted all over the town within 24 hours after the paragraph appeared.

MR. RAIKES said, the hon. Gentleman would have an opportunity of giving an explanation by and by. He had a longer extract from a Conservative paper, The Hereford Journal, saying that the statement referred to was inaccurate, but that what was meant was that Mr. Reid, when a Dissolution came, would not offer himself to Hereford for re-election. The hon. Gentleman would have to explain the concurrence between this modified statement, which he did not understand the hon. Member to contradict, and the statement of Mr. Scobie that the signatories were prepared to carry out the future part of the agreement, which was that one of the Members was to retire at the next General Election. He did not think that the facts which he had given presented so complete a case against those hon. Members as would warrant him in asking for an inquiry into their conduct; but he did think that he had presented as complete a case for inquiry into corrupt practices as had ever been brought before the House. There was a clause in the Corrupt Practices Bill of last year, against which he protested at the time, by which a future Royal Commission would be precluded from going into the circumstances or practices which had taken place at the previous election. But here was a case in which a gentleman in an official position had been concerned in a most deliberate and unblushing attempt to defeat the law with regard to corrupt practices at Parliamentary Elections, and to evade the jurisdiction of the Election Court to which that House had intrusted discretion in such matters. If the House passed by a matter of this sort as light and inconsiderable, it would do a great deal more to encourage and promote corrupt practices than was done even by the unfortunate clause of the Act of last year. If this inquiry was given it would be necessary to press Mr. Sydney Myer for some information as to where he got the notes, and also as to the source of the sum of £1,100 or £1,200 which he paid to Mr. Garrold for the election costs. Mr. Myer was not a man who was able to pay them out of his own pocket, and was probably acting for someone who was well able to pay. As to the senior Member for Hereford (Mr. Pulley), he was content to leave the case there. With regard to the junior Member (Mr. R. T. Reid), he had listened with some regret to his observations when he questioned the Attorney General on the subject some time ago. The hon. Member appeared to take great credit to himself, not for his freedom from any complicity in this matter, but seemed to think it an act of heroic virtue that he should have profited by those nefarious transactions, and declined to pay the price. They must go back to the days of Joseph Surface for anything like it; for the hon. Member had placed himself exactly in the position of a man who, having made a settlement on some person which he found afterwards inconvenient to carry out, turned round and said it was obtained by an immoral consideration. The House would do well to be strict in preserving its privileges, and in dealing with corruption; but he hoped there was one thing which it prized still more, and that was the recognition of all honourable obligations. He thought he had made out a case which the Attorney General would find it impossible to confute, as far as the facts went; and he hoped he might appeal to the judgment of that House, as he was certain he might have done to the judgment of any

House of Commons which preceded it, to show its jealousy of its own honour and its hatred of immoral practices, which could only be done by appointing the Committee for which he moved. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution which stood in his name.

MR. PULLEY begged to second the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee appointed to investigate the circumstances connected with the withdrawal of the Petition against the last Parliamentary Election for the City of Hereford, and to report thereon to the House,"—(Mr. Raikes),—instead thereof.

MR. R. T. REID said, the right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech by saying that neither his Colleague (Mr. Pulley) nor himself had given him any offence, and that it was a source of pain and regret to him to have to make any charge; and yet he concluded, without having heard what he had to say or asking him for any explanation, by comparing him to Joseph Surface, and suggested what was even worse and more contemptible than corruption—swerving from the word he had given. Although he believed that the transactions to which the right hon. Gentleman referred were dishonourable in the extreme, if he had directly or indirectly been a party to them he should have most strictly carried out even such dishonourable compacts. So far as he was concerned, he was very glad that his hon. Friend had seconded the Resolution. He stated in the most emphatic manner the fact that he had not been directly or indirectly a party or privy to any agreement of any kind relating to the representation of the City of Hereford, or the withdrawal of any Election Petition. That statement he had made before, and he repeated it. In 1880 an Election Petition was presented against his Colleague and himself. The right hon. Gentleman said that the election was expensive on both sides. Well, the right hon. Gentleman himself had some experience in that way. For his own part, he had not spent or paid a single shilling except for legal expenses, and he was perfectly prepared to prove it before the Committee if it were appointed. The Election Petition was not presented with any view to vindicate purity of election. The object was, if possible, to force one of the Members to withdraw in order to make room for one of the opposite Party, and he was the victim who was designated for sacrifice; and had it not been for his own conduct in the matter, and his determination to refuse to have anything to do with any such bargain, he should now have been a disgraced and a dishonoured man. He wished to say distinctly that a formal proposal had been made to him in the presence of a witness that the Petition should be withdrawn if he would consent to retire from the representation of the City of Hereford, and strong pressure had been put upon him from both sides to induce him to retire. To that proposal the answer he made was that he had nothing whatever to fear from the Election Petition, that he had absolutely obeyed the law, and that he would not retire from the representation of the city at any time before the Dissolution of the present Parliament, and that he would represent that city in as many Parliaments as it might please himself to stand and the electors of Hereford to choose him as their Representative. He was in a position to prove that by witnesses who were present when he made the statement. The right hon. Gentleman had said that some person had offered on his part that; he should withdraw; he, on the contrary, asserted that that statement would prove to be a falsehood when the matter came to be investigated before the Committee. He believed that he knew the gentleman to whom the right hon. Gentleman referred, and he would say that he had never made such a statement in his life. He had communicated to his hon. Colleague the pressure that had been brought to bear upon him to induce him to retire; and he had declared to him at the same time that nothing would induce him to retire with the cordial approval of his Colleague. This determination on his part had been communicated to the Conservative leaders in the city. Moreover, the right hon. Gentleman would find that in every daily paper in London there had appeared, on the 28th or the 29th of May, a statement that there was no foundation for the rumour that he intended to retire from his seat. Under such circumstances, it was preposterous to suggest that the Petition was withdrawn in the belief that he (Mr. Reid) was about to resign his seat. At the time that the Petition was withdrawn, he believed that it had been withdrawn unconditionally. He desired to put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether he really did mean what his words appeared to be intended to convey? He and his Colleague had, in the most perfect good faith, made affidavits in which they had sworn that, to the best of their knowledge and belief, no bargain whatever had been made in respect of the withdrawal of the Petition; and he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman seriously intended to convey to the House that he and his Colleague had deliberately committed perjury in this matter? He would not for the world make any such suggestion about any man without the very strongest proof. He asked the right hon. Gentleman what proof he had that he (Mr. R. T. Reid) knew of the existence of the document containing the agreement referred to at the time that the Petition was withdrawn? He did not want to wait for the Committee—would the right hon. Gentleman, inasmuch as he had made a monstrous imputation, now rise in his place and, in the face of the House, state who was the man who, he said, had brought this document to his knowledge?

MR. RAIKES said, he would rather not give any names, from consideration for the persons interested. The hon. Gentleman was going a little further than he went. He said the gentleman who professed to make the communication on behalf of the hon. Gentleman—he did not say it was made by the hon. Member—but that a proposal was made by a gentleman well known in the borough to the Conservative Party at Hereford.

MR. R. T. REID: Who is the gentleman?

MR. RAIKES said, he would give the name if the hon. Gentleman really desired it, though he would rather not.

MR. R. T. REID: Certainly.

MR. RAIKES: Well, the gentleman who professed to make the proposal on behalf of the hon. Member was Mr. Gwyn James, the brother of the Attorney General.

MR. R. T. REID said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the question. Considering what he had said about the affidavits, he wanted to know who it was he suggested had informed him (Mr. R. T. Reid) at the time that the Petition was to be withdrawn on the terms that he should retire, or what proof the right hon. Gentleman had that he was in the smallest degree aware of the existence of the document in question?

MR. RAIKES said, that the hon. Member appeared to be anxious to anticipate the decision of the Committee. It would be far preferable to leave the whole matter to be inquired into by the Committee. He had not said that he knew who it was that made the hon. Gentleman aware of it, and he did not know; but he did say that, inasmuch as the document in question had been signed by 23 leading members of the Liberal Party, it was not unreasonably supposed that they were authorized to treat on behalf of the hon. Member.

MR. R. T. REID said, that he claimed the right, unless prevented by the Speaker, to extract from the right hon. Gentleman an answer to his question. The right hon. Gentleman either did or did not suggest that at the time he (Mr. R. T. Reid) made the affidavit in 1880 he was aware of the existence of the agreement. If the right hon. Gentleman suggested that he was aware of the agreement, would he say whether he had proof of it upon the statement of any respectable man, or whether it was merely a matter of inference?

MR. RAIKES said, that he thought he had a right to ask whether the hon. Member was pursuing the course usual in these cases? He had brought forward a statement in that House which he was prepared to verify before a Committee. He asked the House to allow him to call his witnesses in verification of his statement, and not to allow themselves to be put in the place of the Committee.

MR. R. T. REID said, the House would observe the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman. He must say it was rather hard that he should be placed in this position—that he should not be told whether a grave charge was made against him or not. From the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman was withholding this information, the House would be able to judge of the weight that should be attached to the right hon. Gentleman's statement that he had brought forward this matter with regret. The explanation of the document referred to was simple. There were persons on both sides of politics whose interest it was to cause the Petition to be withdrawn, and those were the persons who made the bargain in defiance of him, and for the purpose of coercing him. It was a secret agreement, and absolutely unknown to him in its inception, in its creation, and in its execution, and he never heard of it until after the withdrawal of the Petition. He was the person against whom the whole of the arrangement was levelled. The right hon. Gentleman had said that there should be honour among thieves; if he had been a thief, he should have acted in accordance with that honour, however low it might be. But the thieves in the matter were the persons in whose interest this Motion was made; and he (Mr. Reid) was the man whom they had attempted to rob. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of bank notes—he did not know what the right hon. Member meant by that; but he had not paid a single farthing beyond the legitimate expenses in connection with his election. That was what enabled him from the very commencement to defy the Petitioners. This matter was now four years old, and it was rather remarkable that it had not been brought forward earlier; but this was part of the same pressure put upon him at the time of the Election Petition. If the Motion proceeded from a desire for purity, the right hon. Gentleman would scarcely have waited for two years. He (Mr. Reid) had known for some time that a Motion of this kind would be made unless the Liberal Party consented to divide the representation of the city at the next General Election. This Motion was held as a terror over the heads of some men, to be used if it appeared that the representation was not going to be divided; and when it was found that the people of Hereford were not to be enalaved, and were going to contest both seats, this Motion was brought forward in the interests of those who had been disappointed. That was the plain account of the action of the right hon. Gentleman. He made no complaint of this Motion. It was better that the right hon. Gentleman should come forward and expose himself by such a Motion as this, rather than that he should pillage his (Mr. R. T. Reid's) character in secret by whispers in the Lobby. He courted with great satisfaction the inquiry moved for by the right hon. Gentleman, and the right hon. Gentleman should hear of it when the Committee had reported. He should then request from the right hon. Gentleman an apology for the injury he had attempted to do him as public as the charge he had made against him.

Mr. RANKIN said, that, occupying the position of Chief Steward of the City of Hereford, he felt that he ought to make a few remarks to the House on the subject under discussion. Though he was sure the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) had brought forward the subject from the purest motives, he very much regretted he had done so. In the first place, the time was most inopportune for the purpose. Hereford had now been allowed to slumber for four years without having had any Petition to disturb it, except municipal election petitions; and it would be a great pity for this inquiry, which was in the nature of an Election Petition, to be now held. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman what good he imagined could come to either Party from the course he had taken? He (Mr. Rankin) had, of course, heard the rumours as to the bargain alleged to have been made between certain parties in the City of Hereford, and he had no word of extenuation to say on their behalf if they made the corrupt bargain as stated. Still, the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman could have no good result whatever; but it must create animosity, ill blood, and rancour very extensively. It would be bad for the City, and it could not be good for the Conservative Party, as he could positively say, knowing the city as well as he did. He hoped the inquiry would not be granted. He regretted very much that the City of Hereford should have been dragged into a debate of this description, and that it should have been made to occupy such an unenviable position. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was the inverse of that made in the case of the Cities of the Plain, and Hereford was to be destroyed because of five or ten unrighteous men who were numbered among its citizens. He hoped that the House would not grant the Committee asked for by the right hon. Gentleman, and that they should hear no more about this matter in the House of Commons.

MR. PULLEY reminded the House that, having seconded the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman, he thought he had shown his readiness to meet the charges which he had made. He thought that if the Committee of Inquiry were granted it would show how absolutely without foundation those charges were. The agreement referred to had been sent to him two years after it was made. He did not know the terms of that agreement until it was received by him. He had certainly heard of the subject before that time; but he had no accurate information as to what the arrangement was until two years after it was made. He was aware that great pressure had been put upon his Colleague. Great pressure had also been put upon himself to use whatever influence he might possess with his Colleague to induce him to withdraw from the House before the Petition was presented. His Colleague had told the House how they had stood side by side to resist any pressure that might be brought to bear upon them to adopt the course suggested. The right hon. Gentleman referred to a report published in The Hereford Times as to his Colleague retiring from Parliament after the then existing Session. He happened to go to Hereford the day following that on which the paper had been published. On reading it he was astonished very much at the manner in which it was worded. He took immediate steps to have the mistake rectified. The mistake arose in this way. The report had been mentioned to the editor of The Hereford Times, who went to his office, and, by a slip of the tongue or of the pen, used the word "Session" instead of "Parliament." That was the real history of the case, and he hoped it would satisfy the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

MR. WARTON said, if it was the intention of the Government to refuse this inquiry a very unfavourable inference would be drawn with regard to the hon. Members for Hereford, because their indignant denials would then be supposed to be made in consequence of the intention of the Government to refuse the inquiry. If the Government intended to refuse this Committee, their action would be on a par with that shelter which they always threw over corruption.

A Corrupt Practices Bill had been introduced by the Government, and it was very amusing to think that the most corrupt Election of 1880 had been carried on by an enormous expenditure of money on the Liberal side. That was the reason why they had included in that Bill the whitewashing clause; and he maintained that the existence of that clause in the Bill was an additional reason why this Committee of Inquiry should be granted. If, however, it was refused, such a refusal would throw light on the real object of the whitewashing clause and the hypocritical pretence of the Government in coming forward to support this Corrupt Practices Bill. He thought the Government ought not to refuse this inquiry, on the ground that if it resulted in nothing everyone concerned would be rendered happy; and if the reverse was the case, and Liberal corruption was brought to light, then some good would have been done. The Government would not like this, it was true, and probably for that reason they would refuse the Committee. He had heard a great deal about the large sums of money paid during this Hereford Election; and he thought it was a curious fact that the senior Member for Hereford should have failed twice on his merits in being elected, and that on the third occasion he had succeeded by the power of his money. The Committee of Inquiry would be useful in this respect—that it would bring out the fact that that election was a very expensive one indeed, especially on the Liberal side. It would not be to the honour of the Government or of the House to refuse a Committee of this kind. It was to the interest of the hon. Members for Hereford that inquiry should be made. They would stand before the world in a bad light if the Government sheltered them from an inquiry of this description. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, was entitled to the respect of the House for having brought this matter forward. He believed he had no interest in the matter, his motive being quite pure and disinterested. The only objection to be found with the speech of the junior Member for Hereford was that he attempted to impute some motive to the right hon. Gentleman for having called the attention of the House to the subject. He felt quite sure that his right hon. Friend had brought this subject forward with the highest, the purest, and the best motives, and therefore he should support the Motion. [“Divide!”] As regards hon. Members calling out “Divide,” he did not know how they could go to a Division until there were two sides to the question. He expected that the Government intended to oppose the Motion in consequence of their love of corruption, for they had introduced a Corrupt Practices Bill which contained a whitewashing clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had some delicacy in attempting to afford the House any guidance on the present occasion—first, because the constituency which had been referred to was that of his own native city; and, secondly, because the name of a relative of his had been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman in connection with this matter.

MR. RAIKES said, he did not think the Attorney General was in his place at the time. The name was most unwillingly drawn from him.

MR. R. T. REID wished to make an explanation. The name was volunteered by the right hon. Gentleman. He asked a question which had never yet been answered, as to what proof the right hon. Gentleman had of alleging his complicity in the agreement; and the right hon. Gentleman introduced the name of the gentleman in question in a perfectly different connection.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was perfectly aware of what had taken place. He did not wish to come in conflict with the right hon. Gentleman, for the right hon. Gentleman had shown him but scant courtesy of late in that House; and among his own constituents the right hon. Gentleman had spoken of him in a way in which he was glad to say one Member seldom spoke of another. If the right hon. Gentleman had given him Notice that he was about to make this charge, he should have been prepared to make some statement in relation to it. But, as he knew nothing about this election, he was unprepared to make any comment except this—that he could answer for the honour and the conduct of his relative as much as he could answer for his own. He passed from this subject in order to ask the House to consider what, apart from political and, he hoped, personal considerations, they ought to do. They were asked to appoint a Committee to inquire into the circumstances under which the alleged agreement was made. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to charge either of the hon. Members for Hereford with being a party to that agreement? If he did, let him say so. As he obtained no reply, he gathered from the right hon. Gentleman's silence that he made no such charge. The House had jurisdiction over the conduct of its Members; but the right hon. Gentleman, by his silence, acquiesced in the statement that he had no charge to make, or that he had not the courage to make it. There was no suggestion that a breach of the Rules of the House had been committed by either of the hon. Members. Supposing it were found that 20 gentlemen signed the agreement, as seemed to be admitted, the House could do nothing. There had been no contempt of the House. No further proceeding could be taken; and a Committee would simply find that certain persons, without authority, entered into an improper agreement. At the end of four years after the transactions, without having power to punish or even to censure the parties to the agreement, they were asked to arrive at facts, which seemed to be admitted, and which could be carried no further. He would not enter into the question of the object with which this Motion had been made, or discuss why it had been kept in abeyance. It was asked why an inquiry into this matter should not be granted. Well, this was a question of precedent. If the House were to grant a Committee on the representations of men of strange conduct themselves, from whom the right hon. Gentleman had obtained his information, they would be going beyond any precedent. Moreover, the inquiry could have no Constitutional result. In the circumstances, he must ask the House to consider whether this was a case in which inquiry ought to take place. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport told the House that it was comical for the Corrupt Practices Bill to have been introduced by the Attorney General. Did the hon. and learned Member mean to say that he (the Attorney General) had ever, directly or indirectly, taken part in any corrupt practices in his life?

MR. WARTON: Taunton is a very corrupt place. The hon. and learned Gentleman knows it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his constituents could defend themselves. The question was, whether the hon. and learned Member for Bridport meant to charge that he had been guilty of corrupt practices? The hon. and learned Member for Bridport was a fitting supporter for the right hon. Gentleman who introduced this subject, and who hinted at charges he did not dare to make. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport asserted that the Government carried a white-washing clause, so that there should be no retrospective inquiry; but he might point out that there was no such clause in the Government Bill, and that it was inserted at the suggestion of a Conservative Member of the House. In conclusion, he appealed to the House not to grant an inquiry, which would be without precedent and without result.

MR. ONSLOW said, he thought the Government ought to grant the Committee, in order that the grave charges made by his right hon. Friend might be thoroughly investigated. If the House refused to grant the Committee the public would say that the Government were using their influence to shield the Members for Hereford, and that the Attorney General was seeking to cover the sins of his relative. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Oh!] The Home Secretary, of course, knew a great deal more about corrupt practices than he did. He wished to impress this fact upon Her Majesty's Government—that, however painful it might be for that House to give a vote against these hon. Members, still, if the Committee were refused, the public would disbelieve in all their protestations of their desire to put down corrupt practices at elections. It would be said out-of-doors that the Government were determined to screen the hon. Members lest many nasty things should come to light. When charges of this serious character were brought against hon. Members, they ought, in the interests of those hon. Members themselves, to be sifted to the bottom before a competent tribunal, with the view of their being either substantiated or disproved. He hoped that the Attorney General would see his way to alter his decision in this matter, and to consent to the appointment of this Committee.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that it appeared to him that the only question for the House to consider in this matter was, whether the appointment of this Committee would be for the public advantage in checking those corrupt practices which they all so much deplored? A good deal might be said in favour of appointing this Committee if the inquiry before it would result in exposing corrupt practices that had not yet been brought to light; but all the exposure that was likely to result from the inquiry had been brought about by the right hon. Gentleman himself. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman that an improper agreement had been entered into with the view of making a bargain with an hon. Member in connection with the withdrawal of this Petition had not been contradicted, and the names of the persons concerned in that agreement had been given publicly. An inquiry before a Committee, therefore, would not bring to light any new facts. How were hon. Members to vote on this question? The view he took of the matter was this—if the right hon. Gentleman intended to impute that the two sitting Members for Hereford were guilty of being privy to this agreement, he should cordially vote for the appointment of the Committee; but if the right hon. Gentleman did not make that imputation he should vote against the Motion.

MR. BIGGAR said, that having heard the opening speech he could bear testimony to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had not given the name of the Attorney General's brother without considerable and most unusual pressure being brought to bear upon him by the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. R. T. Reid), and then he had not given it with any great pleasure. The hon. Member for Hereford had acted throughout in a most unusual manner. It was a most extraordinary thing that while both the hon. Representatives of Hereford had expressed themselves as being most anxious that this inquiry should take place the Attorney General should refuse the Committee on the part of the Government. Of course, the hon. Member for Hereford, being a lawyer, did not know more of the matter than he wanted to know.

MR. R. T. REID rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Member was in Order in making imputations of this nature upon an hon. Member?

MR. SPEAKER: I hope that the debate will be conducted without the imputation of motives, and without personalities which are extremely painful.

MR. BIGGAR, in continuing, remarked that the state of political morality in Hereford must be a singular one, seeing that 10 of the leading Conservatives of that city had believed that one of the Representatives of the constituency could be induced to enter into a bargain to retire from his seat after a specified time. He could conceive an instance in which two candidates holding the same political views agreed to contest a borough, one being a man of wealth and the other being a man of ability, on the understanding that the wealthy man was to find the ready money and the able man was to do all the talking. The real question before the House was whether the two hon. Members for Hereford, who had declared themselves so anxious for this inquiry, were to be allowed to clear their characters, or were to be forced to rest under the grave imputations which the right hon. Gentleman had brought against them?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that when he left the House the senior hon. Member for Hereford had seconded the Motion, and the junior Member had supported it, the first merely stammering out, "I second this Motion." The impression on his mind then was that the inquiry was practically granted; but he understood since that the Attorney General, speaking on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, had flatly refused it. Such a course on the part of the Government threw considerable doubt upon the sincerity of the hon. Members implicated in this matter.

MR. PULLEY: I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, as to whether I violated any of the Rules of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: Had the hon. Member violated any of the Rules of the House I should have corrected him.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he would not go into that question; but what he wanted to point out was, that it was very difficult for those sitting on the Opposition side of the House, or any independent Member, to believe that the support given to the Motion by the hon. Members for Hereford could be sincere, on account of the extraordinary conduct pursued by the Government. What was to become of the reputation of the House of Commons if the Government—[A laugh.] He knew that the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds), and his protector, the Home Secretary, cared very little for the reputation of the House of Commons, and allowed its honour and character to be dragged into the dirt. ["Order, Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I hope the noble Lord will not introduce any fresh personalities into the discussion, which has been made painful by such personalities already.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, it was very difficult indeed to debate this question and keep absolutely clear of anything approaching to personalities. He was speaking of the honour of the House of Commons, when he was met with the jeers of the hon. Member for Stockton; and naturally his mind recurred to the extremely painful scene in which the hon. Member was engaged some time ago. He was asking what was to become of the reputation of the House of Commons if, in the course of one Session, Her Majesty's Government used their mechanical majority to prevent two inquiries that were demanded, one into a matter deeply affecting a Minister of the Crown, and the other into a matter affecting two Members of the Liberal Party. It was a great misfortune that the Front Opposition Bench was upon this occasion so tenantless. He did not know whether the election transactions connected with 1880 were matters about which they felt a little delicacy. Certainly, it was a most remarkable feature that when a question of great importance to the House of Commons was being discussed they should have taken themselves off. He did not think his right hon. Friend (Mr. Raikes) need be disappointed at the attitude of the Government. Nothing could be more favourable to the cause which they represented than the obstinate and, he believed, the interested refusal which the Attorney General had made in this matter to the cause which they on the Opposition side had advocated—namely, electoral purity; and they should lose no opportunity of drawing public attention to the corrupt and dark practices which placed the Liberal majority in power.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not intend to follow the noble Lord into the personalities in which he had indulged; but it was always a consolation to the Government to know that, whatever hard words he might apply to them, he always said much harder things about his friends. But the noble Lord, not having heard the Attorney General, did not appreciate the position of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman did not make a charge against the Members for Hereford; and it was all very well for them to say "the more inquiry the better;" but the Government had to consider, irrespective of the hon. Members, what ought to be the action of the House of Commons. It had been pointed out that it was not for the House to enter upon an inquiry, not with reference to its own Members, but with regard to persons over whom it had no control and no jurisdiction. Such an inquiry would place the House in an entirely false position; it would lend encouragement to proceedings which were much better fitted for the anonymous columns of a society newspaper than for the transactions of a deliberative Assembly. He had never heard of the Hereford Election before. He had listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes), and he was wondering the whole time when he was coming to any point which would justify the Motion he had made. To his infinite surprise, he sat down without even approaching anything that had any relation to it, or even of making out a prima facie case for inquiry by a Committee, and it was for that reason alone that the Government could not support the Motion.

MR. GORST said, that having had an intimate acquaintance with the proceedings of political parties at elections, he could not share the noble Lord's surprise at the absence of the Leader of the Opposition or at the conduct of the Government. No doubt there was no charge against the Members for Hereford; it was only incidentally and in a secondary degree that their conduct was brought in, and no doubt they would come out of the inquiry with clean hands. A gross scandal had been committed by the local wire-pullers, who did not act on their own responsibility, but were intimately associated with others, who kept carefully in the background in London, who kept within the limits of the law and were perfectly safe; and this was true of both Parties. If there were corrupt proceedings in a constituency, the House of Commons was justified in dragging them to light. In this case both Parties were involved. It was inconvenient that these things should be inquired into, and that was the reason the Front Opposition Bench was unoccupied, save by the right hon. Gentleman who had just come in (Mr. Solater-Booth), who was a county Member, and quite innocent in regard to what was done at borough elections. He was also equally certain that there were Gentlemen sitting on the Government Bench who would have imitated the example if they had dared, but being Members of the Government they had been obliged to be present and brazen it out. The course the Government had taken was deliberately to invite the House of Commons to stifle inquiry. The Government did not want the inquiry because they were afraid that matters would be brought to light which had long been kept secret, and which would be extremely inconvenient for some Members of their Party. A prima facie case was made out as to an abominably corrupt bargain made by wire-pullers on both sides for the purpose of securing the withdrawal of a Petition. The Home Secretary said that inquiry would be fruitless; but it was precisely because it would not be fruitless that he opposed it. He was certain, whatever the decision of the House might be, the country would believe that the leading Members of the Opposition went away because they did not dare to face the inquiry, and that the Government tried to stifle the discussion because they could not sustain an open investigation.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he thought the House had seldom witnessed such a spectacle as that which had just been presented by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). The hon. and learned Member had been the dispenser of the secrets of the Opposition side of the House. He knew what had been done so well, and he liked to dilate from time to time on all that had passed through his hands. He could not believe that the Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench were absent because they knew of infamous practices. He could hardly think that the hon. Member could have meant to charge a whole body of men with such improprieties, and he (Mr. Hopwood) should think that before morning came the hon. Member would be convinced of the imprudence of having made that statement and that attack. He thought the Attorney General had put this matter on its right footing; and as the right hon. Gentleman who brought forward this Motion had declined to aver that the two hon. Members for Hereford were mixed up with this transaction, he should vote against the Motion.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT said, he would be very loath to impute venality in election matters reflecting on either of the hon. Members for Hereford, with whom he was not acquainted, and against whom, consequently, he could have no personal grudge. Because that was so he took their part, and he should say for them, what he would say for himself, if charges of this kind were brought against him—"I am ready to meet them; if you persevere in your accusations, go on, and I will meet them." The hon. Members, it was true, might be entirely innocent of the grave charges brought against some of their constituents—persons supposed to be truthful. He did not know anything about them, or anything about Hereford, and he did not want to know; but it was rather suspicious that after the visit of Mr. Sydney Myers to the Conservative agent, a rouleau of £600 in bank-notes had been found lying on his table. Did anyone suppose that Mr. Myers, from philanthropic motives, had left there £600 of his own money? He only wished that he was acquainted with this gentleman, and that he would visit him in a similar way. He should like to be on the proposed Committee if it were only for the purpose of putting a few questions to this Mr. Myers. There had been a compact entered into by 20 reputed respectable men of the Liberal Party, and one of them wrote that they intended to act up to that compact. He appealed to the Treasury Bench, and especially to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham and President of the Board of Trade, whether Mr. Scobie, the Secretary of the Liberal Association and Official Receiver of the Court of Bankruptcy, just appointed to the latter office by the President of the Board of Trade, was not a respectable man, and, therefore, to be believed before a Committee of the House of Commons? This Mr. Scobie wrote that he intended to carry out a certain compact with the Conservative agent. Why, therefore, should the Government, by shirking a Committee, seek to prevent his examination? When imputations were brought against Members of that House who sat on the Ministerial side of the House—or, indeed, in any quarter of the Chamber—it was absolutely cruel on the part of the Government to shirk this inquiry, knowing that they were backed up by a large majority, and feeling that they were expert enough to use it. "The whirligig of time brings its own revenges." Last Session they had the Corrupt Practices (Elections) Bill of the Attorney General, who, that night, attacked the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes) for personalities, and threw his pure robe of protection around both Mr. Myers and Mr. Scobie, out of goodwill to the hon. Members for Hereford. He (Mr. Montagu Scott) would not follow the example of their pseudo-Friends, but should vote for the appointment of the proposed Committee.

MR. WARTON asked, on a point of Order, whether the senior Member for Hereford, having seconded the Motion, could not be compelled to be a Teller?

MR. SPEAKER said, that there was no such obligation on the hon. Member.

MR. TOMLINSON thought that the House would want some stronger authority than had been given for the doctrine that no Member of the House had a right to an inquiry unless a direct charge had been made against him.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 55: Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 82.)

Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MADAGASCAR.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT, in rising to call attention to recent events in Madagascar, said, that if he was obliged that night to intervene between the House and the consideration of other Business, which might be more interesting to some Members than the subject he was about to bring forward, the House would feel that it was no fault of his. On a previous occasion he was able, at a convenient time, to invite attention to that question, when it would have been disposed of but for the unusual and unfair action of the Government in depriving him of a House that had been made. His position in regard to the matter which he was now bringing under consideration might be summed up under these three heads—first, that a wanton and unprovoked attack had been made on a friendly and innocent State by the authorities of the French Republic; secondly, that the attack and the operations subsequent had inflicted very serious loss on British subjects and very grave injury on British commerce; and, thirdly, that those proceedings had been accompanied by grievous insults and affronts offered on the part of the French Commanders to British officials and British subjects. To those three he might add, as a fourth, that no satisfactory apology, and no reparation worthy of the name, had been made to this country for the insults offered to our flag and the losses and injuries inflicted on British subjects. He could not better describe the natural feelings of indignation and shame with which these facts affected those who were acquainted with them than in the language used by a Member of the Liberal Party. In September last, the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Macliver), speaking at Weston-super-Mare, said—

“We find France indulging in such a spirit in distant posts, where British commerce is overwhelming, and our influence almost unchecked, that it is impossible to say what the outcome may be. Certainly, the case of Mr. Shaw is not one that should be overlooked. Are we always to remain passive under insult and wrong? Has the fire gone out that once burned in Englishmen's breasts?”

The hon. Member then proceeded to recapitulate the main facts as to the French Admiral's treatment of Consul Pakenham, of Commander Johnstone, of Her Majesty's ship Dryad, of the officers of the British mail packet on its arrival at Tamatave, of Mr. Shaw, the English missionary, and other incidents connected with the French operations in Madagascar. He would not go into the details fully, because he had already referred to them on other occasions. He mentioned that a trade of £750,000 sterling had been destroyed by those operations, the loss thus produced having fallen almost entirely on British subjects, many of whom had been ruined. Besides a number of British merchants and Natives of Mauritius, a visitor to Madagascar stated that—

“At Mojanga, and along the Western Coast of the Island, are over 500 Chorah merchants from Bombay, regarding whose fate during the past six months their friends in India have learned little. Although British subjects, they have apparently been altogether abandoned by their Government.”

The Government had been inaccurate as well as secretive. In referring to those events on a former occasion, the Prime Minister informed the House that Commander Johnstone was in no respect acting in a civil capacity, and had no authority to do so; and yet, three weeks before that statement, the Foreign Office issued a letter to that officer formally thanking him for the part he had taken as Acting Vice Consul, and another letter appointing him as Vice Consul after Consul Pakenham's death; and the Prime Minister had also stated, on August 21, that he had no reason to believe “That Mr. Shaw had not free access to, and means of, providing himself with legal defence,” when despatches were in his possession proving that Mr. Shaw was a close prisoner, and not allowed to communicate with anyone. The hon. Member went on to complain that, in the Blue Book which had been presented by the Government, the despatches of Commander Johnstone, which stated the whole case against the French authorities, were wholly suppressed, together with the Memorandum that was sent by the British Cabinet to the French Government asking for reparation. He expressed his belief that if Her Majesty's Government had dared to present the despatches of Commander Johnstone to the House, they could not have remained on the Treasury Bench, the indignation of the country would have been roused so strongly against them on account of their pusillanimity in regard to those transactions. The Government, by the way in which it had prepared that Blue Book, had been guilty of a breach of faith with the House and the public. The only person who came with credit out of this painful and humiliating affair was Commander Johnstone, whose intrepid courage, firmness, and tact deserved the highest praise. He would quote a statement which appeared in

The Daily News on the 25th of last September—

"Captain Johnstone throughout behaved admirably, and did all that the rules of international courtesy permitted. Nothing could induce Admiral Pierre to grant Mrs. Shaw an interview with her husband, from whom she had been two years separated, and of whose probable fate, or even the charges on which he was detained, she was ignorant. Admiral Pierre, in his despatch to his Government, speaks of the pain of having had to harden his heart against a lady's entreaties. But he adopted an easy method of hardening his heart, for he would not even see her himself, and gave all his answers in writing and through his officers, keeping Mr. Shaw below, so as to prevent his being ever seen from the deck of the Dryad, or from the town by the aid of a glass."

The only fact upon which the Government could rely by way of defence was that Mr. Shaw obtained £1,000 from the French Government. The great majority of the English people, however, did not look upon that sum as adequate compensation for a man who was imprisoned unjustly, treated like one of the lower animals, and denied all access to his friends for two months. The craven conduct of the Government on the occasion to which he was referring would encourage foreign nations to go great lengths in future in their behaviour towards Englishmen. The insults to the British flag did not cease with the withdrawal of Admiral Pierre, and the movements of the British vessels had since been dogged by the French ships. A reliable witness, Captain Cameron, the Correspondent of The Standard, whose brilliant description of the recent Soudan campaign was so well known, had stated—

"From the officers of the Euryalus and Dragon we had confirmation, and more, of all that has appeared in the Home Press regarding the insulting attitude of the French Fleet towards the British vessels. On more than one occasion the latter were threatened with active hostilities. Both sides went to quarters; the respective crews stood by their guns, and thus faced each other, broadside to broadside. The Dryad and Dragon were, of course, greatly over-matched, and had arranged, should the French have opened fire, to slip their cables, and ram—the one the Flore, the other the Forfait—the two largest of the opposing ships. The insults did not cease with Admiral Pierre's departure. This wanton display of unfriendliness has been reported home."

With regard to the Island of Madagascar itself, it was worthy of remark that our trade with it amounted to £750,000 a-year, and was steadily increasing. In addition to this, it was very important to the Colony of Mauritius, which derived the greater part of its meat supply from the Island. Many of our fellow-subjects from Mauritius had made large investments of capital in Madagascar. As far as its physical features were concerned, it was one of the richest, as far as its soil was concerned, most fertile, and most promising countries in the world. The Correspondent of The Standard newspaper, who had visited that Island, drew a remarkable picture of its soil and products. He said—

"The virgin soil is rich and deep—on an average from 6 feet to 8 feet of the special loam required for the sugar-cane. The wealth of tropical growth displayed here cannot be matched all the world over, not even in the richest portions of India. The rivers are wide and navigable. Not only sugar, but tobacco, cloves, pepper, cinnamon, and all the spices can be grown in profusion. Palms of all the different species, magnificent groves of mango trees, the coffee, indigo, and bread-fruit plants are to be seen, while the slender and graceful bamboo tones down, with its delicate green, the more flaunting colours of the robust growths. There is no country in the world where live stock is so cheap as in Madagascar. Fine bullocks can be purchased for two or three dollars each. Cattle are cheap in Madagascar because there are no droughts, and the grazing grounds are practically inexhaustible. The indiarubber trade is rapidly increasing. But the sugar plantations are the most promising source of wealth."

Again, the same able observer, writing of the brisk trade between Madagascar and England, says—

"Forty-one British vessels cleared from this port (Tamatave) alone during the past year. The consumption of Lancashire cotton prints and fancy cloths is steadily increasing. Hardware goods come almost entirely from England."

The Malagasy people had largely adopted the Christian religion, and were far from being the barbarous race which some had described them. As a proof of the advance of the Malagasy people in civilization and Christianity, he would like to quote the evidence of a recent eyewitness who had visited the capital—

"Around us were numerous villages clustered on the hill slopes. There were no trees, only rolling veldt, like that peculiar to South Africa. But the villages were not mere collections of bamboo-built huts. Strong and substantially-built houses of brick they were, not lacking in pretensions to architectural design, and superior in comfort and appearance to those which many a villager in Britain and Ireland can boast of. And here, too, the townships had each its detached building, trim and neat, whose style and architecture at once indicated the other chapel.

There were, moreover, indications of missionary work in the land. As we passed through the streets we could hear the hum of children busy at their lessons, and singing sometimes the Morning Hymn, so well known in many an English school. There could be no question that, so far as outward appearances went, the people of Tonerina had reached a high level of civilization. It was difficult to imagine that this peaceful country, with its pretty cottages, its innumerable chapels, whose bells were then calling the people to worship, and its troops of white-robed men and women answering the summons, was the barbarous Madagascar of 20 years ago."

He would particularly commend these interesting descriptions to the attention of hon. Members opposite who were attached to the Nonconformist Bodies. This good work had mainly been done by Methodist missionaries, and it was confessedly against these Wesleyan converts that the aggression of French fanatics and Chauvinists was now aimed. He hoped the Government would not admit the claims of France to supremacy in the Island. He dared say the Government would meet him by the statement that they had done the best to defend British interests in Madagascar, and to promote the interests of the people of that Island. They would, probably, further say that any intervention on their part could only be satisfactorily carried out by active military operations, and by a display of force which might have involved them in a war with France. That might be their defence; but he would ask Ministers whether they had really done all in the power of a great country like England, with special interests and duties to maintain, to protect the people of Madagascar from unjust attack? He would ask them if they had made those distinct and emphatic remonstrances with the French Government which, at all events, in his humble opinion, they ought to have made? He would further ask them whether, at that moment, they stood in a dignified position with regard to France, or the other Powers of the world? Whether they were less likely to have further advantage taken of them, and less likely to be pushed further down the hill of insult and injury, than if they had taken a bold line at first? It was but too evident that the tame acquiescence of the Government in those grievous affronts had brought this country a great deal nearer to active hostility with regard to other Powers, and especially France. Such weakness must lead to still further insults and still more grievous affronts being offered to them. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] He would repeat that that was so, in spite of the indignant gestures of the Prime Minister. It was perfectly evident to the whole world that, so far from Her Majesty's Government being on satisfactory terms with the French Republic, for whom they had sacrificed so much, they had now drifted into such antagonism that even their own supporters in the Press warned them that they were drifting into war. The more they conceded, the more was demanded of them. They began by basing their policy on the French alliance; but they had given way to France point after point. He was not going to discuss those points, and he only referred to them as links in a chain of which this Madagascar question formed one. The British Cabinet allowed the French Government to deceive them in regard to Tunis, and they took pride in concealing the facts of the case from the House. In regard to the Commercial Treaty, they had also been cajoled by France, and they had allowed themselves to be dragged into a political and military intervention in Egypt, with the result which the country was now witnessing. The fatal and irretrievable position now occupied by Her Majesty's Government was the consequence of the Joint Note; and, at this moment, the one Power which was thwarting, embarrassing, and opposing us in every way in regard to the Egyptian Question was the French Government, for whom they had sacrificed so much. His opinion was, that if they had taken a firm stand at first with regard to Madagascar and other questions, so far from involving the country into war, they would have saved the people of Madagascar and their own credit. What course would Lord Palmerston have taken in a case like this? Lord Palmerston, having long been concerned in matters connected with the foreign policy of the country, was not approved of by the present Prime Minister. He would remind the Prime Minister that Lord Palmerston was regarded by the right hon. Gentleman as the Prince of Jingoism, and on more than one occasion the right hon. Gentleman had deprecated the foreign policy of that statesman.

MR. GLADSTONE: Is the hon. Member prepared to prove the charge he makes?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT admitted that he had not the statements of the right hon. Gentleman in his hand; but if the House would take it from him, he was perfectly prepared to prove, at the proper moment, that the Prime Minister, on more than one occasion, had deprecated the foreign policy of Lord Palmerston. The strained relations between himself and Lord Palmerston prior to the Crimean War were notorious. But Lord Palmerston, although he always firmly maintained the honour and power and dignity of the country, never involved England in a single great war; whereas the indecision and weakness of the right hon. Gentleman, and the Cabinet of which he was a prominent Member, had caused the country to drift into the Crimean War—

MR. GLADSTONE: And Lord Palmerston also.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No; Lord Palmerston was not a Member of the Cabinet at that time.

MR. GLADSTONE: Certainly; he was a Member.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, if he was wrong in that assertion, he regretted to have made it. He had forgotten for the moment that Lord Palmerston, after resigning his position in the Cabinet at the close of 1852, on account of differences with his Colleagues, and especially with the right hon. Gentleman, afterwards had been persuaded to return. This was, at any rate, the fact, that the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister was, at that time, a more prominent Member of the Cabinet than Lord Palmerston. ["No, no!"] If the Prime Minister objected to that statement he would withdraw it; but he was justified in assuming, in view of the recent policy of the Premier, that it was more likely that the present Prime Minister was the cause of the Crimean War—that was, of the weakness and vacillation which led the Government to drift into that war—rather than Lord Palmerston. He believed that a policy of firmness and resolution was the best preservative against war. He believed that the policy of Her Majesty's Government, in regard to Madagascar and in regard to other questions of difficulty into which England had been drawn, had, as was too apparent at the present time, drawn upon this country the contempt of other nations. He used the word with the greatest reluctance. If, however, they judged the opinion of other countries, as other countries judged the opinion of this country at this moment—namely, from the expressed views of the public Press—then, from the almost unanimous expressions of opinion on the part of the public Press of other countries, hon. Members on both sides of the House must be bound to admit that what he said was fully justified. He deeply regretted to find that the public Press of every nation on the Continent, at that moment, was crying shame on England and her present Ministry for the weakness and inconsistency of their policy. He knew that the Prime Minister said that the great majority of the Press upon the Continent were in the pay of the great financiers. That was a perfect myth. It was only the other day that the Prime Minister, while admitting the fact of this universal censure, said the reason why the Foreign Press was constantly condemning his policy was that the wires were pulled by the great financiers. No doubt, the great financiers of Europe possessed considerable power; but he absolutely denied that the financiers of Europe, or any other body of men, had power to form a combination against Her Majesty's Government that would extend from St. Petersburg to Rome and from Paris to Bucharest. In conclusion, he would apologize to the House for having taken up so much of its time.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the hon. Member who had just addressed the House (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had said, very truly, that there was on the Paper for consideration that evening some very important Business which hon. Members on his own side of the House were very anxious to reach, and, therefore, the hon. Member proposed to curtail the observations he would otherwise have addressed to the House. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) hoped the House would not consider him disrespectful if, animated with the same feeling, he were also to curtail the observations he would otherwise have made, because he knew the great interest which the other Business excited in the minds of many hon. Members on his own side of the House. The hon.

Gentleman began by complaining of the action of the Government the other night in regard to this question, and of the manner in which the debate he then attempted to raise had terminated. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) absolutely denied that there was any cause of complaint against Her Majesty's Government for the manner in which the debate terminated. It was only through him (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), personally, that the hon. Member was able to speak at all, or that there was a House. [MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No, no!] It was quite true that the House was formed; but, 20 minutes afterwards, it was not continued owing to the action of the Friends of the hon. Member himself, who left the House. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was in his place upon that Bench, and he was, at a critical moment, joined by his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke). He was glad to find that the hon. Member had not favoured the House with a repetition of the statements he had made during the winter.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: What statements?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: He referred to the statements of the hon. Member during the winter, in connection with the Pritchard affair. The account which, however, the hon. Member gave of the history of the Pritchard affair was only on a par with the statement he had made just now in regard to the formation of the Aberdeen Ministry. He hoped the House might not deduce from that fact that the hon. Member had altogether discontinued his historic researches.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: What were they?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If the hon. Member would only examine them, he would find that the statements he had made were altogether inaccurate, and he would also discover in the history of the different Governments who had ruled the country in the past that Lord Palmerston was a Member of the Government which began the Crimean War.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked what were the statements referred to by the noble Lord?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he referred to the statements of the hon. Member in regard to an Ultimatum, and to a large sum of money having been paid. Both statements were absolutely incorrect.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he rose to correct the statement of the noble Lord at once. He had never made any assertion, either in that House or elsewhere, in regard to an Ultimatum, or to a large sum of money having been paid. What he had said was that a demand for reparation was made by Sir Robert Peel, and that reparation was made fully, and without delay.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that that statement of the hon. Gentleman was inaccurate also, but not quite so inaccurate as the one he had read in the reports which appeared in the newspapers. The hon. Member had directed his observations to three points, which he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) would very briefly touch. He had spoken of the attack of the French on Madagascar, and said he hoped that, on behalf of the Government, no attempt would be made to justify that attack, or to support the claims of France upon Madagascar. Now, he was not concerned in any way to enter into the merits of that dispute. Her Majesty's Government naturally regretted that war should have been entered into between two friendly Powers, and the attitude which had necessarily been observed was one of strict and impartial neutrality. He was not called upon at that moment to enter into the nature and history of the Treaties put forward by the French Government as a justification of their attack. He would do no more than express a hope that the French Government and the Government of Madagascar would soon find some method of composing their differences; and he would repeat what was already in the Blue Books—that should an opportunity arise in which Her Majesty's Government could usefully offer their services for the arrangement of those differences, that opportunity should not be lost. Then the hon. Member proceeded to speak in detail of the incidents which happened nine months ago at Madagascar, and which occasioned a great deal of feeling at the moment both in that House and in the country. He was quite sure that the House would feel that there was a time for all things, and that it was not wise or desirable, when a quarrel had been happily arranged by the diplomatic skill of the French Ambassador and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to go back upon it now, and rake up the various incidents, and even to exaggerate those incidents, and run the risk of exciting ill-feeling, which it had been the object of Her Majesty's Government to allay. Perhaps the hon. Member would be glad that he should say so; but he believed it very possible that, if Parliament had been sitting while those delicate negotiations between Lord Granville and M. Waddington were going on, and if it had been in his power to come down to the House three or four times a-week, and ask the most irritating Questions about the progress of those negotiations, and to have pressed the Government to give inconvenient explanations which might have thwarted the progress of the negotiations, it was possible that the hon. Member might have succeeded in exciting such an amount of ill-feeling in France, as would have rendered the friendly settlement of the question impossible.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I did not do so.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the hon. Member had not done so because Parliament was not sitting; but, as far as the hon. Member could do so, he did it, in going all over the country giving an inaccurate account of the matter. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had no doubt that, if the hon. Member could have done so in that House, he would have availed himself of every opportunity of doing it. Fortunately, through no merit of his own, the hon. Member was not able to do so, because Parliament was not sitting at the time. The hon. Member had stated that there was no expression of regret on the part of the French Government of any kind about Mr. Shaw.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I did not state that.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he had taken down the words of the hon. Member, and he wished to call the attention of the House to the facts of the case. On page 61 of the Blue Book, in a despatch of M. Challemlacour to M. Waddington, written to be communicated to Earl Granville, there was a passage in which it was said that, whatever the facts might have been, it was certain that an innocent man, who was the subject of a Foreign Power, had been deprived of his liberty and unjustifiably detained under painful circumstances. The despatch went on to say that the Government had therefore decided to offer a sum of 25,000 francs, as an evidence of their wish to lighten the consequences to Mr. Shaw. The despatch added that Her Majesty's Government would see, in this decision, a proof of the motives by which the French Government were animated; and he hoped they would be animated by the same spirit in securing the settlement of the difficulty. For a great nation like France frankly to come forward and state that the conduct of her Agents was not justified—for that was the phrase—was an expression of regret; and would it have been desirable, or wise, or just, or dignified on the part of Her Majesty's Government to have insisted upon the use of stronger terms, when the negotiations on both sides were being conducted in a friendly and conciliatory spirit, having due regard to the mutual dignity of both countries? That was the reason why the negotiations had been successful.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Very successful indeed!

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the hon. Member had also dwelt on the insult to Consul Pakenham; but he had carefully avoided referring to the facts which were not known to the House when the question was raised last year. Now, on page 61 of the Blue Book, in a despatch of October 29th, 1883, from Lord Granville to M. Waddington, Lord Granville said that Her Majesty's Government had no desire, after the communications received from the French Government, to dwell upon the events which had occurred; and he added that he had great pleasure in receiving a letter, which he annexed, from the French Ambassador, in reference to Consul Pakenham, which showed that Admiral Pierre would not have carried out the order for the Consul's expulsion. That was most satisfactory, because the course taken by Admiral Pierre was said at the time to be unjustifiable. He desired to speak in terms of respect of Admiral Pierre as a gallant sailor, who, having served his country well in many ways, was now dead. But as to the orders given in regard to Consul Pakenham, those orders were felt to be unjustifiable, and the French Government had made that acknowledgment. He was glad to find, although at the last moment, that that fact had been recognized—that, considering the painful circumstances in which Consul Pakenham, a dying man, was placed, the orders of the Admiral would not have been carried out. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was also glad to have that opportunity of paying a tribute of respect to the memory of Consul Pakenham, who had served Her Majesty's Government faithfully for many years, who was a man of great knowledge, intimately acquainted with the Island of Madagascar, in which he had long lived, and who was so much respected by all the inhabitants, French as well as English. Consul Pakenham was viewed with the highest respect, not only by the French Colony, but by traders and naval men who had occasion to visit the Colony from time to time; and there could be nothing more distasteful to the French in that part of the world than that any disrespect should be shown towards Consul Pakenham himself. The hon. Member had also dwelt upon the alleged insult to Commander Johnstone, and to the order he was supposed to have received to send the mails on board the French steamer, before placing them on board the packet. It was, no doubt, true that Captain Hay believed he was speaking accurately when he told Commander Johnstone that such an order had been issued; but it was quite evident that Captain Hay, although he believed that such an order had been issued, had misunderstood what the order was. The order was intended to apply to private letters going in by the ship of which Commander Johnstone was himself the captain; but there was no intention whatever on the part of the French Commander to extend the order for his examination to the official mail bags of the Government going out in Commander Johnstone's own ship. He would not enter more fully into this matter, because he felt quite sure that the common sense of the House and of the country would not sanction an attempt to go into the past and rake up all these old matters which had been settled some time ago, and settled with the happy result of re-establishing a good and friendly feeling between England and France. The hon. Member had also touched upon the trade of Madagascar. He congratulated the hon. Member upon not having used the figure of £2,000,000 in relation to the trade of that country, which he had so frequently used on other occasions. As a matter of fact, the hon. Member had always hitherto used the figure of £2,000,000 in regard to that and several other subjects. The trade between England and Madagascar, and between this country and various other parts of the world, was always estimated by the hon. Member at £2,000,000. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Never.] Now, he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) believed that the trade of England was constantly increasing in all parts of the world; but he protested against the attempt of the hon. Member to introduce in regard to Madagascar the £2,000,000 which weighed so greatly upon his mind, and was as difficult to keep out of it as the head of King Charles, in the famous Memorial of Mr. Dick, mentioned by Mr. Dickens in David Copperfield. The hon. Member said the trade of Madagascar had been very much affected by the cowardly conduct of Her Majesty's Government. Of, course, when war was going on, trade necessarily suffered. The hon. Member chose to say that it was owing to the action of the Government, although he made no attempt to prove it; and he also chose to say that the devastation which had occurred in the Island, and of which he said there appeared a faithful account in The Times, was the work of the French. Now, there was no proof of that at all. Some parts of the Island of Madagascar had been deserted, and it was much more likely, in such a case, that the Natives had gone down into the interior and devastated the rich plantations. So far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned, they could have but one wish. The Island of Madagascar had excited much interest in this country, on account of the progress the inhabitants had made in Christianity and civilization. They would only be too glad to see the people of Madagascar restored to the position they occupied a short time ago, and they fully hoped and believed that the magnanimity of the French Government would arouse itself, and that they would feel they were dealing with an important and interesting community—a community in no sense a savage community, but enjoying, to a large extent, the advantages of civilization and Christianity. If any opportunity occurred such as occurred about a year ago, when, unfortunately, they were refused, that would enable Her Majesty's Government to use their friendly offices in order to bring about that condition of things which all desired to see restored, the House and the country might rest assured that the opportunity would not be lost.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he wished to correct two statements which the noble Lord had made with regard to himself. ["Oh, oh!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member desire to make a personal explanation?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT replied in the affirmative. He had never used any other figure in regard to the trade of Madagascar than £750,000. Nor had he said, in his speech, that no apology was made by the French Government in connection with the case of Mr. Shaw. His words were that no apology was offered for the insults of the Commanders and others, except in the case of Mr. Shaw.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 55: Majority 52.—(Div. List, No. 82.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

BILL [Lords].—[BILL 120.]

(Mr. Dodson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 29th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 3, as amended, stand part of the Bill."—(Mr. Dodson.)

Mr. KENNY said, that an objection had been raised to the clause, on the ground that it did not sufficiently define the powers of the President of the Council. It gave the Privy Council certain powers, and said that the Privy Council might, if they thought fit, exercise them. Now, the Committee knew very well that when powers were given to the Privy Council, and it was left to their discretion to exercise them or not, the Privy Council, as a rule, did not exercise them. This clause would apply to the importation of three-fourths of the cattle which came into this country from other countries, although the other portion might be prohibited. It would mainly affect store cattle brought from the different States of the American Union to England, and it had been already explained that the cattle of all the States bordering on the Atlantic, so far as America was concerned, were practically affected with disease. That being so, it was not sufficiently clear that the disease might not be imported into England, and sent to Ireland and other countries, in consequence of importing diseased cattle from the Western States. He did not wish to protest against the clause at any length, and he had no doubt that it would be carried; but, at the same time, he begged to give Notice that on the Report he intended to move, in line 1, page 2, that the word "may" be expunged, and the words "shall in certain respects" be substituted.

MR. BIGGAR said, he entertained a strong objection to the clause, and he thought if the Bill was to be passed at all this clause should be omitted from it. If the Privy Council were to be allowed to admit store cattle, he thought it would be altogether impossible to obtain adequate information as to the state of disease in the countries from which cattle were allowed to be exported. At any rate, he thought it would be difficult to obtain information of a thoroughly reliable nature. They had an illustration of that the other day, with regard to a cargo of cattle from Canada. The cattle were really diseased when landed; they were kept for a few days in a field; and four or five days afterwards, a very large number of them were found to be suffering from foot-and-mouth disease. He thought it was undesirable to allow cattle, purchased for store purposes, to be brought into the country at all, except when they came from localities that were wholly free from disease.

MR. CLARE READ said, he might be allowed to express a hope that his hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Duckham) and hon. Members from Ireland would allow this clause to stand part of the Bill. For his own part, he would prefer to see it expunged altogether rather than introduced into the Bill, because he believed that it might have a somewhat dangerous effect. But, on the other hand, he did not believe that any large amount of store stock would come into the country if they were subjected to a lengthened quarantine. It was just within the bounds of possibility that some of the best shorthorns would come from the healthy States of America; and his hon. Friend the Member for the County of Hereford might desire to have some breeding animals from those regions. He would, therefore, not oppose the clause.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 6, inclusive, severally agreed to.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he rose to move the insertion of the following new clause:—

(Slaughter of animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease.)

"When, at any time after the lapse of a period of sixty days, during which no case of foot-and-mouth disease has been reported to the Privy Council (of which the Privy Council shall give due notice), every local authority shall slaughter all animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease whenever the disease appears within its district, and, if the local authority thinks fit, also animals which have been in contact with others affected with foot-and-mouth disease. The compensation for animals slaughtered shall be as follows:—(a.) Where the animal slaughtered was affected with foot-and-mouth disease, the compensation shall be four-fifths of its value immediately before it became affected, but so that the compensation do not in any such case exceed thirty pounds; (b.) In every other case the compensation shall be the value of the animal immediately before it was slaughtered, but so that the compensation do not in any case exceed forty pounds."

His object was to prevent the spread of disease. Judging from the action of the majority of the House, it might be supposed that the existence of disease in this country was dependent on its continued introduction from abroad. Such, however, was not the fact. Foot-and-mouth disease was, no doubt, originally imported from abroad; but it travelled very rapidly over the country, and had existed for the last three years, although it could not be said that any disease had been imported in the last 12 months. It, therefore, seemed to him that they ought to adopt some more stringent measure than now existed for the extermination of the disease now prevalent in the country. His own opinion was, that it was quite as important to do that as to make more stringent regulations to prevent the introduction of disease from abroad. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, when he proposed to deal with the disease which still remained in the country, and whether no more stringent measures were to be taken than those which had existed during the last three years? If nothing were done, there was every reason to apprehend that disease would continue in the country, and that it would extend from time to time, and overrun the country. In that view, an attempt to frame regulations for the extermination of disease in the country was even more important than more stringent measures against the introduction of disease from abroad. The regulations of the Privy Council during the last 12 months had been very effectual, and they could not hope for greater security against the importation of disease from abroad than had been enjoyed during that period. But the policy which, it seemed to him, ought to be adopted with foot-and-mouth disease, in the case of a new outbreak, was the immediate slaughter of all animals found affected. The Returns which had been lately laid before the House showed that, on the average, every outbreak of disease affected about 10 animals; and, therefore, a provision of this kind would only involve, in the event of an outbreak, the slaughter of about 10 animals, at a cost of about £50. There was no doubt whatever that, if the animals affected were dealt with the moment disease was manifested, it would be far more economical, and give farmers much greater security and freedom in dealing with their cattle, and in a very short time they would hear very little of foot-and-mouth disease. Under the present system, disease was allowed to spread throughout the country, and then, when it was generally prevalent, regulations of a general character were issued, and proved of comparatively little use. The policy to be adopted, according to his view, was to deal very stringently with the district in which the disease broke out by slaughtering the animals affected, and taking care not to allow the affected area to spread. That policy had been carried out in Scotland with the best results; and although disease had frequently been introduced into Scotland, care had been taken that it should not be allowed to extend. This was due in a great measure to the action of the local authorities; and he could not help thinking that if the same energetic measures had been taken elsewhere, similar beneficial results would have followed. A great deal of energy had been expended in urging the prohibition of the importation of foreign cattle; but the effect would be to give farmers throughout the country a false security. He was afraid that the same feeling of false security would be engendered by the passing of the present Bill. He was strongly of opinion that the best interests of the farmers would be consulted, and the healthiness of the cattle secured, not only by slaughtering diseased animals at the port of debarkation, but by slaughtering them throughout the country. At the present moment it was estimated that there were some 500 diseased animals in England, and these were so many centres for the dissemination of disease. Surely, there was far greater risk of disease being spread from those 500 centres than there could be by the importation of animals under stringent regulations at the port of debarkation. With a view of testing the feeling of the House upon the question, he had placed upon the Paper a new clause, which he now begged to move. His object in moving it was to give the Privy Council power to take energetic measures, and to urge upon local authorities the expediency and necessity of stamping out the disease when it existed within narrow limits. He believed this would be by far the most economical course, and would free the trade from the stringent regulations which the existence of disease necessitated. He begged to move the clause which stood on the Paper in his name.

Clause (Slaughter of animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease).—(Mr. J. W. Barclay.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

Mr. DODSON said, it was necessary that he should say a word or two in regard to the clause proposed by his hon.

Mr. J. W. Barclay

Friend the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay). He hoped his hon. Friend would not think him wanting in courtesy if he refrained from following him into his arguments upon the subject. He desired simply to point out that, under the Act as it stood, the Privy Council had power to order slaughter and compensation in the case of foot-and-mouth disease, and they had lately passed an Order by which the local authorities themselves might, on application, obtain power to slaughter and to compensate. He did not wish to say more upon the subject than that he fully recognized the efficient manner in which many of the counties in England, and most of the counties in Scotland, although not all of them, had exercised the powers entrusted to them by the isolation of disease and by strictly carrying out regulations for keeping down foot-and-mouth disease, and, in some cases, by slaughter. But what he wished to call the attention of his hon. Friend to was this. This was a Bill which dealt with foreign cattle only, and he thought it would be very unfortunate if they should open any door which would raise the vexed question of the laws and regulations affecting cattle at home. Such a step would give rise at once to great difference of opinion; and if they were to embark in such a discussion, he really did not know when they would get out of it. Therefore, with no want of respect towards his hon. Friend, he did not propose to follow his argument in favour of the clause; but he ventured to appeal to him not to press it, or the other clauses of which he had given Notice dealing with domestic regulations.

Mr. KENNY said, he should like to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in reference to the recent Order of the Privy Council.

Mr. DODSON said, they had not yet come to that matter. The present Bill did not apply to domestic regulations, but simply to the importation of foreign animals. When they reached the Amendment of the hon. Member, he should be prepared to accept it.

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to say that the Privy Council had, at present, power to order the slaughter of animals suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, and to compensate the owners. If the right hon. Gentleman would tell the Committee that the Privy Council had the courage of their opinions, and would order the slaughter of diseased animals when the disease got within narrow limits, he should be quite satisfied. But he certainly thought they ought to have some authoritative declaration from the Head of the Agricultural Department as to what was to be the policy of the Privy Council in respect of animals suffering from disease. If the Privy Council would only come to some resolution as to what was the most economical course to adopt, and would give a definite Order, instead of vesting a discretionary power in the local authorities, he thought they would arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulties which now surrounded the question. He believed that if disease was allowed to go on smouldering in various districts in England, there would be every reason to fear that it would again break out and extend its ravages. According to his view, there was quite as much necessity for improving the internal regulations as there was for dealing with foreign importation; and he thought if the Privy Council had imposed regulations in a more stringent manner than they had done, they would not have had all this trouble and difficulty with regard to the importation of foreign animals.

DR. FARQUHARSON said, he thought that it was quite impossible to stamp out this disease simply by the prohibition of importation, because the disease had now become thoroughly established in this country, and was endemic. ["No, no!"] There was abundant evidence to show that it was quite possible for the disease to spring up spontaneously in their midst. ["No, no!"] It was, therefore, requisite to have this power of slaughter, as it was impossible to stamp out the disease by regulations imposed from time to time.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had exercised a wise discretion, under the circumstances of the case, and for the reasons he had stated, in appealing to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. J. W. Barclay) not to press his Amendment on that occasion. At the same time, he (Mr. Chaplin) thought the hon. Member was perfectly justified, and more than justified, in the appeal he had made to the right hon. Gentleman, as the Head of the Agricultural Department, to exercise more energy in future in using the powers of slaughter which the Privy Council possessed when foot-and-mouth disease was reduced to narrow limits throughout the country, or whenever it might break out in any particular district. He (Mr. Chaplin) himself had frequently advocated this method of dealing with foot-and-mouth disease when it broke out; but he would not, under any circumstances, have supported the clause of the hon. Member in its present form, because, although it proposed that compensation should be given, yet that compensation was, in all cases, limited to such a comparatively small sum, that he need hardly point out to the Committee, in the case of a valuable herd of short-horns, if the clause were to be enforced, the loss inflicted upon owners would be ruinous. Under the circumstances, he hoped the hon. Member would accede to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, with the understanding that, in future, the Privy Council would exercise their powers in regard to slaughter more stringently than they had hitherto done.

MR. DUCKHAM said, he was surprised at the remarks which had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay). His hon. Friend appeared to forget altogether that Scotland had hitherto been an isolated country. His hon. Friend took great credit to Scotland for stamping out disease; but he (Mr. Duckham) would tell his hon. Friend that if Scotland had been as open to disease as England, the farmers of that country would have suffered quite as severely as the English farmers had done. The herds of England had been open to infection from Ireland, Scotland, and foreign countries; but not so Scotland. His hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) seemed to consider that the disease had become acclimatized, and that it sprung up spontaneously. That was altogether contrary to the facts of the case. Every day's experience had proved that that was not so. For three years Ireland had been free from disease. Ireland had suffered for many years from it; but it had been altogether free until the disease was taken over there last year. Scotland had been free for four years, and remained free until the disease was taken over last February 12 months. His (Mr. Duckham's) own county had been free for six years, with the exception of a few traceable outbreaks, and yet no county had suffered more than it had done formerly. Every time the disease was introduced the herds were isolated, a strict cordon established, and the disease had not spread. In other counties in England it had been dealt with in the same manner; and it was monstrous to endeavour to persuade the House, and to send it forth to the world, that foot-and-mouth disease sprung spontaneously from the soil of this country. Such an assertion was not borne out by the facts of the case. As regarded slaughter, it might be very well for the hon. Member, who had possibly nothing more on his farm than animals of the ordinary market value; but when they came to deal with valuable animals for breeding purposes, such as the shorthorns alluded to by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), or as in his (Mr. Duckham's) county, Herefordshire, when there were many farmers who had any valuable herds of Herefords who would strongly object to the slaughter of their herds. It was, therefore, necessary that there should be a discretionary power in the hands of the Privy Council. He quite agreed with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that it would be better to confine the present Bill to the importation of foreign animals, and let them have improved regulations, if necessary, for their internal arrangements quite independent of the present Bill.

Mr. CLARE READ said, he was very glad, indeed, to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster say that the Privy Council had ample powers for stamping out the disease if it should be again imported. He did trust that, if they succeeded in getting rid of the present long-continued outbreak, and the country became entirely freed from disease, if from any accident, after the passing of this Bill, it should be again introduced, the Privy Council would exercise their powers of slaughter with more promptitude than they did in 1880.

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY said, he had only a word or two to say in reference to the statement of his hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Duckham). His hon. Friend seemed to think that the action of the local authorities had very little effect in preventing the spread of disease. Now, there had been in Forfarshire 80 outbreaks during the last eight or nine months, but, thanks to the local authority, the disease had not spread; and if local authorities had dealt with outbreaks as energetically as the local authority of Forfarshire had, he thought they would have been equally successful. He would remind his hon. Friend that valuable breeding animals were not exclusively owned by English farmers. There was, proportionately, a larger breeding stock in Scotland. He had made this appeal to the House on behalf of the purchasers of store cattle, who, at the present time, were put to very great straits to procure feeding stock.

Question put, and negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if the hon. Member (Mr. J. W. Barclay) proposed to proceed with the other clauses which stood in his name upon the Paper?

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY, in rising to move the following new clause:—

Local authorities in counties in England.

(Alteration of the local authority for counties in England.)

"So much of the Second Schedule of 'The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878,' as defines the local authorities in counties, except within the Metropolis, is hereby repealed, and, instead thereof, the persons appointed by this section shall be such local authority.

"(1.) The justices of the peace in every county shall meet and nominate not fewer than four, or more than fifteen, of their number to act on the county board for the purposes of this Act, and shall intimate to the lord lieutenant of the county and the chairman of quarter sessions the number and names of the persons so appointed.

"(2.) The clerk of the peace in each county shall call a meeting of the occupiers of agricultural subjects in the county valued in the valuation roll in force for the time at one hundred pounds and upwards. The meeting shall be called by advertisement in one or more newspapers circulating in the county for the same day as, or for a day not later than eight days after, the meeting of the justices. The advertisement shall specify the time and place of such meeting, and the clerk of the peace shall be clerk to such meeting. The meeting shall nominate from among such occupiers a number of persons equal to those nominated by the justice of the peace, and the meeting shall also name a convener, who shall intimate the names of the persons so nominated to the chairman of quarter sessions, and shall have power to call similar meetings by such advertisement when occasion shall require. In the event of such election not being intimated to the chairman of quarter sessions within fifteen days from the date of such meeting, it shall be lawful to the lord lieutenant to nominate from among such occupiers such number of persons, and intimate the same to the chairman of quarter sessions.

"(3.) A local authority may, if they think fit, determine that a certain number of their members, not exceeding one-third thereof, shall retire periodically, at intervals of not less than three years, the members so retiring being re-eligible; and the local authority may lay down such rules as they think fit to regulate the time and manner of such retirement.

"(4.) Vacancies from time to time happening by retirement, death, resignation, or otherwise, among the members of the local authority shall be filled up by the authority, and in the manner by and in which the members vacating office were respectively nominated.

"(5.) The persons nominated as in this section provided, and the lord lieutenant of the county, and the chairman of quarter sessions, for the time being shall constitute the local authority.

"(6.) As far as not otherwise provided by this Act, such local authority shall have all the powers conferred on the local authority by this Act, and shall have power to elect a chairman, specify a quorum, and make all regulations necessary for carrying the purposes of this Act into effect.

"(7.) The chairman of the local authority, and in default of him the chairman of quarter sessions, and in default of him any three members of the local authority, may at any time call a meeting of the local authority to be held at such time and place as he or they may fix, and the local authority may adjourn as they from time to time think fit," said, it was adapted from the constitution of the local authorities in Scotland, who had so successfully dealt with cattle disease. The same success had attended the action of the local authority in some of the counties in England; but there were some counties in which the same result had not been obtained, through the same energetic steps not having been taken. He believed the clauses he had put down in connection with this subject were adapted to the situation in England; and he was prepared to move them, in the hope that they would receive the support of those hon. Gentlemen who were supposed to represent the English farmers in that House. He begged to move the insertion of the clause.

Clause (Alteration of the local authority for counties in England).—(Mr. J. W. Barclay,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

Mr. DODSON said, he could not agree to the introduction of the clause into the Bill. The system described by the hon. Member (Mr. J. W. Barclay), although, no doubt, admirably adapted to the situation in Scotland, was not adapted to the circumstances of the English counties. Moreover, some of the powers proposed in the clause were already existent.

MR. HASTINGS said, he must enter his protest against this attempt to sweep away the local authorities in English counties. It seemed to be thought that there were no representatives of the tenant farmers on the present Local Board; but he (Mr. Hastings) was in a position to give that the most complete contradiction. He was himself Chairman of one Board, one-half of which was composed of tenant farmers; they were nominated by the Council of the Chamber of Agriculture, and were both interested in and acquainted with the breeding of stock. He knew the case was the same in Herefordshire, and, he believed, in Norfolk; and he thought his hon. Friend near him, who could speak with some authority on the point, would agree that the occupiers were in a majority, and that they were elected by the Board of Guardians throughout the country. He was, therefore, at a loss to understand what could be the meaning of the insinuation that the tenant farmers were entirely unrepresented. He gave every credit to the Scotch authorities for the admirable way in which they had administered the law, although he was bound to say that hon. Gentlemen from Scotland would do much better by attending to Scotch Business, than by endeavouring to administer English affairs.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, he wished to point out, in justice to the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay), that the hon. Gentleman, in matters of this kind, knew as much or more of what were the practices in some English counties than the hon. Member who had just spoken. In many counties, especially in the North of England, Magistrates kept entirely in their own hands the administration of the Acts, much to the dissatisfaction of the farmers. It was in consequence of representations made to him by influential farmers, that his hon. Friend had been induced to place these Amendments on the Paper.

MR. DUCKHAM said, he thought it very desirable that a change should take place in the constitution of local authorities, a very small proportion of whom took any interest in agricultural affairs. In his opinion, the local authorities for boroughs should act, in this matter, in consonance with the county local authorities. In proof of the necessity for that assimilation, he would mention that, a short time ago, the local authority of his county refused to grant a licence for some cattle to be brought into the county from Lancashire. The person concerned then went to the Town Clerk of the City of Hereford, who, not knowing that the county authority had refused the application, gave him the licence, which was signed by the Mayor and another magistrate. The consequence was, that a lot of diseased calves were brought into the county, and about 90 animals became infected. That he considered to be a strong argument in favour of such a clause as that proposed by the hon. Member for Forfarshire.

MR. SEXTON said, he had no interest in the question as between England and Scotland; but, as an Irish Member, he protested against the venomous attack made by the hon. Member for East Worcestershire (Mr. Hastings) upon the hon. Member who had moved the second reading of the clause before the Committee (Mr. J. W. Barclay). That hon. Member was condemned, because, being a Scotchman, he had brought forward an Amendment with the object of benefiting Englishmen—a strange comment upon the principle laid down to Members on that side of the House, that this was an United Kingdom, and that England, Scotland, and Ireland were mutually concerned with the welfare of the Three Kingdoms. The action of the hon. Member for Forfarshire had, in his opinion, been fully justified in the few remarks of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. James Howard). It appeared to him that, in some counties in England, the affairs of the localities were conducted entirely by the magistrates, and that the farmers had no representation whatever; and he held that the control of the affairs of the farmers by a body of persons nominated by the Crown was a state of affairs grievous in itself, and which ought not to be allowed to continue. The hon. Member for Forfarshire had, as a Scotchman, in his opinion, as good a right to interfere in English affairs as Englishmen had to interfere in the affairs of Ireland; and if he went to a Division, he should be glad to vote with him.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he had been asked by a number of English farmers to bring the subject before the Committee, and, having done so, he begged to withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, in moving the insertion of the following clause:—

Joint Committees of local authorities.
(Local Authorities may unite.)

"Two or more local authorities may agree to appoint a joint committee or joint committees, and the provisions of the Sixth Schedule of 'The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878,' shall have effect with respect to such joint committee or joint committees," said, he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to accept the clause. It would be found that a great many complaints were made with regard to conflicting orders and regulations of local authorities within a small area, and it was thought desirable that those regulations should be consolidated. There were, no doubt, difficulties in the way of consolidating local authorities in this Bill; but he thought that, if powers were given for local authorities to agree, it would be of great advantage. There were cases where two or three counties might combine and allow cattle within their combined area to be moved without any restriction whatever; and it was proposed by his clause, to allow the appointment of a joint committee, which could frame regulations for the combined district. He begged to move the insertion of the clause.

Clause (Local authorities may unite),
—(Mr. J. W. Barclay,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this Clause be read a second time."

MR. DODSON said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member that, in many cases, it would be of great advantage if the regulations of the local authorities could be consolidated; but the question was a large one, and it would require much consideration before it could be dealt with. Under the circumstances, he was unable to accept the clause of his hon. Friend.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved the insertion of the following clause:—

(Additional power to Privy Council.)

“In addition to the powers conferred on the Privy Council by ‘The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878,’ the Privy Council may make such orders as they think fit for prohibiting the conveyance of animals, by any vessel, to or from any port in the United Kingdom, for such time as they may consider expedient.”

Clause (Additional power to Privy Council,)—(Mr. J. W. Barclay,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. DODSON said, he was prepared to accept the clause.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he could not help expressing surprise that the clause should be accepted by the Government; because he had distinctly understood that the operation of the Act would be limited to foreign cattle. He objected to the substitution of a hard-and-fast rule for those Orders in Council, under which they had the initiative power of stopping cattle coming from Ireland, when there was reason to believe they were in a diseased state. Without wishing to put any blame on the Privy Council, he was bound to say that they could not be got to work quick enough to answer the end desired, so far as his part of the country was concerned. When a district of Ireland was infected with disease some days elapsed before they heard of it, and further time was necessary to ascertain the truth, and then some weeks passed before an Order stopping the transit of cattle from Ireland could be put in force, by which time the whole of the North of England might be influenced by the disease. As early as last November the Privy Council, acting under very strong pressure, put upon them by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who had, no doubt, a strong pressure put upon him, issued a letter to the local authorities, the object of which was nothing else than to urge upon them to withdraw their restrictions. The letter was taken into consideration, the authorities in the County of Northumberland gave way, and accepted some cattle which had passed through places where there was disease, and three weeks afterwards they received a letter from the Privy Council to say that they had acted contrary to their instructions. The truth was that in the part of England which he had the honour to represent they were more desirous of keeping their cattle free from disease than they were to have Irish cattle brought in. At present they were working harmoniously with the Irish authorities. It was shown that the ports of Belfast, Londonderry, and Dublin were in a most satisfactory condition, and that every effort was made there to carry out the Act; but they found, notwithstanding that, unless they exercised their own supervision, they were not safe from disease. Under the circumstances, he was opposed to the clause of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay).

MR. KENNY said, he failed to perceive the relevancy of the remarks of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Percy Wyndham) to the clause before the Committee. As he (Mr. Kenny) understood the clause, it proposed to give power to the Privy Council to put certain ships in quarantine, the effect of which would be to prevent healthy cattle from abroad becoming infected with foot-and-mouth disease on board ship. It was well known that animals which, when embarked, were in a perfectly healthy condition, had been found to be diseased on disembarkation. There were strong reasons for this power being given to the Privy Council, the disease being of a very insidious character, and the process of infection being but imperfectly understood. It had been stated, at the Chicago Convention, that on two occasions foot-and-mouth disease had been imported into America by cattle which had contracted the disease on board ship. It was also said that cattle brought from Ireland, and landed at Bristol, were infected with foot-and-mouth disease; but there was evidence to prove that at the time these cattle left Ireland they were sound, so that it was obvious that bad, insanitary vessels were used for the conveyance of animals from Ireland. The Amendment in the name of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway County (Colonel Nolan) had for its object the complete and thorough disinfection of these vessels in order, in the first place, to save the Irish cattle raisers from the imputation of sending over diseased animals to England, and, at the same time, to save English farmers from the consequences of receiving infected cattle.

He failed to see that the objection of the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. P. Wyndham) was a real objection to the clause; and he should like to see the clause of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway accepted in place of the one under notice, because it appeared to him (Mr. Kenny) to make the matter more plain. The clause in the name of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) was not correctly worded, and he would point out the exception he took to it. In the first place, the hon. Member's clause said that the Privy Council might make such Orders as they thought fit for prohibiting the conveyance by any vessel, to or from any port in the United Kingdom, for such time as they might consider expedient. He (Mr. Kenny) thought the time should be defined, in such a manner, for instance, as was proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway—namely, that the limit should be three months. The hon. Member for Forfarshire, moreover, did not make it clear that this clause referred more to animals than to vessels—there was a doubt as to whether its main application was to vessels or animals; therefore, it would be advisable to recast the clause, for the purpose of making it more clear. Then, as to the definition of the "Privy Council," he would like to know whether it would mean the Privy Council in Ireland, as well as in England, or only the English Privy Council? If the clause were rendered more clear in these respects, he should give it a very warm support.

MR. DODSON said, that the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Kenny) correctly comprehended the clause, as he (Mr. Dodson) understood it. The clause would give power to the Privy Council which it did not at present possess, power to order a ship to suspend the conveyance of animals, in order to secure freedom from infection. Incidentally, this clause embraced all the ground covered by the clause of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). It was in the power of the Privy Council to suspend the conveyance of animals by any vessel in any part of the United Kingdom. The clause would apply to the Irish Privy Council under the 5th section of the Bill, which rendered the measure applicable, mutatis mutandis, to Ireland.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, there was one single word required in the clause to make its meaning absolutely clear. It should run, "prohibiting the conveyance of animals by any specified vessel." If that word "specified" were put in, it would have the effect of making clear the intention of the clause, and of preventing the possibility of any dispute as to the phraseology. He begged to move the insertion of the word "specified."

Amendment proposed, in line 3, after the word "any," to insert the word "specified."—(Mr. R. H. Paget.)

Question, "That the word 'specified' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, be read a second time," put, and agreed to.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS, who had given Notice to move the insertion of the following Clause:—

(Act not to apply to Deptford Market.)

"This Act shall not apply to Deptford Cattle Market, or to the importation of cattle thereto," said, he did not intend to take up the time of the Committee for more than a few minutes; but he wished to say that when he put the Notice on the Paper the measure was essentially a prohibitive one. Now, however, owing to the modifications which had been introduced by the Government, the necessity for his moving the clause had been obviated. The constituency he represented was interested in the largest cattle market in the country, where every possible precaution was taken to prevent importation and spread of cattle disease. Probably, hon. Members were not aware of the enormous extent of the importations into Deptford Market. statistics with which he had been furnished, it appeared that from July, to December of the same year, 46 animals had been imported there, of these the only animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease were eight. From January to April, 1884, 24 animals had been imported, not one of which was infected with the disease, that out of a total of 648,900 brought into Deptford from June, 1883, to April, 1884, only eight animals had been affected with foot-and-mouth disease. He did not wish to give any further statistics on this subject, and only desired to point out that, so far as Deptford Market was concerned, everything that possibly could be done was done to prevent the spread of infection.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the hon. Member for Greenwich had shown a noble devotion to the interests of his constituents; but the Committee could not go all round the cattle markets of the United Kingdom. He hoped the hon. Member would not move his Amendment.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I do not propose to move it.

MR. KENNY said, he wished to move the second reading of a new clause as follows:—

(Cattle brought from Ireland.)

"On and after the passing of this Act, no local authority in Great Britain shall prohibit the landing, or stop in transit, healthy cattle brought from Ireland to Great Britain, unless such local authority shall have obtained from the Privy Council an order authorising them to do so."

The object with which he had put the clause on the Paper had been to elicit an expression of opinion from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, as representing the Agricultural Department, as to the manner in which local authorities had been dealing with cattle brought from Ireland. He did not propose to go into the matter at any great length; but he would point out that, under the Act of 1878, the Privy Council were supposed to be responsible for the Orders issued or made by the local authorities; and it was not until he had put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman in the House, that he had ascertained that the local authorities made these Orders in regard to cattle brought from Ireland. He thought it was entirely ultra vires, so far as the local authorities were concerned, that they should have excluded these cattle, from July, make Orders prohibiting the landing of cattle brought from Ireland, or in any way prevent fat cattle being brought across the Channel to the English markets. The Newcastle Market had been closed to Irish fat cattle for many months, though the Northumberland ports had been opened for some time to Irish store cattle. There was not the slightest chance of infection from Irish cattle, and yet they had been excluded to benefit the foreign cattle dealers, or Continental cattle raisers, who were sending animals to the English markets. Irish cattle were excluded not only to the benefit of these people, but to the detriment of the meat-consuming population of the great centres of England. The right hon. Gentleman had just admitted, to a certain extent, the grievance of which he complained, and had given a promise to deal with it by an Order in Council. He should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether such Order in Council had been prepared; and, if so, what were the terms of it, and how soon was it proposed to issue it? If he (Mr. Kenny) considered, when he heard the terms of the Order in Council, that they would meet the case, he would not press his Amendment.

Clause (Cattle brought from Ireland.)—(Mr. Kenny.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the local authorities in Scotland and, he presumed, also in England, would object emphatically to any curtailment of their power of excluding cattle from those places where disease existed. He would point out that the farmers of Scotland were as anxious to have store cattle from Ireland, as Irish farmers were to send them to Scotland; but they wished to have effectual methods of dealing with disease. It had been clearly proved that, through bringing cattle from Ireland to the Clyde, the landing places and the vessels had become so affected that, without any blame to the Irish dealers, great loss accrued to those who bought the Irish cattle. The Scotch authorities had been so anxious to get clear of disease that they had prohibited the importation for a time, and thereby put pressure on the authorities on the Clyde. They desired to have a clean route, and directly that was accomplished the restriction would be withdrawn. The interests of the Scotch and English local authorities and farmers were identical with those of the Irish local authorities and farmers; and they were prepared to admit their cattle as soon as they could do so with safety. The disease which had broken out amongst Irish cattle was a great loss to the dealers and importers; and, therefore, the policy which had been pursued, inconvenient as it was to farmers in England and Scotland as well as to farmers in Ireland, would prove beneficial to both parties.

Mr. BIGGAR said, he considered that the primary object his hon. Friend (Mr. Kenny) had in view in moving this clause was to bring about regularity in the proceedings of the local authorities. As the matter stood at present, the local authorities thought for themselves, and that brought about a great amount of irregularity. The rules were very stringent in some places, and lax in others; and the question was, whether it would not be desirable that there should be some central directing Body for collecting information from all quarters, and for making rules to apply to all places? If it were considered wise to do that, the object could be effected by accepting the new clause proposed by his hon. Friend. If the rules were to be stringent, let them be stringent everywhere.

Mr. DODSON said, that, in the first place, this new clause, from one point of view of the hon. Member (Mr. Kenny) himself, was unnecessary. No local authority had power to stop healthy animals in transit; and, in the next place, the clause, if adopted, would not secure that uniformity which it was the object of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to bring about. It proposed that a local authority should not be able to stop cattle coming from Ireland, unless they had obtained power from the Privy Council to do so. Having, however, obtained that power, they could use it as they pleased. Under existing regulations, any local authority in Great Britain possessed power to exclude animals from the district of any other local authority in the United Kingdom. This was no exceptional power against Irish cattle, and he appealed to the Members of the Committee not to press the consideration of the clause.

Mr. KENNY said, his proposal referred in the main to Irish fat cattle more than store cattle; and his complaint was that the local authorities had power to prevent such cattle from being brought into English markets. Irish fat cattle had, for a long period, been excluded from the Glasgow and the Newcastle-on-Tyne Markets, although, owing to the recent action of the House, those markets might be opened now. His complaint was that, in some places where the local authority might be guided by a Veterinary Inspector, Irish fat cattle might be excluded by that one person. He wished to have an explanation from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster with regard to this Order in Council. It was an important matter, and it was not only important to the Irish cattle dealer, but to the population of England. He wished to know what were the terms of the Order?

Mr. DODSON said, he could not give the terms, because they were not yet drawn up; but what he had said was, that the Privy Council had it in contemplation to issue an Order so as to limit the power of local authorities to prohibit the introduction of animals into their districts from parts of the United Kingdom which were free from, or without a suspicion of, disease; but the matter had not yet gone further, and was, for the present, in abeyance.

Mr. KENNY said, that, at the same time, the right hon. Gentleman had promised that he would make an inquiry into some reported outbreak. He had not yet told them what was the real state of the facts.

Mr. DODSON said, there had been an alarm that animals infected with foot-and-mouth disease had been brought over to Bristol; but, on inquiry, it proved that the animals were sound.

Mr. KENNY said, that, under the circumstances, and according to the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, the matter virtually amounted to this—that, in regard to every district which was free from foot-and-mouth disease, the local authorities would be prevented from prohibiting the importation; and, therefore, he (Mr. Kenny) did not see the necessity of persevering.

Mr. DODSON said, he should be very much obliged if the hon. Gentleman would not press the clause; but he could not accept the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of what he had just said.

Mr. CLARE READ hoped that, in the Order in Council which the right hon. Gentleman was contemplating, he would set forth not only the places from which the cattle were to come, but the line of transit over which they would have to pass.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD moved the insertion of the following new clause:—

(Duration of obligatory powers of Privy Council.)

"So much of this Act as makes it obligatory on the Privy Council to prohibit, in the circumstances in this Act mentioned, the landing of animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease, shall continue in force until the expiration of two years from the date of the passing of this Act, and no longer."

He said he would not, at that late hour of the night, occupy the attention of the Committee for many minutes. He might claim some indulgence for the position in which he and others stood in reference to this clause. It was born in the highest circles of nobility—it was proposed by Lord Carlingford in "another place;" and when it was turned out, the noble Lord delivered it to his Colleagues that it should be adopted by this House; but its unnatural parent, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, had cast it off, and it had fallen into low society below the Gangway. He would endeavour to state, in one sentence, why he thought the Bill should be passed only for a period of two years. There had been laid before the Committee by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) a scientific argument which was absolutely conclusive that this Bill should only be a temporary measure, even from the point of view of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Again, accepting their views, he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would argue that the Bill should only be a temporary measure. Assuming the measure to be one of the utmost importance, he would ask those hon. Gentlemen whether they desired that there should be a permanent Statute placed among the laws of the country which related only to one disease which, in their opinion, a few years ago, was so unimportant that they considered that slaughtering at the port of landing was a quite sufficient defence against it? From his own point of view, and from the point of view of those whom he hoped to have the good fortune to meet in the Lobby, he would say that this Bill was perfectly useless, because it did not add one iota to the legal powers of the Privy Council, although it contained an invitation to them to use the powers they already possessed. It did not add one jot, or tittle, or atom to their powers in regard to the prevention of the spread of infectious disease. He thought it was very undesirable at any time to add a law to the Statute Book of which such a thing as that could be said, and for the reason he had already suggested—namely, because it had been thought important by Her Majesty's Government in the first instance, he would, he might say, on their behalf, propose that the Bill should only be passed for a period of two years.

Clause (Duration of obligatory powers of Privy Council),—(Mr. Arthur Arnold,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

COLONEL KINGSCOTE said, he would be as brief as he could; but he felt that it would be most unwise if the Committee were to put any such limitation on the duration of the Act as was now proposed; indeed, such a course would render nugatory all that the Bill proposed to do. He had fought for this Bill for two reasons; one being, to give cattle breeders in this country such protection as could be given to them. To tell him that the agricultural interest would put their cattle into breeding, if this Bill were only to be passed for a limited time, was absurd. They would do nothing of the kind; and for this reason alone, if for no other, he should oppose this. Again, how would foreign countries be induced to take steps to keep disease out of their own country, if they knew that this Bill was to last for only two years? He would not detain the Committee longer; but he should give his strongest opposition to this clause, for he felt sure that it would render nugatory all that the Bill would do if this or similar Amendments were passed.

Mr. CHAPLIN said, that if the statement of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) were true, that this Bill was wholly superfluous and unnecessary, and did not add one tittle to the powers already possessed by the Privy Council, why was it that he and his Friends had offered so formidable an opposition to the measure? He

(Mr. Chaplin) certainly trusted that the Committee would not accept the clause which the hon. Gentleman had proposed; for he could not conceive anything more calculated to render absolutely nugatory all the prolonged discussions and efforts which they had made to bring the measure to a successful conclusion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Kingscote) had pointed out, with great force, that one of the principal sources to which we had to look to supply any deficiency in the food of the people would be curtailed if this clause should be unfortunately inserted. If such a clause were passed, it would be impossible to expect those farmers who were breeders to embark the capital necessary for any increased production of cattle, if the security which was to be given to them was only to be continued for two years. An increased production must necessarily be a matter of years' duration. Then, in regard to the other source from which we were to look for an importation of dead meat, could we look with any hopeful prospect to that in the face of such a clause as the one now proposed? Was it not perfectly obvious that in order to create a dead meat trade on anything like a large and permanent basis, we must give foreign countries some assurance that there would be something of a permanent nature and character in this measure? How otherwise could we expect them to embark in the trade? Hon. Gentlemen had constantly told them that when the prohibition of live animals had been insisted on before there had been no corresponding increase in the dead meat trade. No doubt, that was perfectly true, for the very reason he had stated, that it was impossible to expect people to embark in such a trade when they were totally uncertain as to whether the importation of live animals, whether diseased or not, would be permitted again in the course of a few months. He would conclude, as he had begun, by again expressing an earnest hope that the Committee would not deprive the Bill of its main value by accepting the clause proposed by the hon. Member; for he believed, in the interest of the meat consumers, that nothing more disastrous could be passed by the Committee.

Mr. DODSON said, he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would not think it necessary to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division. It was true, as had been stated by the hon. Gentleman, that the clause was in the Bill as it was originally introduced; but one of the Amendments made in the House of Lords was that this clause should not be retained. They had, however, now arrived at an arrangement whereby the 1st clause of the Bill had been, in great measure, restored to its original scope, although not in the form he had desired; and, under the circumstances, he thought it unnecessary to ask for the re-introduction of the clause now proposed. With regard to this clause, the more he considered it, the less consequence it appeared to him to possess. He did not attach to it the importance which either the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) or the hon. and gallant Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote) attached to it. Nor did he attach to it the importance which the hon. Member for Salford appeared to do. In point of fact, the clause appeared to him to be really superfluous; because, if the 1st clause of the Bill, which was its essence, worked well, whatever might be the limit which Parliament imposed, the Act would be continued; whereas, on the other hand, if it did not work well, they might have a proposal to repeal it, not only at the end of two years, but at the end of one year, or even sooner. Therefore he thought it was not worth while to detain the Committee by any long argument; and he hoped the hon. Member for Salford would be satisfied by making his protest, and would not divide the Committee.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he was not going to detain the Committee at that late hour. If his hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur Arnold) went to a Division he should support him, and mainly upon this ground—that he believed it would be found almost impossible to keep up the restrictions in regard to this Bill, which would be the only excuse or ground upon which they ought to have such very stringent legislation with regard to foreign parts. He believed there would not be a feeling among the farmers themselves to keep up the restrictions. Under these circumstances, it was a fair and reasonable thing to make the Bill a temporary measure. He did not know that two years should be the exact time fixed; but it should be a temporary Act. This was a point on which his hon. Friend, doubtless, felt strongly, and those who supported him felt strongly also.

MR. BROADHURST said, he would occupy the attention of the Committee for but a few moments. He was taken rather severely to task by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) the other day for something he had said during the discussion on this subject. He wished now to point out, in justification of some of the remarks which he then made, that the speeches which had just been delivered by the hon. and gallant Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote) and the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) showed that he was entirely right in his contention. Those hon. Gentlemen, who were not within sight of their haven, had pointed out that unless this was made a permanent Act it would be impossible for cattle breeders in this country to commence and keep up large breeding establishments. If that were so, that was the best of all affirmative replies to the question between them and him. Those hon. Gentlemen had clearly pointed out by their arguments that they looked upon this Bill as an encouragement to what they would, like, he supposed, to call home industries. ["No, no!"] An hon. Member opposite dissented; but he had told them that if this Bill were only to last two years it would be impossible to develop home breeding in our own country, and that disease would come back to us. But this Bill would not keep out disease. The disease, according to all the best authorities, quoted by these hon. Gentlemen, was created in our own dirty farm yards. ["No, no!"] At any rate, there was no evidence of the importation of this disease; and, therefore, no necessity for the permanency of this proposed Act. He opposed that permanency on other grounds besides this. If he could have an assurance that the present Government would remain for ever in Office—a thing they would all desire—["No, no!"]—he meant that all patriotic men would desire, all well-wishers of their country—well, then he should have no objection whatever to the permanency of the law. But it was possible that there might be a change of Government; and he could not look upon the result, so far as this Bill was concerned, without the most profound concern. The bare possibility was enough to make him distrust the measure. If the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chaplin) were to be found taking his seat on the Treasury Bench, he (Mr. Broadhurst) would like to know what the interpretation of this Bill would be in his hands? He looked upon the Bill as a vicious piece of legislation; and, therefore, he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would take a Division on the question, and that it would be, as it ought to be, a good Division.

MR. FINCH-HATTON said, he only rose in consequence of what had been said by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), who had been very unfair to the hon. Gentleman who preceded him. It was perfectly evident that unless time was given for the development of cattle breeding at home, and the dead meat trade from abroad, a largely increased and cheaper supply of meat would be very difficult to obtain for the people of this country.

MR. HENEAGE said, that the adoption of this clause would be a most cruel injustice to the consumer as well as the tenant farmer. It was to future years that they must look to develop the cattle trade on a satisfactory footing. If the duration of the Bill was limited in the way proposed, it would only give an inducement for the butcher to keep up the price of meat, for he knew that he would only have to keep it up for two years in order to get up a cry against the Bill and succeed in repealing it. He only wished to say one other word. It was proposed that the Bill should be limited to two years; but, in the ordinary course of things, the end of two years would about coincide with the period of a General Election, and they might be for five or six months without a renewal of the Act.

MR. C. H. JAMES hoped the Committee would see its way to pass this clause. What was the position of things? The agriculturists declared that this Bill would not increase the price of meat; but the artizans of the country, some of whom sent him there, declared that it would increase the price. Well, if this Bill were only passed for a year, or two years, they would, at all events, have an opportunity of seeing which side was right, and it would be a most reasonable thing that that opportunity should be given. At the end of two years they would know which side was right. Supposing the price of meat went up 2d. per lb., no Government on earth could stand it. Parliament would have to repeal the Act at once. Was it not wise, then, to restrict the operation of the Act to two years? If it was then found to work well, it would be put into the Continuance Bill, and would be renewed without any great debate; whereas, if it did not work well, there would be another debate, and a very proper one too. He hoped the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would take a Division, so that they might know how this matter stood; and, if he did, he (Mr. C. H. James) would certainly vote with him.

MR. C. H. WILSON said, there was one interest which had not been mentioned in the course of the debate, and that was the shipping interest. There had been an enormous number of steamers built to carry live cattle from America, and this legislation would seriously affect that trade. Hon. Gentlemen who represented the agricultural interest, and who talked of the depression of agriculture, should remember that such legislation would be the cause of considerable depression in the shipping interest. He (Mr. C. H. Wilson) was intimately acquainted with the shipping of this country, and especially that shipping engaged in the carriage of cattle. A great deal had been said about bringing dead meat in place of live cattle; but he might say that, largely as his ships had been engaged in carrying live cattle, they had not carried one single ton of dead meat, and his own opinion was that the importation of dead meat would not increase so largely as was expected. Indeed, if a check were put on the importation of cattle from the United States, it would place a check on the production of cattle in the United States, and this, in turn, would place a check on the importation of dead meat. If the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) went to a Division in this matter, he should certainly have pleasure in voting with him.

Mr. C. H. James

After the numbers were announced,

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: Sir Arthur Otway, I wish to state that I went into the wrong Lobby by mistake.

MR. BROADHURST: I do not know whether I am in Order in doing so; but I wish to inform you, Sir, that there were two hon. Members in the Aye Lobby who came out after the Clerk had left the Lobby—Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Colonel Smith—and the Tellers agreed that they should be counted.

THE CHAIRMAN: The numbers have been corrected accordingly.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

NATIONAL DEBT (CONVERSION OF STOCK) BILL.

Resolutions [May 1] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir ARTHUR OTWAY, MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and MR. COURTNEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 186.]

COINAGE BILL.

Resolution [May 1] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and MR. COURTNEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 187.]

PARLIAMENT—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Courtney.)

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE ARRESTS AT TUBBERCURRY, CO. SLIGO.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SEXTON said, that as he saw the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) in his place he should like to put a Question to him, before the House adjourned—a Question with reference to the kind of treatment which had been inflicted on 11 inhabitants of the county (Sligo) which he (Mr. Sexton) had the honour to represent. These men were arrested a long time; and, on Wednesday last, he called attention to the fact that they had been remanded several times after private examination in the gaol, and after no evidence had been produced. They had also been denied the visits of their solicitors and of their friends. When he drew attention to these facts, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland at once undertook that the next examination of the men should be in open Court, that the Crown should bring forward evidence, and that the prisoners should be allowed to have proper facilities for preparing their defence. It now appeared, however, that the pledge which the right hon. Gentleman then gave him had been broken through the obstinacy of some official. There had been another examination; that examination was again private; no evidence was produced; and the prisoners charged were, on the fiat of the Crown Solicitor, remanded to Monday next. As to the undertaking given by the Government that the prisoners should be allowed to communicate with their solicitors, he (Mr. Sexton) had been informed, to-day, that they had only been allowed to communicate with them separately, one by one; and the highest legal authority could be cited for the contention that, as the charge against the prisoners was one of conspiracy, they could not prepare their defence properly unless they were allowed to confer with their solicitors all together. Furthermore, he had found that, when he (Mr. Sexton) telegraphed to the prison, detailing the fact that pledges had been given by the Government, and explaining what those pledges were, the telegram was only communicated to the particular prisoner to whom it was addressed, and not to the others, who were equally interested. He would put it to the House, was it not cruel to keep from the knowledge of those men the fact that their next examination was to be public, and that evidence would then be brought forward? He had no other desire than to promote the ends of justice, and to see that proper Constitutional practices were followed; and he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, whether he would not give an undertaking that he would communicate with the Attorney General for Ireland to-day, and with the Governor of the gaol in Sligo, informing the latter that the decisions of the Government in this House ought to be brought to the knowledge of all the prisoners concerned, and that all the prisoners should be enabled, together and at one time, to meet their legal representative in one place, so that they might have the opportunity properly to defend themselves against a charge of conspiracy, as that was the only effective manner in which they could possibly prepare their defence. He knew the disposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman himself; and he trusted that he would be able to use his influence, both in Dublin and in Sligo, so as to take some effective measures before the last day that might decide the fate of these men had passed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that as to the prisoners not being allowed access to their solicitor together, the ordinary prison rules would not admit of the Governor giving that permission. But when the hon. Member communicated with the Government by letter he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) at once communicated with his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, who informed him immediately that an application had been made to him for the necessary leave; and that he had referred to the authorities at Sligo informing them that unless there was some special reason against it—which neither his right hon. and learned Friend nor he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) anticipated—the men were to be allowed to see their solicitor together. He believed that arrangement would be carried out, and he would undertake to telegraph to the Governor of the gaol this morning.

Question put, and agreed to.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD suggested that a portion of the "Royal Gallery" should be furnished as a writing room. The existing writing room adjoining the House was a mere passage. Interviews with Members of the House of Commons, or other persons on Public Business, must now be held in the corners of the Lobbies or Corridors. He hoped this Committee would take care that a convenient room should be found and properly furnished.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he thought there was reason to complain of the insufficiency of accommodation, especially on crowded nights. It was clear that little or no use was now made of the adjoining Gallery; and he thought it was a subject worthy of the attention of the Committee of the Black Rod.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, that there was room in the Library, which was large enough for anyone, which could be used for the purposes mentioned.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD, in renewing his complaint, said, that the Library was too distant; a more convenient room was required.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, that, as the subject of their wants was under discussion, he wished to call attention to the fact that there was a conspicuous absence of a Smoking Room in connection with the House. When the House was in a state of political excitement after the dinner hour, there was a sensible wandering of unattached Peers about the passages, asking where they could find a place to smoke. He did not know the question was coming up, or he would have prepared himself with statistics of those Members of the House who were, and were not, addicted to the fragrant vice. But whether Members of their Lordships' House were, or were not, addicted to that vice, they must feel it was most undesirable and undignified to be relegated to the hard benches of some stray Committee Room. He thought it would add much to the comfort and convenience of noble Lords if a Smoking Room could be provided, especially on nights when there were important debates.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I want to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question which is always of great interest to many persons, and of which I have given the noble Earl private Notice; I wish to know, whether any intelligence has reached the Government from General Gordon within the last few hours?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I regret to say I must give an answer to the noble Marquess's Question in the negative.

LUNACY LAWS.—RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in rising to call attention to the observations made by Mr. Baron Huddleston in the case of "Weldon v. Winslow," and to move—

"That in the opinion of this House the existing state of the Lunacy Laws is eminently unsatisfactory, and constitutes a serious danger to the liberty of the subject,"

said, he would call their Lordships' attention to a summary of the facts of this case published in The Times. He would abstain from commenting on the merits of a case which was still sub judice; but he might be permitted to quote the opinions of Judges on the present condition of our Lunacy Laws. The learned Judge he had referred to expressed his astonishment that a person could be confined in an asylum by anybody on the statement of anybody, provided certain formalities were gone through, and he also observed that it was positively shocking that such a state of things should exist. With regard to the matter itself, the Lunacy Laws of the country consisted chiefly of the Statutes 8 & 9 Vict.; c. 100, and 16 & 17 Vict., c. 96; and it was those Statutes which prescribed the manner in which a person might be committed to an asylum. Lunatics were in the eye of the law divided into two classes—paupers and non-paupers. The former class did not merely include paupers in the strict sense of the term; but a constable, or relieving officer, or overseer of the poor might arrest anyone found wandering abroad, and bring him before the Justice of the Peace, and on the certificate of one medical man, who might be entirely ignorant in such matters, and the warrant of Justices, for whose competence also there was no guarantee, such a person might be incarcerated for life. Thus any one of their Lordships might be confined for life in that manner as a pauper lunatic. This was a great hardship. But, if the lunatic was found to possess means, he was transferred to a licensed house. In the case of a non-pauper the certificate of two medical men was required. There were in this country 68,000 pauper lunatics, and 7,000 non-pauper lunatics. The state of the law on this subject was, indeed, positively startling. Any person who could obtain certificates from any two out of the 20,000 medical practitioners on the register could consign any other person to incarceration in an asylum, an hospital, or a licensed house, or to an unlicensed house, where not more than one person was taken; while no private person could obtain the release of such incarcerated individual without the consent either of the person who brought the incarceration about, or of the Lunacy Commissioners. Moreover, it was impossible, unless after considerable difficulty had been overcome, to see the incarcerated persons, and no criminal prosecution could be instituted for breach of the Lunacy Laws except by the Commissioners in Lunacy. All that was necessary to procure the detention of any person as a pauper lunatic was the certificate of one medical man, who might have no knowledge whatever of the patient regarding whom he gave the certificate, beyond seeing him for a few minutes before signing the certificate, and from his decision there was practically no appeal. Therefore, with regard to the 7,000 non-pauper lunatics, it was absolutely essential that there should be two medical certificates. Cases of the grossest cruelties being perpetrated upon unhappy patients might, and often did, occur, without the slightest possibility of their being heard of by the outside world; and even when they were known the police could not interfere, because the order of the Commissioners was a sufficient warrant for everything that was done in the matter. With respect to those immured in private asylums, kept simply for profit, the whole system had been described by the noble Earl below him (the Earl of Shaftesbury) as utterly abominable and indefensible. The safeguards against wrong-doing were insufficient, and the time had come when that "abominable and indefensible" state of things should no longer be permitted, and it certainly was one which ought not to exist in this age and country. There were 7,000 of these houses, of which 1,394 were for the reception of pauper lunatics. The owners were all under the strongest inducement both to obtain and retain patients. The only safeguards were those provided by the Commissioners in Lunacy, of whom there were 11; six being paid, and five unpaid. Practically, the former did most of the work of the Commissioners. He trusted their Lordships would say that the time had come when an end would be put to the present intolerable state of things, for no one could dispute the fact that it should no longer be permitted to continue; and that in procuring its abrogation a most damning blot would be removed from the Statute Book. He would conclude by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Moved to resolve, "That in the opinion of this House the existing state of the lunacy laws is eminently unsatisfactory, and constitutes a serious danger to the liberty of the subject."—(The Earl of Milltown.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, their Lordships would at once perceive that his reply must be somewhat prolonged, so many were the details and charges made by the noble Earl who had just sat down (the Earl of Milltown). Had he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) not been on the Commission in Lunacy for more than 50 years, first as Acting Chairman, and since 1845 as Permanent Chairman, he would not have interposed; but he thought it necessary, and almost a point of duty, to explain the state of things and calm the public mind. The special case of Mrs. Weldon could not be then discussed, as the matter was still sub judice. The lady had moved for, and had obtained, a new trial; and nothing at present could be said on the question. He wished, however, to state that the affair had never come before the Commissioners—their jurisdiction did not begin until a patient had been lodged within the walls of some licensed house. Neither did he know anything of the case, except what he had gathered from the newspapers; but it certainly had struck him that, if the evidence had been no stronger on the certificate, had one been sent to their office, than that which appeared only in general rumour, he, at least, should have been disposed to set the lady at liberty. But the obiter dictum of Baron Huddleston might come under observation. It was as follows, and taken from The Standard, 19th March, 1884:—

"Now, I say distinctly, I wish I could treat this case apart from all technicality; but I must express my astonishment that such a state of things can exist, that an order can be made by anybody on the statement of anybody, and that two gentlemen, if they have only obtained a diploma, provided they examine a patient separately, and are not related to keepers of a lunatic asylum, and that on this form being gone through, any person can be committed to a lunatic asylum. It is somewhat startling—it is positively shocking—that if a pauper, or, as Mrs. Weldon put it, a crossing-sweeper, should sign an order, and another crossing-sweeper should make a statement, and that then two medical men, who had never had a day's practice in their lives, should for a small sum of money grant their certificates, a person may be

Now, he was certain that, if the learned Baron had known the law, or had read the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons printed in 1878, he would never have made such an observation. First, he spoke, after a very invidious fashion, of any two gentlemen who had obtained a diploma. His Lordship should have remembered that, by the amending Lunacy Act of 1862, the qualifications of those who were empowered to grant certificates were very stringent. It said that the term physician, surgeon, or apothecary, wherever used in the Lunacy Acts, should mean a person registered under the Medical Act of 1858; a person, therefore, of adequate professional fitness. He added, equally invidiously, that they might never have had a day's practice—possibly, though not probably—and, indeed, were practice in lunacy required as a qualification, we should not find one in 10,000 of the Medical Profession at present masters in the art. He closed by an assertion that these certificates were a perfect answer to any action. Where had the learned Baron found this law? Had he never heard of the case tried in the Courts of "Hall v. Semple," in which Mr. Hall, a liberated patient, prosecuted Dr. Semple for negligence in framing the certificate, and obtained damages to the amount of £150? There was a similar power against the person who signed an order of admission. Three years ago, the case of "Noel v. Williams" had been tried in Court. Mr. Noel, a discharged patient, sued his brother-in-law, Mr. Williams, who had signed the order; and though Mr. Williams obtained a verdict on every point, he had to bear the expenses of his defence, a sum which amounted to not less than £3,000. As to the order he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) admitted that it was a weak point; theoretically, it was, no doubt, imperfect, though practically it had worked without any evil results. The history might be stated from his own evidence given in 1877—

"With regard to the orders, I understood your Lordship to agree that it is in some respects undesirable that a person, a perfect stranger to a patient, should sign the order; do not you think that where there is a case, and no near relative is to be found to sign the order, it would be desirable that the order for admission should be signed by some public official? I believe I explained the reason of the state of the order to be this.—In the year 1846, when we were framing the Bill, we were exceedingly puzzled as to what to do, so many cases had come before us of persons being suddenly seized in hotels, in lodging-houses, in mere apartments where there was nobody who knew whence they came or whither they were going; they were foreigners, Americans, medical students and law students, and all sorts and sizes of people, travellers only resting for a night, and we were obliged to leave it in that way that any person might sign the order for admission into any asylum. I have no doubt, but I do not recollect it, that we saw it was very imperfect, and that we intended to amend it, but we forgot it; and so little abuse arose upon it, and so very few bad cases came before us, that we totally forgot the matter."

Here, again, the learned Baron had put the case most invidiously. A crossing-sweeper, he said, might be called to sign an order of admission into a lunatic asylum. Well, but there were things so utterly improbable as to amount almost to impossibilities. The Queen might make a crossing-sweeper a Duke, and give him a seat in their Lordships' House; but did any of their Lordships fear such an issue? It was a weak point, no doubt, and required amendment; but in nearly 40 years there had been no complaint, and probably not one in 500 orders had been signed by any but some relative or friend. All this was before the Committees of 1859 and 1877, and they had not taken the formidable view of the learned Baron. They had accepted many of the propositions of the Commissioners, and had added some of their own, which were then waiting for enactment. And here he might add, in reply to the assertion of the noble Earl opposite, that the order could inflict perpetual confinement; that the Commissioners could, if they saw fit, set aside the order. But let their Lordships then consider the ominous announcement of the noble Earl, that the state of the Lunacy Laws constituted a serious danger to the liberty of the subject. The two Committees of 1859 and 1877 had come to no such conclusion; on the contrary, they had rejoiced in the many and vast improvements. How could they have feared for the liberty of the subject in the face of such a statement as that he had made before them? From 1859 to 1877 there had passed through the Office of the Commissioners 185,000 certificates. Of these, some six or seven had demanded the attention of the Select Committee of the House of Commons; but all, upon investigation, were found to be just and good. During the same interval there had been 90,000 liberations, of which 22,000 were from licensed houses. The Returns up to the present day were equally satisfactory, a sufficient refutation of the common assertion that persons thrust into private asylums would never get out. There were, he believed, fewer cases of mistake in placing patients under care and treatment than of miscarriages of justice in Courts of Law. The noble Earl ought, in candour, to have quoted that part of the Report in which the Select Committee had spoken of the vast and beneficial progress made in the treatment of lunacy. It was as follows:—

"The Committee cannot avoid observing here, that the jealousy with which the treatment of lunatics is watched at the present day, and the comparatively trifling nature of the abuses alleged, present a remarkable contrast to the horrible cruelty with which asylums were too frequently conducted less than half a century ago, to the apathy with which the exposure of such atrocities by successive Committees of this House was received, both by Parliament and the country, and to the difficulty with which remedial enactments were carried through the Legislature, while society viewed with indifference the probability of sane people being, in many cases, confined as lunatics, acquiesced in the treatment of lunatics as if they were outside the pale of humanity, and would have scarcely considered a proposal to substitute for chains and ill-usage, the absence of restraint, the occupation and amusement, which may be said to be the universal characteristics of the system in this country at the present day."

And, again, they said—

"Assuming that the strongest cases against the present system were brought before them, allegations of mala fides were not substantiated."

He could assure their Lordships, from long observation, dating back more than 50 years, that it would require much time, and much power of description, to set before them the state of degradation and suffering in which lunatics were found by the inquiry that commenced in 1828. Manacles and leg-locks were in universal use—many were chained to the wall, almost all in filth, disorder, and semi-starvation. He mentioned all this to show that great and good things had been done under the existing Lunacy Laws; and that some gratitude was due to God for having given the will and the power to raise them from such misery. Now, he did not mean to say that perfection had been reached—very far from it; but he urged their Lordships to proceed with care and caution, following experience, and the discoveries of science, and not preceding them by hasty legislation, which might throw them back to the condition of half-a-century ago. But while they were considering, and jealously guarding the liberty of the subject, they must also consider the value and necessity of early treatment of insanity. On one point there was, it might be asserted, a consensus of opinion among all medical men, and, indeed, laymen, who had studied the question. Quotations of evidence to that effect might be multiplied, almost without limit. Dr. Sutherland maintained that if cases were taken at the very commencement of the disorder, full 85 per cent might be cured. Dr. Conolly stated certainly not less than 50 per cent; but the whole might be summed up in a most valuable extract from the Report of Mr. Ley, the Medical Superintendent of the great County Asylum at Prestwich, in Lancashire—

"The total number," said Mr. Ley, speaking of a particular year, "of curable cases in the 446 admissions was 209; 113 of these have been sent out recovered, and, in all probability, 70 more will be discharged during the current year. Eighty-nine per cent of the total recoveries occurred in those who were admitted while the attack was yet recent; only 11 per cent are from those who were allowed to remain without proper treatment for a long time after the malady had declared itself. The duration of residence in these recoveries varied from four weeks to twelve years, the average duration being much augmented by the recovery of some few who had resided in the asylum above a year."

This was his summing up, and this was the summing up of every medical man he knew.

"These results," Mr. Ley continued, "prove what has so often been urged before, that insanity in its early stages is as curable a disease as any other in the catalogue of human disorders."

The evidence from America was abundant and equally decided. Though he would not add anything to the law to give facilities for the shutting up of persons under the charge of insanity, so fearful was he of the possibility of error, he would do nothing to diminish them. He spoke in the interest of the patient, for whom a cure thus became comparatively easy, and in the interest of the world at large also, who had a deep concern in the abatement of that terrible disorder. The impediments were grave and numerous already—the reluctance of parents and relatives to see, and then believe, the first symptoms of a disturbed intellect; the serious step of consulting a medical man on the point, even though he were the physician of the family; the fear lest anything should transpire, and the public be admitted in any way to the sad secret; all these feelings postponed the final decision, until by long continuance the affection had become almost hopelessly confirmed. If, then, that repugnance existed under the present system, what would it amount to were the magistrate called in or a jury summoned, who never allowed anyone to be mad, unless he had committed some overt act whereby the disorder was proved to be nearly inveterate? Here the pauper had a great advantage over the class above him. He was taken to the asylum in the first stage of his affliction, and hence the public asylums claimed the superiority in the number of cures. Certainly, the tables showed that it was so, though, perhaps, by reason of the very early discharge, there were many cases of relapse. Too long detention after cure had been urged against the licensed houses. In former days it might have been so, but by no means always with a bad motive. He did not believe that many such cases could occur in the present day. He did not deny the difficulty—he might say the perilous difficulty—in attempting to undertake early treatment of discerning between a transient eccentricity of habit, manner, or temper and the slight symptoms of incipient mental disturbance. An error on either side was deeply injurious. The error which led to the confinement of the patient might inflict, though the patient was speedily removed, the taint of supposed insanity; but the error which denied the necessity of it might inflict a greater harm, and fix on the patient the malady for ever. It demanded almost superhuman sagacity, and showed how necessary it was to be cautious, to avoid hasty legislation, and await the further developments of that important branch of science. He feared that all the proposed enactments that tended to increase publicity, and render impossible that amount of privacy that was naturally and justifiably demanded in these delicate matters, would tend to a vastly extended system of clandestine confinement. Single patients, as they were called, were persons living alone under restraint, and committed to the charge of a doctor, a clergyman, or an attendant. Where two or more, being lunatics, resided under the same roof, the law required that a licence should be taken out; where only one, a certificate. There was great difficulty in the discovery of such cases; many of them were put out on the false plea that they were nervous, not lunatic, patients, and, therefore, not subject to the law. Evidence of their existence reached them in a variety of ways; and on such evidence, if sufficient, an application was made to the Lord Chancellor for a power to visit the house. The Commissioners, in 1862, had visited 161 single patients; but, in 1884, they had visited 449, an increase in 20 years of 288. How many more there might be he could not say, so secret were they, and so scattered over the whole country. It had been asked in the House of Commons whether it were not true that many were sent abroad? On that point the Commissioners could give no information. Now, the state of these single patients demanded the utmost thought and attention. Care and inspection, it was true, had greatly mitigated their lot; but the peculiarity of the circumstances exposed them, on the slightest relaxation of vigilance, to a return of all the evils and oppressions of former days. The condition of these sufferers had, in former days, been most deplorable; their treatment might have varied according to the position and character of those who had charge of them; but, in the great bulk of the cases, it was, beyond doubt, fearfully oppressive. He had it on the personal testimony of those who had endured the solitary incarceration. One lady asserted that she was frequently strapped down on her bed for 24 hours, while her nurse went out on a junket; a gentleman had assured him that he had endured the same, and showed the scars on his legs made by the cords wherewith he was confined. If visited, these poor people had then but small relief; they had none to bear witness to their testimony; and every statement they made was attributed by the attendant to mental wandering. Now, then, these patients were singularly unhappy; for, in houses where many patients were received, any one patient had the supporting evidence of his fellows; for, though the testimony of a patient in respect of himself was oftentimes very questionable, the testimony of patients in respect of others was very good, and had oftentimes been received in Courts of Justice. He had said more than once, and he repeated it, that were anyone of his own family visited by that sad affliction, he would infinitely prefer to consign him or her to a licensed establishment than to the care and treatment of a single custodian. Their Lordships would easily perceive that the temptations, the payments being oftentimes very high, and the facilities for long detention and delay of cure, must, under such a system, be very great. The last point on which the noble Earl opposite had commented was on the principle, character, and condition of private asylums, or, as they were properly denominated, licensed houses. The noble Earl had quoted some strong passages given in evidence by him (the Earl of Shaftesbury) before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1859. Now, he did not vary, in principle, one hair's breadth from what he stated at that period; and the noble Earl would have done well to have given his explanatory evidence in 1877. It was as follows:—

“Your Lordship said, in answer to the honourable Member for Mid Surrey last Thursday, Question 11,449, that it was a notion prevailing in many minds that the principle of profit in regard to the treatment and maintenance of lunatics in private asylums should be eliminated.—Yes; it should be, if possible, no doubt. If I recollect the Question put to me by the Right Honourable Chairman, it was as to the establishment of hospitals, and I answered that I thought it would be a good principle to make the hospital system the basis of the system for the reception of patients of all kinds, but that I should be very sorry to do anything that should go to the total prohibition of licensed houses; because that, though I believed the operation of the hospital system might probably tend very much to reduce the number of licensed houses, I had strong conviction that those that survived would be of the very highest character. It is absolutely necessary we should have some licensed houses, because many have a particular taste that way, and because there is a form of treatment there that you never could have in any public asylum. You say you are ready to admit it is a notion that prevails in the minds of a great many people, but the sooner that is eliminated the better?—Yes, no doubt. That idea has grown up from evidence given to the public mind, and not from personal knowledge?—Yes; and I judge of it from conversation, and from what I read, and what I hear. I know that that feeling does prevail in the public mind, and naturally enough. I do not blame the public for it; and, indeed, I very much praise the public jealousy upon the subject. Perhaps your Lordship remembers the evidence you gave in 1859, in which you condemned the vicious principle of profit, as you called it, perhaps more strongly than anybody else?—Yes; I condemned it very strongly, and I condemn it nearly as strongly now, and, therefore, I want to put as great a limit upon it as I possibly can. Your Lordship has modified your views upon this subject?—Yes; to this extent—the licensed houses are in a far better condition than they were in every possible respect; but I have said, and I wish to repeat, that if we were to relax our vigilance the whole thing, in every form of establishment, would go back to its former level.”

The Committee of 1878 had reported that the permitted continuance or discontinuance of licensed houses must be left to public opinion; and it was certainly remarkable that, though there were perpetual expressions of dislike and fear of such receptacles, no steps were ever taken, or even proposed, to provide substitutes. Since 1859, hospitals had not increased in number; two had been added; but that was only apparently so, those two having come into separate existence by disconnection from the asylums of Gloucester and Nottingham. Nevertheless, the feeling of the country would continue, he doubted not, to prevail in favour of the public principle, which, when established, would require, he could assure their Lordships, no small amount of care and supervision. In illustration of what he had said, he might put before their Lordships the present state of private and hospital accommodation. The licensed houses amounted, in all, to 97; 35 in the Metropolis, and 62 in the Provinces. The hospitals for lunatics proper were 13; for idiots, 2. The increase of licensed houses in the Metropolis since 1859 was 1; the decrease of provincial houses in same time, 15; but that might be accounted for by their greater size. The inmates in hospitals were 3,146; in licensed houses, 4,779; making a total of 7,925. Of that total, 1,398 were paupers, leaving thus, of paying patients, 6,527. He could not conclude without recalling their Lordships' attention to the vast, he might say the blessed, improvements, made in the custody and cure of the insane, an answer, in itself, to many reckless and ignorant charges. Let them only consider the present treatment of the pauper lunatic. They had often seen, no doubt, those palatial buildings, the public asylums, erected solely for the poor. Every mode of a physical or moral character was resorted to for the charge and cure of these unfortunate beings. Their diet, their apparel, their residential comforts, were of the best quality. Their amusements were not forgotten; and occupation, adapted to their line of life, was regarded as among the most remedial processes. The women were engaged in employments of all kinds suited to their sex, and agriculture was esteemed so beneficial to the men, that land to the extent of 200 or 300 acres was assigned to many of the provincial asylums. All was minutely and carefully visited by constituted authorities, as he would show by the statement which followed. It exhibited not the maximum, but the minimum, of the visitations—

| | Two or more of Committee of Visitors. | Once at least every two months |
|-------------------------------------|---|--|
| Public Asylums, County and Borough. | Two Commissioners in Lunacy. | Once a year at least. |
| Hospital. | Members of Committee of Management. Two Commissioners. | Various—according to Regulations approved by Secretary of State—generally once a month. Once a year at least. Twice, of late years, by special Resolution of Board. |
| Private provincial Licensed House. | Two Visitors at least, one to be Medical. One Visitor. Two Commissioners. | Four times a year. Twice a year (“Single Visits”). Twice a year. |
| Metropolitan Licensed House. | Two Professional Commissioners. Any one Commissioner. | Four times a year. Twice a year. |

All this had been effected by degrees, by the results of observation, by the applications of experience. The contrast between 1828 and 1884 was well nigh incredible. All they required was care and caution, and that legislation should follow, and not precede, the guidance of practical science. But the appeal for such caution was met by hasty and nervous agitation. They had reason on their side, but it was encountered by nothing but expressions of fear. While of all the maladies that afflicted mankind, none were so intricate and appalling as those which disturbed his reasoning faculties, there were none upon which the public at large were more prompt to give an opinion, and enforce a remedy. He could only again and again implore the deepest and most serious consideration on such a subject. They were now in a far better state of hope for progress in scientific knowledge. A large Association of intelligent and right-hearted men had come into existence, formed of the superintendents of the great asylums and others who gave their time and their minds to that important study. They had their conferences, their meetings, their periodicals, and interchange of thought and inquiry. The services of these gentlemen were priceless—every day added something to the stock of facts, and on facts alone could treatment advance. He trusted that by investigation and patience they would be able, by God's blessing, to arrive at some alleviation, if not a full remedy, for the most mysterious affliction that had been permitted to fall on the human race.

LORD COLERIDGE said, he had considerable reluctance in speaking on that occasion; but he would point out to their Lordships that the Resolution of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Milltown) was of a somewhat abstract character, as to which it generally happened that, in that House, as well as "elsewhere," any debates arising were likely to be in some sense debates in the air. Nevertheless, because he had had a good deal of experience of cases connected with the subject, both at the Bar and on the Bench, and very much also in consequence of the speech of the noble Earl who had just spoken (the Earl of Shaftesbury), he would say a very few words. The Resolution had reference not to the profoundly interesting question of lunacy itself, but simply to the practical administration of the laws affecting the detention of persons supposed to be lunatics. It was quite true that the system administered in this country owed its origin to the noble Earl who had last sat down, and it was difficult for anyone who had not arrived at the time of life arrived at by the noble Earl to adequately comprehend the enormous improvement made by the measures of 1845 and 1853 in the system, if system it could be called, which was in existence before that time. For that great improvement, he (Lord Coleridge) believed they were mainly indebted to the noble Earl opposite, and it formed one of the many claims to gratitude which the noble Earl possessed, as regarded his contemporaries, for his various philanthropic labours. But 1853 was more than 30 years ago; and it was, therefore, no discredit to the noble Earl to say that the experience of 30 years might have taught us that in that system there was a good deal to be amended. In many cases the system, though excellent on paper, broke down in practice. In the great majority of cases it was absolutely clear to the intelligence of any ordinary person who was moderately acquainted with the matter that the individuals confined were insane; and, in another large class of cases, it was equally clear that the persons whom it was proposed to confine were not insane. Of course, where lunatics in confinement were properly treated, they would expect to find that a system on paper should be on the whole as successful as the present system was; but there was a class of cases—those cases in which there was a divided mind as to whether a person should or should not be incarcerated—it was in these cases that the real difficulty arose; and then the system, though excellent on paper, broke down. If we could, as in France, deal with a man's property by means of a family council, there would be very little to be said; but in this country no such system existed. For the reason that here it was a question of personal liberty, it was extremely important that care should be taken that the system by which persons were incarcerated should be watched with the severest jealousy. While quite agreeing with the noble Earl that Judges were fallible men, he could not help thinking that, at least, they were not averse to teaching each other that such was the case. Anyway, his noble Friend must have misunderstood the judgment of the learned Baron, for what he (Lord Coleridge) understood the learned Judge to mean was, that the certificates of medical practitioners were only a protection against the keepers of the asylums, and not a protection against others against whom proceedings might be taken for having set the doctors in action. The learned Baron was too well versed in the practice of his Profession to lay down the certainly bad law that the certificates of doctors were a protection against others than the keepers of the asylums. He (Lord Coleridge) had himself known of ten or a dozen cases, at least, where the system had broken down in the sense of persons not having been confined who ought to have been incarcerated; of others who had been sent to lunatic asylums, with such a total disregard to the common forms even of decency, that it was with the greatest possible difficulty that juries had been prevented from giving verdicts which would have been wrong against those who set the law in motion. He recollected that, in a case that came before himself, it was shown that a person had been committed to a private lunatic asylum on certificates of medical men who were interested in the asylum, and that, although the man had been afterwards formally discharged under their certificates, he had been rearrested within 10 minutes afterwards on others. He had no doubt that in that case, however, the person confined was a fit subject for confinement. The jury who had tried the case were naturally indignant with a state of the law which allowed such proceedings. Then there was the question of private lunatic asylums; and he must say that his experience of these asylums was not a very happy one. He did not mean to say there were a good many amongst the keepers of private asylums, but he thought there were some in the Medical Profession, who, in all respects, were not the highest type of medical men; because it was, unfortunately, the case that medical men possessing the highest minds did not devote themselves to this particular class of disease, and, moreover, it was repugnant to such men to mix themselves up with a system which, after all was said and done, combined commerce and trade with their Profession. In his opinion, it should never be the interest of the keepers of private lunatic asylums to retard the cure of patients. It was, unfortunately, the fact, as had been shown by the statistics referred to by the noble Earl, that the percentage of cures effected in the county lunatic asylums was far larger than that which was effected in private lunatic asylums. In the former, it was clear that it was not the interest or object of anyone to retain a patient longer than was absolutely necessary, because the maintenance of such a patient was a matter of cost, and not of profit; but that was not the case with regard to private asylums. That was not, however, a matter to be decided hastily, but as a matter of principle. Still, his painful experience had convinced him that it was not safe or wise to hold out inducements to the keepers of private lunatic asylums to retain their patients as long as they could. It had been said in reference to this class of disease, that a medical man would have just as much reason to effect a cure speedily as in the case of any other class of disease; but it must be remembered that the inducement was not the same, because such cases were not likely to be talked about among the friends of the patient. The fact, also, that few cases of abuse had been made public said little, for relatives were averse to bringing such cases forward.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the subject was an interesting one, though in some respects of a painful character; and if he asked their Lordships not to agree with the Motion of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Milltown), it was not because he (the Lord Chancellor) thought that the Lunacy Laws were not capable of improvement or amendment, for such was not the opinion of the noble Earl at the head of the Lunacy Commission (the Earl of Shaftesbury), nor of those who had investigated the subject, but because he thought it would be very unwise, on a subject of so much importance and difficulty, to pass a Resolution which contained a wholesale condemnation of the existing state of the law, as being eminently unsatisfactory, together with some exaggeration with regard to the way in which the present law affected the liberty of the subject. He fully admitted that there were some things in their Lunacy Laws which were not as satisfactory as they might be; but he was sure that their Lordships would be most anxious to preserve an equally balanced mind in dealing with a subject of such difficulty and importance, and not run the risk of defeating a salutary object, for the sake of obviating conceivable and possible, but, in his opinion, chiefly theoretical, dangers. It must be remembered, in the first place, that the Lunacy Laws were meant for lunatics, and not for sane people; and that they must be such as might be calculated to deal wisely and properly with the lamentable fact that there were, at all times, a large number of persons requiring treatment for mental diseases. When the Commissioners made their Report in 1878 there were over 66,000 lunatics, and he feared it was probable that, at the present time, that number had considerably increased. These unhappy persons must be dealt with, not only for their own sakes, but for the sake of the community at large; they must be taken care of for their own sakes, in order that they might be cured, and might not become the prey of designing persons; and for the sake of the community, that they might not, being at large, become dangerous to other persons as well as to themselves. In these circumstances, wise and proper laws, humanely administered, were necessary as safeguards by which the safety of lunatics and of the community at large could alone be secured. Dealing with the objections which had been urged, he considered, first, the too great facilities which were said to exist for placing persons not lunatics in confinement; and he thought that it was a very exaggerated view of the case, to say that anyone in the street might demand that another person, a perfect stranger to him, should be dealt with as a lunatic, and that, upon the certificate of any two medical men, with certain exceptions, this person might be confined in an asylum. He maintained that no more risks were run in this direction than were incurred in other directions every day. Looking to the result of every public investigation under the existing law which this matter had received, and especially to the last careful examination in 1878, he thought it was not too much to say that the proportion of cases in which there was any reason to suppose that grave abuses took place was infinitesimal.

small, in comparison with the cases in which the law had been properly administered. It had also been said, and no doubt there was some degree of truth in the assertion, that, under the existing system, there was a temptation to persons who had an interest in doing so to retain persons in private establishments for the care of lunatics. There might be some persons who wished to shut up their relatives without sufficient grounds for doing so, and such persons might be able to find two medical practitioners to assist them, by giving certificates of lunacy. These were, undoubtedly, points in the law requiring careful attention, and as to which every safeguard, which did not go too far in the opposite direction, ought to be adopted. It should be remembered that some of the cases which had been referred to by the Lord Chief Justice were absolute breaches of the law, and no system of law, however good, would prevent all persons from committing a breach of it. It was well worth while, however, to consider whether it was not possible to amend the present law, and so diminish the possibility of dangers and risks in the abuse or evasion of it at present existing, without throwing impediments in the way of a proper administration on the subject generally. The Commissioners, in their Report of 1878, showed the system in operation in Scotland of what were called emergency certificates, and suggested an amendment in the law in that direction; and, without binding himself to those suggestions in every detail, he might say that he agreed entirely with what was there said as to the extreme importance, while providing reasonable and proper safeguards against abuse, of placing no impediments in the way of as speedy a means as possible of dealing with the first symptoms of disease. The evidence on all sides proved the absolute necessity there was in promptly dealing with the first symptoms of derangement; and then came the question, whether it was not necessary to run some risks in order not to diminish the chances of cure to a large number of persons? But, in the meantime, it must not be forgotten by their Lordships that there were important, and generally very efficient, checks and safeguards under the present system—medical certificates and visitations, both by the Lunacy Commissioners and by Visitors appointed by the Court of Chancery, none of whom had any personal or pecuniary interest in the cases which they had to visit and inquire into. Careful Reports were made; and in any case to which special attention was called, these Reports were followed up by further inquiries, and the consequences to medical practitioners of any malpractices with regard to dealing with lunatics were very serious indeed. He thought everything that could possibly be done was done by the visits of the Commissioners and the Visitors. He frequently received letters from unfortunate patients, in which they stated their own views of their own cases; and he always desired, where the matter justified it, special Reports to be made by the Visitors in such cases; but he was bound to say that the letters themselves generally contained internal evidence of some unsoundness of mind; and, in some cases, where they contained no such evidence, further inquiry showed that, although the unfortunate persons were capable of acting and writing like sane persons, yet, at other times, they were not only of unsound mind, but positively dangerous. As to private asylums, he had not sufficient knowledge to enable him to controvert the terms in which his noble Friend the Lord Chief Justice (Lord Coleridge) had spoken of the owners of these houses; but, at the same time, he was unable to corroborate him, for it was within his knowledge that there were some, and not a few, of these establishments which were conducted by men of the highest character and of great professional attainments. He was sure the noble Lord must feel that the subject was one of the most difficult branches of the Lunacy Laws, and it was one which was carefully considered by the Committee of 1878. The Report showed that it was a subject upon which there existed the greatest diversity of opinion, and the decision at which the Committee arrived was that the matter had better be left to the spontaneous action of the public. Some thought that these private asylums should be immediately abolished; but others thought that they met an acknowledged want. The matter was very much debated, and a Bill by Mr. Dillwyn, of a very moderate character, was passed in the other House; but it failed to pass through their Lordships'

House. Another Member of the House of Commons afterwards moved a Resolution that all lunatics should be brought under the care of the State, and that was rejected by a large majority. Everyone must desire that lunatics should be treated as well as possible, and made as comfortable as circumstances would permit. Those lunatics who had considerable property were entitled to have their comfort provided for as far as possible. They must be put into the care of some persons, whether they kept licensed houses or not, to whom the expenditure must be entrusted. The inquiry which had been held by the Committee showed that no serious abuses existed, and that great improvements had taken place of late years in the administration of these laws. These improvements were partly begun before, and they had certainly made great progress under the administration of his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) and his Colleagues on the Commission. He must say their Lordships owed to his noble Friend, as the Chairman of the Lunacy Commission, to his Colleagues, and to the Visitors also, their hearty thanks for their great and unceasing labours. In their humane and unquestionably disinterested administration they had the most effectual safeguards which could by any means be devised against the evils to which reference had been made. He would not dwell further on those safeguards; but the Committee of 1878 had recommended certain changes, amongst them greater checks against possible abuses of the Lunacy Laws; and he would undertake, if the Government were still in Office next year, either that himself, or one of his Colleagues, would present to Parliament a Bill, the object of which would be the consolidation of the existing law, with such improvements as were recommended by the Commission of 1878, together with any other changes and amendments in the law which might commend themselves, after due consideration, to the Government. In the meantime, he hoped, under the circumstances, the noble Earl would not divide the House on his Motion.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he hoped that, after the announcement just made by the noble and learned Earl upon the Woolsack, his noble Friend (the Earl of Milltown) would consider that the useful objects of his Motion had been attained, and would not press it to a Division. At the same time, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) felt that the debate to which the Motion had given rise was of a very valuable character, and he thought the existing Lunacy Laws would hardly survive the blow they had received from the speech of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Coleridge). Everyone must admit that the subject was one of extreme difficulty, and that they could not make suggestions in any one direction without seeing evils arise in other directions; but, at the same time, all who had listened would agree that the securities for the liberty of the subject under the Lunacy Laws were very much less than were granted in any other part of the Law of England. The noble and learned Earl upon the Woolsack said that they only made Lunacy Laws for lunatics; but the very gist of the complaint was that these laws were applied to sane people; and it was to avoid their being so applied, that their attention had been directed to the matter. There were, in these cases of illegal restraint, two classes of very obvious motives for abuses of the law. There were many people who, for the sake of property, which they wished to secure, had motives to get rid of relatives whom they might find inconvenient, and whose freedom they might desire to restrict. There were also domestic relations in which one of the parties might have very good reasons for desiring that the other party should no longer possess his or her freedom. Motives of that kind were familiar enough in fiction, and he was afraid they were not altogether strange to real life. On the other hand, there was a strong motive in the keeper of a private asylum to keep wealthy patients, who were showing a tendency to recover, on account of the rich harvest of profit which their maintenance in an asylum gave him. These were very strong and great influences. What facilities did the law give for their counteraction? As far as the initial stages of confining a lunatic were concerned, it seemed that the Law of England afforded absolutely no security for the liberty of the subject. Any person, no matter how deep an interest he might have in shutting you up, had a right to take any two doctors he could find, no matter how obscure, and get an order to shut you up. Who could say there was any security in the initial stages? The whole defence of the present system lay in the measures adopted at a later stage—in the inspection conducted by the Lunacy Commissioners, who had certainly acted with very great assiduity and success. He entirely agreed with the noble and learned Earl as to the great debt of gratitude they all owed to the noble Earl the Chairman of the Commission (the Earl of Shaftesbury) and those who worked with him—it was impossible to exaggerate the debt the country owed to them for having worked a very difficult and thorny part of the law in such a way that no real abuses had arisen; but he thought that the older guardians of English liberty would have been startled, if they had been told that the liberty of any free man was entirely dependent on the vigilance of a Department without any other security whatever. From the point of view of those who were concerned in maintaining freedom, the defect in the administration of these laws was in the utter absence of publicity. If the doctors and the men who signed the certificates had to go before magistrates, and, in open Court, to prove their case; or, if the inspection of the Commissioners was such a public inspection, that all who were concerned and might sympathize with the patient could be witnesses to what was done, there would undoubtedly be adequate security for that liberty which now entirely rested upon the high administrative and moral qualities shown by his noble Friend and his Colleagues. He hoped they might long continue to be at the service of the State; but, under these circumstances, no one would say that the state of the law was satisfactory when that was the sole defence for its present state, and the motive for abusing the law was sometimes so strong. It might, however, be said that if this publicity were insisted upon, the necessary result would be that the feelings of families would in many cases lead to clandestine imprisonments taking place. He considered that the noble Earl (the Earl of Milltown) had made out his case, and shown that the state of the law was not satisfactory. On the other hand, he thought the noble and learned Earl (the Lord Chancellor) had indicated the difficulties of dealing with this particular branch of the law. After his statement, and the promise that the law should be amended, he thought it would be a great mistake to go to Division on the Motion.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that he hoped the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack would see his way to increasing the number of Chancery Visitors, and of extending their inspection beyond the Chancery lunatics. The emulation between them and the Commissioners' Visitors would be a good thing for the lunatics. It had been said that evening, that insanity could be more easily cured in its initial stage; that was true, but it was also true that the despair caused to the inmates of asylums, on finding themselves hopelessly locked up, often aggravated their disorder, and would increase a slight derangement into raving madness.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, that, in view of the proposal of the Government to introduce legislation at a future date, he would withdraw his Motion. His object had been more than gained by the very interesting discussion that had taken place, and by the promise he had obtained from the Government. He was still of opinion, however, that the arguments advanced in favour of his Motion had not been answered, and that, in fact, they were unanswerable.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE WESTERN PACIFIC—DEPORTATION OF FRENCH RECIDIVISTS.

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

EARL GRANVILLE, in reference to a Motion on the Paper of the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery), who proposed to call attention to the proposed deportation of recidivists from France to the Western Pacific; and to move for Papers, said, he had already spoken to his noble Friend on the subject of the Motion of which he had given Notice. It was a subject of great importance; but he had urged on his noble Friend that, on the whole, it would be desirable that its discussion should be postponed.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he had little difficulty whatever in acceding to the request of his noble Friend to postpone his Motion for a time. At the same time, he wished to observe that there was nothing in the Motion, or in what he intended to say, that could, in any way, interfere with the negotiations which he understood were in progress, or wound the just susceptibilities of any neighbouring Power. He only agreed to postpone his Motion, because he thought the course suggested by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was the one best calculated to gain the object they all had at heart; and he did so more heartily, because he believed an early opportunity would occur when the subject could be fully and fairly discussed, and without prejudice, and when the feeling of the House might be elicited as to a proposition which could not fail to have the greatest effects.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had not given the House the reasons which induced him to request his noble Friend to postpone the Motion. He hoped there was a substantial consideration for taking that course, and that it meant the very serious consideration of the subject by the Government, with a view of arriving at some definite and satisfactory understanding. He was aware that negotiations of an important character with the French Government were going on with the view of overcoming difficulties; and so long as those negotiations held out a reasonable promise of a successful issue, he should be sorry to offer any opposition. It was impossible to overrate the importance of the question—a question which, from a variety of reasons, ran the chance of not being fully appreciated in England. He trusted Her Majesty's Government were not blind to the extreme depth of feeling which existed upon the subject in Australia. If the postponement led to a regular understanding, he should not, in any degree, regret it; but, on the other hand, he hoped it was clearly understood that the matter was being entertained with a view to its settlement. He would be glad to know to what day the Motion was to be postponed?

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) seemed to think he had a monopoly of the knowledge of the importance of the subject. That was not so. The Government very well knew, and were agreed, that it was one of the most important subjects with regard to the Colonies; and it was for that reason that Her Majesty's Government thought, in dealing with it, they ought to be as prudent as possible. On this account he desired that it should be postponed in order that Papers might be completed. The noble Earl had asked some time ago about the diplomatic Correspondence. As a matter of fact, the Papers were not complete. He had been promised an answer from the French Government, which had not yet been received. He had been looking the matter up; and he might mention that he found that, up to the 31st of March, he had, through Lord Lyons, made no fewer than eight representations to the French Government.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON again asked to what date the Motion was postponed?

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: To Monday fortnight.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—VOTE OF THANKS TO OFFICERS AND MEN OF H.M. SEA AND LAND FORCES.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: There have been some unfavourable rumours about the intention of the Government in regard to the Vote of Thanks to the Army in the Soudan; but it is generally advisable to assume that those with whom we have the honour to act are likely to act in a just and generous spirit whenever the Army and Navy are concerned. Considering the deep admiration and respect we all entertain for the gallant services of the Army and Navy, it would be presumptuous on my part to allude to the campaign which has just passed—a campaign which has brought out the conspicuous gallantry of our troops. I will, therefore, content myself with asking Her Majesty's Government, If they can state when they propose moving a Vote of Thanks to the officers and men of Her Majesty's Sea and Land Forces who had taken so distinguished a part in the recent campaign near Suakin?

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that it had always been understood that the noble Viscount (Viscount Enfield) was a firm supporter of Her Majesty's Ministers; and he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) was at a loss to understand why he put this Question, which might be embarrassing to them. The noble Viscount seemed to make no distinction between hostilities carried on in defence of the safety or honour of the country, and these at Suakin, for which there was no justification or reason. Did the noble Viscount ask for a Vote of Thanks for Admiral Hewett for his Proclamation, which had brought so much discredit on the country? He (Lord Stanley of Alderley) felt bound to say that Admiral Hewett had shown all the frankness of the Naval Profession in withdrawing this Proclamation, and in undoing the mischief he had done, as far as that was possible. No reason had been given for these hostilities. He would not do the Government the injustice to suppose that they were for show-off, and to prove that our troops, with all the resources of civilization, could beat men armed with rudimentary weapons, such as swords and spears. It was not to open the road to Berber, since, after these victories, the Government had refused to send on any Cavalry to Berber. It must have been to seize upon Osman Digna. Osman Digna had written a remarkable letter, which showed that he had much knowledge of the internal state of England, and of the fact that a leading portion of the Government had adopted and supported an Atheist openly professing Atheism on all occasions. He would quote the judgment of Milton on similar hostilities. Milton speaks of the Syrian King—"Who, to surprise one man, assassin-like, had levied war, War unproclaimed."

He would always object to Votes of Thanks for hostilities that were piratical.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: In reply to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley of Alderley), I confess I do not see what bearing his remarks have upon the conduct of the troops. In respect to the Question put by my noble Friend behind me (Viscount Enfield), I have to say that Her Majesty's Government have most carefully inquired into and considered the precedents bearing on the point. The decision, whether the Thanks of Parliament should be given, or not, to troops engaged in military operations, does not appear to have depended entirely either on the success of the campaign, or on the severity of the fighting which has occurred. I can assure your Lordships that Her Majesty's Government, and, I am sure, Parliament also, most entirely appreciate the ability displayed by both General Graham and Admiral Hewett in the conduct of the recent operations, and also the great courage and conspicuous gallantry displayed by the troops themselves, and also the sailors who co-operated with them under circumstances which were quite sufficient to try the steadiness and gallantry of any troops. Parliament will also thoroughly appreciate the success which has attended both the ability of the Commanders and the gallantry of the troops. It will be a subject of great regret if the answer I am about to give were to imply any doubt or hesitation on that point; but the Government feel that to move a Vote of Thanks to those engaged in an undertaking which cannot be considered an independent operation, but rather as an incident in the Occupation of Egypt, would give an extension to the practice of voting Thanks which the Government do not think desirable. I may add that the question of the rewards to be conferred on the officers and men engaged is still under the consideration of the military authorities, and the result will shortly be announced.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 191.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS
(POOR LAW) (NO. 10) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, Bill to confirm certain Orders of the Local Government Board, under the provisions of "The Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876," as amended and extended by "The Poor Law Act, 1878," and "The Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882," relating to the Parishes of Charley (two), Eddlesborough, Helmdon, Ivinghoe, Little Gaddesden, Markfield, Marston Saint Lawrence (two), Middleton Cheney, Newtown Linford, Slapton, Syresham, Thenford, and Whitfield, to the Townships of Marnham and South Clifton, and to the Hamlet of Astwell-with-Falcutt, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL and Sir CHARLES DILKE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 192.]

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY BILL.

RESOLUTION.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY: The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company have introduced a Bill into Parliament which has been referred to me in the usual manner as Chairman of Ways and Means, owing to the fact of its being unopposed. I have, however, thought it undesirable, in consequence of having been a Director for many years of that Railway Company, that the Bill should be adjudicated upon by me. I have, therefore, requested the Chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders to take my place, and he has consented to do so. I, therefore, beg to move that the Chairman of the Committee of Standing Orders be appointed Chairman of the Committee of the said Committee on that Bill.

Ordered, That the Chairman of the Committee of Standing Orders be appointed Chairman of the Committee on the said Bill.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON'S MISSION—THE VOTE OF CENSURE (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH).

SIR WILFRID LAWSON gave Notice that he will move the following Amendment to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach):—

"That this House, while regretting that General Gordon has not yet succeeded in bringing to a successful conclusion the mission which he patriotically undertook, declines to censure Her Majesty's Government for not taking steps which would involve Military operations in connection with a mission which was distinctly and avowedly of a pacific nature."

QUESTIONS.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE—CONVICT LABOUR.

MR. MARJORIBANKS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can now state what place on the East Coast of Scotland has been selected for the construction of a harbour of refuge by means of convict labour; and, whether, and, if so, when, the Report of, and Minutes of Evidence taken by, the Sub-Committee of the Committee on Convict Labour, which visited the East Coast of Scotland last autumn, will be presented to the House?

MR. HIBBERT: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that no place has yet been selected, the Report of the Sub-Committee not yet having been laid before the Home Secretary. My right hon. and learned Friend, however, hopes to have that Report laid before him in the course of a few days, and to be in a position to place it on the Table of the House.

ARMY ACT, 1881—FRAUDULENT ENLISTMENT.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any action has been taken in consequence of the amendment of Section 32 of "The Army Act, 1881," by which the power of a court martial to sentence to penal servitude for the offence of fraudulently enlisting after previous discharge with disgrace from any part of Her Majesty's forces was taken away; and, whether he has been able to advise the remission or reconsideration of the 150 or more sentences of penal servitude passed in 1882, 1883, and 1884?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the amendment of the Act had been promulgated to the officers in command, and this would prevent further penalties of penal servitude being passed for this offence. As regarded the men now undergoing sentences of penal servitude, their cases would be considered when they had served two years. He might mention that two years' hard labour was considered a more severe punishment than a similar term of penal servitude.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND)—PETER M'KNIGHT, A CONVICT LUNATIC.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Peter M'Knight was convicted of manslaughter at Belfast Summer Assizes in 1877, and sentenced to five years' penal servitude; whether he was discharged at the end of about four years, but taken prisoner in Liverpool on 21st June 1881, and lodged in a lunatic asylum at Whittingham, Preston; if so, what were the grounds for his being sent to the asylum; and, what are the reasons for his present detention?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had inquired into the matter, and had received a Report from the medical officer that the man was quite unfit to be at large.

ARMY (INDIA)—RE-ORGANIZATION.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Correspondence between the India Office and the Government of India, on the subject of the proposed changes in the Indian Army system, is approaching completion; and, if so, when he will be able to lay it upon the Table?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Correspondence in question is now practically complete; and if the hon. Member will move for it, there will be no objection to presenting it. I may suggest, with regard to the Report of the Commission and the Appendices, which are exceedingly voluminous, that it will be sufficient to place them in the Library without distributing copies.

INDIA—THE KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the sum of £276,000, and other sums, realised as proceeds of the moveable property of the Ex-Princes of Kirwee, and retained by the Indian Government, have been entered in the Returns presented to Parliament in 1876, in partial compliance with the Order of the House dated 23rd July 1874, which called for a Return of all the moveable property taken from those Chiefs; and, whether, and when, the Secretary of State proposes to complete the defective Return, so as to thoroughly fulfil the Order of Parliament?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Papers presented to Parliament in 1876, in compliance with the Order of the House of July 23, 1874, gave a complete Return of the amount of all moveable property of enemies or insurgents in the territories of Oude or Kirwee, or of the proceeds thereof, which passed into the possession of the authorities in India since the outbreak of the War in 1857. The promissory notes representing the sum referred to by the right hon. and gallant Member never at any time passed into the possession of Government. They are, therefore, not included in the Return. Where any such notes were captured, as at Lucknow, they are shown in the Return. As, therefore, the Return was prepared in strict accordance with the Orders of the House, there is no ground for supplementing it. I may add that full information concerning these promissory notes was submitted to the House in an earlier Return, No. 298, dated July 5, 1869.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND) — INTERFERENCE OF THE POLICE AT CASTLESHANE.

MR. SEXTON (for MR. HEALY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that, on MR. FRANCIS M'KENNA, of Annagap, county Monaghan, complaining to the Inspector General of Constabulary that he had been threatened by the police sergeant at Castleshane that, if he interfered in public meetings or took part in politics, he would have his gun licence revoked, he received the following reply:—

“Dublin Castle, 4th April, 1884.

“Francis M'Kenna is informed, with reference to his letter of the 31st ult., that, if he considers the sergeant exceeded his duty in the matter referred to, he should bring the case before the Magistrates at Petty Sessions.

“(Signed) R. F. N. FANNING,

“Deputy Inspector General.”

Do the Government approve of this method of dealing with such a charge; is it the fact that no inquiry whatever was made to discover whether it was correct, or not; will he ascertain from MR. FANNING under what Statute the “Magistrates at Petty Sessions” have power to deal with such a complaint; is he aware that Mr. M'Kenna's statement can be corroborated by four witnesses, in whose presence the threat was made; and, do the Government propose to deal with the case?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is the fact that Francis M'Kenna made to the Inspector General the complaint mentioned in the Question, and that he received the reply referred to. Before the letter had been written, inquiry had been made into the matter, with the result that the Inspector General was informed that the complaint of Mr. M'Kenna was not well-founded, and the police sergeant denies having made any such statement as is imputed to him. The Statute referred to by Mr. Fanning is the 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 13. I am not aware that Mr. M'Kenna's statement can be corroborated by four witnesses, and the letter of Mr. M'Kenna treats the communication from the constable as a private one. The Government do not intend to take any further action.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882 — COMPENSATION FOR MALICIOUS BURNING — THE GRAND JURY OF FERMANAGH.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that the Fermanagh Grand Jury ignored the Bill sent up against a man named Beatty, whom the magistrates had returned for trial on a charge of having set fire to his house on December the 10th; that his landlord is now seeking compensation from the same grand jury for malicious injury to the house, and that, while the grand jurors would not allow the case to come before a court for investigation, they will now proceed to assess damages over a particular area; and, if he can say how this area will be arrived at?

MR. TREVELYAN: Beatty was committed for trial on a charge of burning a house of which he was formerly tenant, but the Grand Jury ignored the Bill. The landlord is not seeking compensation for the malicious burning, the person who is seeking it is the person who succeeded Beatty under certain letters of administration. This case will come on before the Presentment Sessions on the 24th of the month, and it will not come before the Grand Jury unless the Sessions decide the burning was malicious. It is impossible in that event to say what will be the area on which the tax will be fixed; but the Grand Jury will, of course, consider the whole case when it comes before them.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—MOUNTJOY PRISON—WARDERS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that in filling up the vacancy for chief warden in Mountjoy Prison recently three principal warders were passed over, and an ordinary warden, their junior in the service, appointed; is it the fact that the latter is a Protestant, and that the three men passed over were Catholics; can he explain what were the superior qualifications possessed by the man who got the post, and in what the others were deficient; and, is it the case that in the Irish Convict Service Catholic principal warders are refused the supply of fuel and light for their houses, afforded to Protestants holding the same situations?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, the man who was promoted was considered by the Prisons Board as the most suitably experienced. He was a Protestant, and was one of the men passed over. The appointment of a Protestant was considered desirable. The object was to equalize the number of Protestants and Roman Catholics in the higher grades, the Deputy Governor and senior chief warden being Catholics. As regards the last paragraph, no difference was made between Protestant and Roman Catholic warders in respect of fuel and light. The ground for that suggestion might be found in the fact that one of the principal warders who had been transferred to another position was entitled by the terms of his promotion to fire and light.

MR. O'BRIEN: I invite the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that of the 41 warders discharged from Spike Island 39 are Roman Catholics; and I would ask how he can explain that, whereas in every position open to fair competition Catholics are at least as well able to hold their own in every position where appointments is by favour or under official management, Protestants predominate almost invariably?

[No reply was given.]

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE 4TH
LINCOLNSHIRE MILITIA.

MR. ROUNDELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that, on the 18th of April, Private Slater, of the 4th Lincolnshire Battalion of Militia, having spit whilst on parade, was ordered by the Adjutant, Captain Hodson, to fall out of the ranks; that thereupon the Adjutant ordered him an extra half-hour's drill with a stone in his mouth; that, in consequence of the refusal of Private Slater to submit to such an order, he was ordered by the Adjutant to be handcuffed, and was locked up for the night in a cell; that, on the following morning (Saturday, the 19th instant), Private Slater was brought before the Adjutant and charged with having refused to drill for half an hour with a stone in his mouth; that, in consequence, he was sentenced by the Adjutant to forty-eight hours in the cells with hard labour, which consisted of breaking stones for road-mending; and that this sentence was accordingly carried out; and, if the above is substantially accurate, whether the proceedings of the Adjutant are in accordance with the Regulations of the Queen?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: As a matter of fact, the man was not sentenced to drill with a stone in his mouth; but he was threatened with that punishment. The punishment actually inflicted was for gross insubordination in the ranks. The adjutant was wrong in threatening a punishment which is not authorized by the Regulations, and he would be reprimanded.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR.
CHARLES KELLY, Q.C., COUNTY COURT JUDGE FOR CLARE.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Mr. Charles Kelly, Q.C., County Court Judge for Clare, is in the habit of adjourning cases for hearing from one division to another merely to suit his own convenience, and to the serious dissatisfaction of the public; if, in the case of a farmer named Michael Fitzpatrick, who sought to attach the salary of a process server named Griffin for the amount of a decree obtained against him (Griffin) at a former quarter sessions, the case was adjourned from Ennistymon to Ennis and back again without the slightest necessity for such a course; if it is possible to ascertain the number of similar instances in which litigants have been put to great expense in trivial cases by the action of Mr. Kelly; and, whether steps may not be taken to remedy the state of facts complained of?

MR. TREVELYAN: County Court Judges are not responsible to the Executive Government for the manner in which they exercise their judicial functions; but I thought it right, as this Question was put on the Notice Paper, that its terms should be submitted to the Judge named, for any observations that he might desire to offer with regard to it. He writes as follows:—

"Sir, although in strictness I ought not to make any statement to the Government with respect to the discharge of my judicial functions, I have no hesitation in saying that the imputations contained in the Parliamentary Notice enclosed in your letter are absolutely and entirely groundless. In justice to me I trust that this answer will be read in the House."

PERSON—CASE OF THE BROTHERS
DELAHUNTY.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If certain information has been conveyed to the Irish Government concerning the conviction of two brothers name Delahunt, who were sentenced, at the Cork Winter Assizes of 1882, to penal servitude for life, for the alleged crime of firing into the house of a person named Donnellan, near Feakle, county Clare; if the chief witness for the Crown (Slattery) has since made a dying declaration, in which it is set forth that these men have been wrongfully convicted, and prays for their release; if he will give the full terms of the said declaration, and if the case of the Delahuntys has been, or is under, the consideration of the Irish Government; and, if he can state either the result of such consideration, or the probable date at which it will be made known?

MR. TREVELYAN: The evidence against the Delahuntys was complete and conclusive. The man Slattery, referred to in the Question, was not the chief witness for the Crown, and was not a witness in the case at all, nor is it a fact that he made a declaration that the Delahuntys were wrongfully convicted. What he stated in the declaration was that a witness was instigated by him to swear he saw the shot fired; and he further alleges that the police constable asked him to get a person to swear that he heard the shot fired. The evidence of Martin was unimportant; and the case was complete without him. The Government believe that no reliance is to be placed on Slattery's declaration, and do not, therefore, intend to interfere with the course of the law. As regards the declaration itself, I will furnish the hon. Member with a copy of it if he so desires; but I do not consider it necessary to lay it on the Table of the House.

MR. KENNY: I would wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if this declaration does not also contain a statement to the effect that the case was concocted by a police constable, named Halloran, and a Resident Magistrate, Mr. Burke, who has since been dismissed?

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member will, perhaps, give Notice of the Question.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—SEC. 18—EXTRA POLICE, CO. LONGFORD.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, On what grounds the Irish Executive have given notice of their intention to send a police hut and an extra police force for the protection of Mr. John M'Guire, of Loran, in the county of Longford; and, whether any outrages whatever have been committed in the district which justify its subjection to this increase of taxation?

MR. TREVELYAN: John M'Guire has been subjected to great annoyance and "Boycotting"—a bad feeling against him having been caused amongst some persons in the district in consequence, it is thought, of his father-in-law having taken an evicted farm. The police believed M'Guire to be in great danger, and two men were placed in his house for his protection. They are not chargeable to the district. The Government have not given any such notice as is stated in the Question of an intention to send a police hut and extra police to the district. But inquiry has been made as to whether a suitable site for a hut could be had, in the event of its being considered necessary to erect one.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)— THE CHIEF CLERK IN INSOLVENCY.

DR. LYONS (for Mr. FAY) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the fact that the first clerk in insolvency at the Court of Bankruptcy has performed in Ireland the duties of chief clerk in insolvency since the death of that official in 1881 without having received any remuneration for such additional work?

MR. COURTNEY: The statement is correct; but the duties in question are almost nominal. The clerk is adequately paid for all his duties.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES (IRELAND)— THE PROFESSOR OF ANATOMY (QUEEN'S COLLEGE, CORK).

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the Professor of Anatomy in the Queen's College, Cork, has, for the past two or three sessions, introduced a new rule, whereby he engages two students simultaneously in dissecting each part; whether this professor is making a profit of over £100 a-year out of the subjects supplied to the Cork Medical School, which is not included in the Return of class fees presented to Parliament; whether this course is legal, and will be permitted to continue; is it a fact that, when the new rule was first introduced, a requisition, signed by a large number of students (including graduates) of every religious denomination, was presented to the President of the College, asking him to permit a meeting to be convened within the College, to discuss the matter privately; did he refuse to do so, and threaten a member of the deputation who waited on him that, if the matter were brought before Parliament, he would be held responsible; and, will the Royal Commission be empowered to inquire into the above matters; and, if not, what steps will he take to investigate the complaints of the students?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Professor of Anatomy informs me that he has made no such rule; but that occasionally, as a matter of extreme necessity, the plan mentioned has been resorted to. The entire amount of the fees paid by students for attending at the Anatomical School is expended in connection with the support of the school, no portion whatever being retained by the Professor for his own use. These fees are not class fees, and, therefore, are not included in any Return of class fees. I have already stated, in reply to a former Question, that the reference to the Commission would include this subject. With regard to an alleged refusal on the part of the President to comply with a requisition, I have to point out that if the students have any matter of that kind to complain of, the College statutes provide them with a remedy by application to the Visitors.

MR. O'BRIEN: Is there any official supervision over the administration of those fees?

MR. TREVELYAN: There is the supervision of the authorities of the College. I have already said the subject is going before the Commission.

POST OFFICE—TELEPHONE EXCHANGES.

MR. GORST (for Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF) asked the Postmaster General, The number of telephone exchange wires now in use at Post Office Telephone Exchanges in the United Kingdom; the number of private telephone wires rented from the Post Office; the cost thereof respectively; the revenue derived therefrom respectively; and, the revenue which would be derivable therefrom respectively if erected and maintained by private companies at their own cost under Post Office licences, calculated at the average rate for royalties now charged by the Department to private companies.

MR. FAWCETT: The Post Office, on the 31st of March last, had 783 subscribers to its systems of telephone exchanges for rentals, amounting to £16,983 per annum. As it would take much time to ascertain the number of private wires rented from the Post Office which are worked by telegraph and telephone apparatus respectively, I am sorry I am not able to answer the hon. Member's second Question. If the telephone exchange lines of the department were provided by the Private Telephone Companies at the same rentals, the royalty payable would be £1,698 per annum. No royalty is payable to the Post Office in respect of private wires—that is, wires used for private messages, as defined by the Act of 1869, erected and maintained by persons outside the Department. So far, therefore, as this business might be done by private individuals, no revenue would be received by the Post Office.

DR. CAMERON asked the Postmaster General, The amount of royalties received by the Post Office last year from Telephone Companies for licences to such Companies to use their own instruments, at their own expense, for exchange and other purposes; the original rate of percentage for such royalties; whether the Department has recently increased the percentage in the case of new or extended licences; and, whether in recent cases it has also sought to impose a minimum actual royalty, irrespective of reductions in the charges of the Companies to the public?

MR. FAWCETT: The amount of royalties received by the Post Office in the year ended 31st December last from Telephone Companies for licences to carry on business which has been legally decided to be telegraphic was £15,556. The original rate of percentage was 10 per cent, increased in a few cases of extension of radius. In reply to my hon. Friend's last Question, I may say that in new licences the percentage is no greater; but a minimum royalty of £1 is payable.

MR. GRAY: Would the right hon. Gentleman say why an extra charge is made in a licence for an extra radii?

MR. FAWCETT: Because it is doing more business.

MR. GRAY: Then the more business is done, the higher the percentage you pay.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS—STATE- MENT OF COST.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he would consider the desirableness of adopting a custom, which is said to prevail in the Colony of Victoria, of giving on the first page of every Paper printed for Parliamentary use a statement of its cost, "expense of preparing this Paper, so much," "expense of printing, so much," so that not only honourable Members who are gluttons in respect of "Returns," but their constituents also, may know what is the cost to the Country of the Returns moved by Members?

MR. COURTNEY: I fully sympathize with the hon. Member's desire to check the growth of the costs of Parliamentary printing in respect of Returns; but I am afraid that the adoption of the custom said to prevail in Victoria would avail little. In 1875, on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), a Return was presented giving the figures for that year and the sale of those Papers, showing also what cost each Member had entailed on the country; but no appreciable effect was produced; there has been an increase rather than a diminution of cost. The point shall, however, be brought under the attention of the Committee now engaged in considering the public expenditure in stationery and printing.

Mr. Trevelyan

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—WICKLOW CO.—APPOINTMENT OF MR. MARTIN LANGTON.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that a Memorial has been presented to the Earl of Meath, Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Wicklow, signed by forty-five of the principal Roman Catholic inhabitants of Bray, including the Very Rev. Walter Lee, D.D., P.P., V.G., Dean of the Cathedral Chapter of Dublin, and the local Roman Catholic Clergy, recommending the name of Mr. Martin Langton as a fit and proper person to be appointed to the Commission of the Peace for the county; whether it was stated to Lord Meath, as a ground for the appointment, that—

"Mr. Langton has taken a deep and active part in the cause of temperance. . . . he is a grand juror at the quarter sessions, and has acted frequently on special juries during the last twelve years;"

whether, notwithstanding these qualifications, and the strength and character of the recommendations, Lord Meath replied—

"I do not consider him in any way suited to the discharge of the duties;"

whether he is aware that, out of the 104 magistrates for Wicklow, only five are Roman Catholics, and these not all residents in the county, and that there is no Catholic magistrate in Bray Petty Sessions district; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will bring the matter under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor with a view to Mr. Langton's appointment?

MR. TREVELYAN: I believe that the statements in the Question are substantially accurate. With regard to the last paragraph, I may say that I understand that a Memorial embodying these statements is at present before the Lord Chancellor.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—SUMMONSES AT NEWTOWNBARRY.

MR. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the cases under the Prevention of Crime Act, against Peter Kehoe and James Kennedy, brought on at Newtownbarry, county Wexford, on the 23rd February last, the summonses were issued at the instance of the head constable without his having received any authority from his superior officers; whether the head constable afterwards went to the defendants and asked them to give back the copies of the summonses, informing them that the cases would not be heard; whether, notwithstanding this, the cases were called, and the district inspector then asked them to be adjourned so that he might prosecute; and, whether the Constabulary at Newtownbarry are in the habit of issuing summonses under the Prevention of Crime Act without authority, and whether any steps will be taken to prevent them doing so?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that although the head constable had not actually been ordered to serve the summonses in these cases, he had been instructed to have them ready for hearing at the Prevention of Crime Act Court on the 23rd of February. It was expected that the authority would be received previous to the holding of the Court; but when it was found that it could not be issued until after that date, the defendants were informed that their cases would not be proceeded with on the 23rd. This was done by direction of the District Inspector, and in order to save the defendants from being put to the inconvenience of attending the Court. They attended nevertheless, and the cases were called formally, merely for the purpose of adjourning them—the Constabulary paying costs. The cases were prosecuted on a later date. It is not the case that the Constabulary at Newtownbarry are in the habit of issuing summonses without authority.

THE HOMERTON SMALL-POX HOS-PITAL.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that the Medical Officer of Health for Hackney has reported that the re-opening of the Homerton Hospital of the Metropolitan Asylums Board for small-pox patients is causing a spread of that disease in its vicinity; whether he is aware that the Diseases Prevention (Metropolis) Bill (by the alteration in the existing Law effected by Clauses 1 and 2) took away from the public the legal protection they hitherto possessed against the Asylums Board, or other similar authorities, so conducting their hospitals as to cause disease to spread therefrom; and, if so, if he could explain why no intimation was given to Parliament of a proceeding so seriously effecting the rights, and even the lives, of the public; whether, in any authority given by the Local Government Board to the Asylum Board for using their hospitals for small-pox or fever patients, he will stipulate that such user must be contingent on their being able to prevent disease spreading therefrom; and, whether, in the event of any application being made by Government to Parliament for an extension of the Diseases Prevention (Metropolis) Act beyond the 1st September next, he will undertake that there shall be no general power asked for which will deprive the public of the legal protection they previously had against hospitals proved to be so conducted as to spread disease?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Local Government Board have no information as to the Report of the Medical Officer of Health for Hackney beyond that which has appeared in the public Press; but they learn from the Chairman of the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylums Board that that Report will be the subject of inquiry by the Managers. I may, however, say that the Managers are making special efforts to prevent any possible risk of the spread of small-pox from the hospital, not only by largely reducing the number of patients in the building, but by clearing adjacent properties, which have been purchased by the Managers for the purpose of securing a free space around the hospital. As regards the Act of last Session, Clause 1 merely gives the short title of the Act. As to Clause 2, it was not intended by that enactment to take away from the public any legal protection which they previously possessed against the Asylums Managers or any other Local Authority carrying on a hospital in such a manner as to cause the spread of disease; neither is it considered by the Board that such is the effect of the clause. The clause, in effect, provides that if the Diseases Prevention Act is put in force, and the Managers of the Asylum district are called upon to exercise powers as a Local Authority under that Act, they may utilize the buildings, &c., which they have provided for small-pox and fever cases for patients suffering from the epidemic disease which has led to the Statute being put in force. The Diseases Prevention Act never has been brought into operation in consequence of an epidemic either of fever or small-pox; and the Board have never contemplated its being put in force except in the case of an outbreak of cholera. The Board have always endeavoured to secure such arrangements in connection with the fever and small-pox hospitals of the Asylums Board as would prevent disease spreading therefrom; and they are fully satisfied that the Managers desire to take all due precautionary measures against such a result. The Board, for the reasons mentioned, do not consider that an extension of the Act will take away from the public any protection which they previously possessed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—THE GOLD COINAGE.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he has any Estimate to show what is the yearly loss from abrasion or wear and tear of the coined gold in circulation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): The most trustworthy recent Estimate of the loss from the wear and tear of the gold coins in circulation is that each sovereign and half-sovereign loses more than four hundredths of a grain of its weight every year, the half-sovereign losing twice as much proportionately as the whole sovereign. It follows that to make good the yearly deficiency of the metal in the present standard of gold coinage, if, as is estimated, that consists of £90,000,000 in sovereigns and £20,000,000 in half-sovereigns, the cost would approach £50,000 a-year, exclusive of the cost of re-coinage, and this amount would be increased by an increased circulation. The noble Lord will find some interesting particulars in the Joint Report of Mr. Graham, late Master of the Mint, and of Colonel Smith, the Master of the Calcutta Mint, laid before Parliament in 1869.

EGYPT—ENGAGEMENTS OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the engagements earnestly to support the Government of the Khedive, which were made by the late Government on 19th September 1879 and by the present Government on 3rd March 1881 respectively, ought not to have been communicated to the Sultan of Turkey as the Suzerain; and, whether either of them was so communicated; and, if so, at what date?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Neither of these engagements were communicated to the Sultan. His Majesty was, however, aware of the position of England and France in regard to Tewfik Pasha, inasmuch as it was at their request that he issued the Firman to His Highness in August, 1879. The Papers upon the subject were laid before Parliament in 1880 (Egypt, No. 1).

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—VOTE OF THANKS TO THE OFFICERS AND MEN OF H.M. SEA AND LAND FORCES.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he could now state if it is proposed to move a Vote of Thanks to Admiral Hewett and General Graham, and Officers and Men under their command, for the recent operations on the Red Sea littoral; and, what rewards, if any, are to be given to these Officers?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Her Majesty's Government have very carefully considered the precedents bearing upon this question. The decision of whether or not the Thanks of Parliament should be given to troops engaged in military operations does not appear to have depended entirely on either the success of the campaign or on the severity of the fighting which occurred. Her Majesty's Government, and, I am sure, Parliament also, most entirely appreciate the ability which has been displayed by General Graham and Admiral Hewett in the conduct of these operations, and also the courage and high military qualities which have been exhibited by the officers and men under their command, as well as the success which they achieved. It would be a subject of very great regret to the Government if the answer I have to give to the Question of the hon. Members should be supposed for a moment to imply any doubt whatever on our part on that point; but it appears to us that to move a formal Vote of Thanks for that expedition, which cannot be considered as an independent operation, but rather as an incident in the military occupation of Egypt, would be to give an extension to the practice beyond former precedents, which we should not consider desirable. In answer to the last part of the Question, with regard to the rewards to be conferred on the officers and men in connection with the expedition, the subject is still under consideration, and the decision of the Government will shortly be announced.

MR. ONSLOW asked whether the Government did not look upon the recent campaign in the Soudan as a separate transaction in no way connected with the operations undertaken by Lord Wolseley at the time of Tel-el-Kebir?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: That Question appears to raise a matter of argument.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE AFRICAN INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

MR. A. H. BROWN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true that the African International Association has recently concluded Treaties with the Native Chiefs in the Valley of the Congo and Keislu containing clauses excluding all traders except their own from those regions? He also wished to ask whether there was any truth in the report that negotiations were in progress whereby the French were to recognize the flag of the African International Association, and were to have the first offer to trade in the event of the present owners being willing to dispose of the same?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes, Sir. The Treaties will be laid before Parliament. The second Question relates to an important matter, and I would ask the hon. Member to give Notice.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—CATHOLIC CHAPLAIN FOR MILITIAMEN AT CARRICKFERGUS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that over 200 Roman Catholic militiamen, quartered at Carrickfergus, are without a chaplain; and, whether he is prepared to furnish sufficient funds to have the deficiency remedied?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I can only repeat the answer I gave on the 21st of April—that it is not in my power to increase the allowance laid down by Regulation. That allowance is found to be adequate in other similar cases.

INLAND REVENUE—THE LEGACY DUTY.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the recent Act, which abolished Legacy Duty at one pound per cent., applies to legacies derived from Indian investments; and, if not, why this distinction has been enforced?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): The short answer to the hon. Member's Question would be that Legacy Duty at 1 per cent is only abolished by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act (44 Vict., c. 12) in cases where the estates are already subject to Probate Duty. Indian investments technically known as bona notabilia are liable to Probate Duty, and consequently exempt from 1 per cent Legacy Duty. Indian investments not liable to Probate Duty are liable to Legacy Duty if the deceased died domiciled in this country.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—DISQUALIFICATION OF LICENSED PUBLICANS (MR. MANGAN, HIGH SHERIFF OF DROGHEDA).

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What steps the Government have taken in the case of Mr. Mangan, High Sheriff of Drogheda, who holds a retail beer and spirit licence contrary to the Statute?

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Alderman Mangan, High Sheriff of Drogheda, whose tenure of the office of sheriff has been assailed because he is the holder of a retail licence, was also lately called to account as to the composition of the Grand Jury panel, which proved, in the result, to be unimpeachable; whether an unsuccessful attempt has been made to induce the Government to cause the removal of the assizes from the town of which Alderman Mangan is sheriff; whether a gentleman, Mr. Edward M'Donough, who held the office of High Sheriff of Drogheda in a recent year, was, during the year of his shrievalty, the holder of a retail licence for the sale of liquor to be consumed on the premises, and Mr. Nicholas Leech, T.C., High Sheriff of Drogheda in 1880, was, during the year of his shrievalty, the holder of two retail licences for the sale of liquor to be consumed on the premises; whether other cases have not likewise occurred in recent years, in which gentlemen holding the office of High Sheriff have not also held such licences; whether the Lord Lieutenant, in ratifying the nomination (by the Corporation of Drogheda) of Alderman Mangan to the office of High Sheriff, was not aware that Alderman Mangan was, at the time, the holder of the licence; whether the Statute of William the Fourth, referring to this matter, has become inoperative through disuse; and, whether the precedents cited are to be followed, or whether Alderman Mangan is to be treated in an exceptional manner?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Government have not yet communicated with Mr. Mangan. I have been in consultation with the authorities in Dublin on the subject. I think the commission will go to Mr. Mangan to-morrow. The hon. Member for Sligo is aware that the constitution of the Grand Jury panel was the subject of a recent Question in this House, and the result should also be in his recollection. The hon. Member is also aware that the attention of the Government has been drawn to the suggestions which have, from time to time, been made as to the removal of the Assizes from the town of Drogheda, and that the Government have been advised that the Assizes could not be abolished without legislation. It is the case that the gentlemen named by the hon. Member were licensed publicans when appointed to the office of High Sheriff, and continued to carry on their trade; and it is not unlikely that there have been other instances of the kind; but the case of Mr. Mangan is the first in which attention has been drawn to the manner in which the Statute of Will. IV. affects such cases. The holding of a licence is not a disqualification for the office of Sheriff, and it is for the consideration of any person seeking the office whether he will accept it with the condition annexed by law of giving up acting under his licence. I am advised that the Act is not inoperative through disuse. I have already said, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), that the Government are considering the terms in which they will communicate with Mr. Mangan. He has been placed in this difficulty—that the attention of the Government was not called to it before his appointment.

MR. SEXTON: If this practically obsolete Statute is put into force against Mr. Mangan, I shall call the Government to account.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I shall ask the Solicitor General for Ireland tomorrow, Whether all licences in Ireland, and, indeed, in the United Kingdom, are not granted under this Act of Will. IV.?

TURKEY—THE EUROPEAN PROVINCES —CHRISTIANS IN MACEDONIA.

MR. BRYCE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as reported from Macedonia to The Manchester Guardian, that the Turkish authorities in Macedonia are again resorting to wholesale arrest and transportation of the more wealthy and respectable members of the Christian community; whether it is the fact that, during the last twelve months, a considerable number of innocent persons have been arrested in Macedonia by the Turks, and sent to prisons in Asia Minor; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have remonstrated, or will remonstrate, with the Porte against such proceedings, and again press upon its attention the 23rd Article of the Treaty of Berlin?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Information from a private source to the above effect has been received, and was forwarded to Lord Dufferin in the ordinary course. The internal condition of the Ottoman Empire in Europe has not been the subject of any very recent communications.

MR. BRYCE: Is there any objection on the part of the Foreign Office to address an inquiry to Mr. Blunt, Her Majesty's Consul at Salonica?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Lord Dufferin will, no doubt, make the necessary inquiries.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: May I ask if similar inquiries have been made by other Governments as to whether similar proceedings were not perpetrated by Her Majesty's Government in Ireland?

[No reply.]

SCOTLAND—AGRICULTURAL TENANTS IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS —NOTICES TO QUIT.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to the issue of notices of removal being served upon tenants in the Highlands and Islands, whose holdings are yearly tenancies; if such notices have been served upon the old practice of forty days since the 1st of January 1884, in contravention of the following Clause in the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883:—Clause 21, sub-section (b)—

"In the case of leases from year to year, or for any period less than three years, not less than six months before the termination of the lease;"

and if such notices of forty days are now legal?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I understand it is the fact that since 1st January, 1884, certain notices of removal have been served upon tenants in the Highlands and Islands, who hold as yearly tenants upon 40 days' warning prior to Whit Sunday. It is not usual, in answer to Questions in this House, to give legal opinions in regard to matters in difference between private persons; but as the point raised in the Question is of general interest, I have no objection to state my view with respect to it. In the case of a yearly lease which expires at Whit Sunday next, I do not think that a 40 days' notice is in contravention of Clause 28, sub-section 6, of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. That Act only came into force on January 1, 1884, so that the six months' notice required by it in the case of yearly leases could not possibly be given between January 1 and Whit Sunday, and the Act is not declared to be retrospective. It therefore appears to me that until the Act has been at least six months in operation, so as to make a six months' notice under it possible, the former law as to notice must remain in force. Any other construction would involve the startling result that the Act would constitute a statutory and compulsory renewal for a year, against landlords and tenants alike, of all leases expiring at Whit Sunday next—a thing which was certainly never intended, and was not even suggested, when the Bill was before Parliament.

MR. MACFARLANE: With reference to the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I wish to ask this further Question—If his attention has been called to the wording of the clause, as quoted in my Question, requiring six months' notice, not after the passing of the Act, but before the termination of the lease? Is there anything in this Act passed in August last year which would prevent a landlord from giving six months' notice last October? This Act is merely to prevent eviction, and not to prevent giving notice. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not answer the Question, I will put it on the Paper.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): I have answered it already. I am familiar with the Act irrespective of the Question; and I have already stated that, in my judgment, the Act is in no degree retrospective.

MR. MACFARLANE: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman say it would have been unlawful to have given notice in October last?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): That would not have been, in my judgment, a notice under the statute at all, because the statute had not come into operation.

The Lord Advocate

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—THE GOLD COINAGE— MELTING FOR MANUFACTURING PURPOSES.

MR. PULESTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the extensive practice said to be adopted by jewellers of melting gold coin for manufacturing purposes, the effect of the issue of half-sovereigns below their nominal value will be to increase the use of sovereigns for the melting pots, and for which the new issues will be specially eligible; and, whether the only practical check on this practice of melting new coin is found in the brittleness which occasionally characterises Minted sovereigns; and, if so, whether the use of brittle copper as an alloy, or some similar method of counteracting the "toughness" of sovereigns alloyed with pure silver or copper could not be adopted, with a view to the discontinuance of such melting?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): With respect to the first Question of the hon. Gentleman, we have no statistics of the comparative melting down by jewellers of sovereigns and half-sovereigns. But as to the second Question, I have consulted the Deputy Master of the Mint, who tells me that brittle bars are occasionally met with in coinage operations; but they give rise to great inconvenience. The deliberate production of such brittle metal would be to place obstacles in the way of the Mint just as much as in that of the jewellers, besides adding to the inconvenience of the public.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE YEOMANRY.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would explain why the distance which entitles members of the Yeomanry Cavalry to an extra day's pay for the days of joining for and returning from permanent duty has been altered from twenty miles to thirty miles, as per Memorandum from the War Office of April 4th 1884; why the promised allowance of 3s. 6d. per diem for two troop drills has been stopped; and, whether he is aware that both the above alterations have given great dissatisfaction to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Force?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Hitherto the Yeomanry Regulations have not fixed a limit of distance for the grant of marching money. As it was found that in some cases two days were charged for coming up to drill or going down from it when the distance was only 21 miles, it was considered right to fix the allowance at one day for any distance under 30 miles, and at two days for any greater distance. I am afraid that I must postpone any full answer to the other point in the hon. Member's Question until we come to the discussion of the Estimates. I do not think, however, that the allowance referred to has ever been actually promised, although it was undoubtedly intended that it should be given. When reference was made to the matter we were under the impression that there would be a considerable saving on the Yeomanry Vote. That Vote is now under my consideration, and I shall be anxious, if possible, to give the allowance referred to in the Question.

MR. STOREY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can explain how it is that the crew of the Nisero, being in a state of destitution on the 31st March, the Pegasus did not sail with food until the 1st May; and, whether, since the men have now been captives nearly six months, and negotiations ineffective, the Government will take steps to secure their release by force?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: As stated in a previous answer, a letter to Mr. Maxwell, dated the 10th of March, from the chief officer, Mr. Crichton, gave a list of the provisions received by the crew, and stated that they were all well in health. There was no reason, therefore, to apprehend that they would be short of provisions on the 31st of March. This announcement reached the Foreign Office on April 26. Telegraphic instructions were immediately sent to the Acting Governor of the Straits Settlements to make every effort to convey provisions to the crew, and the Pegasus left on the 1st of May with supplies for three months. It will be seen, therefore, that there has been no delay. As regards the second Question, Her Majesty's Government are waiting the reply of the Netherlands Government to their offer of mediation.

MR. STOREY asked the noble Lord whether, as the men were in want of food on the 31st of March, and the news did not reach the Foreign Office until the 26th of April, there had not been neglect on the part of some official?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not understand that there has been any charge of neglect against any officer there; but I shall be glad to give any further information desired if my hon. Friend will ask me on Notice. My impression is that, considering the difficulty of communication in these parts, there has been no neglect of duty whatever.

MALTA—CONSTITUTION AND ADMINISTRATION—MILITARY AND CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table any correspondence relating to the change in the Civil duties of the Governor and Colonial Secretary at Malta, including any instructions to the new Governor upon this subject? He also asked whether, when Sir Lintorn Simmons was appointed, he had notice of the change that was to be made in his duties?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, the Correspondence was prepared, and would shortly be laid upon the Table. As to the other Question of the hon. Member, the appointment of Governor of Malta was made by the Commander-in-Chief; but his (Mr. Evelyn Ashley's) impression was that Sir Lintorn Simmons was not informed of the changes.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS), ACTS—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE —OUTBREAK AT FINCHLEY.

MR. CAUSTON asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether information has reached him of the outbreak of cattle disease on a farm near Finchley, to or from which no cattle have been removed for upwards of six weeks; and, if so, whether he can account for the outbreak?

MR. DODSON: The only case of foot-and-mouth disease near Finchley of which we have knowledge is one at Hendon, reported to us on the 26th of April, where six animals were found diseased. The Inspector of the Local Authority believed the introduction of the disease was due to animals recently bought. We ought to have received before now a further Report from the Inspector; but, not having done so, we have telegraphed to him to supply one.

GENERAL GORDON—THE TELE-GRAMS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can inform the House which is the telegram described by Sir Evelyn Baring, in his telegraphic Despatch to Lord Granville of the 18th April, as the only one of his telegrams to General Gordon which, up to that date, he believes to have reached him; and, especially, whether it was the telegram which Sir Evelyn Baring, in his Despatch of 13th March, says he had sent, telling him to hold on to Khartoum, and on no account to proceed to the Bahr Gazelle and Equatorial provinces, or the telegram which, on 29th March, Sir Evelyn Baring says he has sent, conveying Lord Granville's instructions, leaving him full discretion to remain at Khartoum, if he thinks it necessary, or to retire by the Southern or any other route which may be found available; and, whether the Government have any reason to believe that any telegrams sent from Cairo since 18th April have reached General Gordon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I shall best reply to my right hon. Friend's Question by reading the following letter, which I have received from Sir Evelyn Baring:—

"Dear Lord Edmond,—The telegram which has been received by General Gordon is not either of those to which Mr. Forster alludes. It was a short cipher telegram, which, if I remember rightly, ran somewhat as follows:—'Osman Digna's followers have been dispersed. There is no intention of sending troops from Suakin to Berber.' Allusion is made to this telegram in General Gordon's telegram of April 8 (which will be in the hands of Members to-day). It will be observed that General Gordon complains of the telegram as 'meagre,' and so it is, considered by itself. But it was only one of several telegrams, none of which, except this one, General Gordon received. In those telegrams I gave General Gordon news from Suakin, and I explained to him at length the views of Her Majesty's Government. The short telegram was only a repetition of what I had said before at greater length. I sent home all the telegrams I received from General Gordon; but there must be several which I sent to him, and which I did not think necessary to send home. They could, if necessary, easily be procured from Cairo; but they would not add anything to the existing information, as they either contain news, or are a repetition of telegrams I received from Lord Granville.—Yours truly,

May 5, 1884."

In reply to my right hon. Friend's second Question, I may add that Her Majesty's Government have no information that any telegrams have reached General Gordon since April 18.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Would my noble Friend say after what date Sir Evelyn Baring believes that no telegrams reached General Gordon, saving that he mentioned? Perhaps I may be in order in saying that my object in asking is to know in what position General Gordon in all probability feels himself to be now that he is isolated?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not think that Sir Evelyn Baring intended by this letter to do anything except to show that, in his opinion, it is not possible to state an exact date, and that it was a mere matter of opinion. All the information that bears upon that subject is before the House in the Blue Book which has been presented.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I understand that in the letter of Sir Evelyn Baring he says that he believes that on the 18th of April only one of his telegrams had reached General Gordon. I do not quite gather from the noble Lord which of those telegrams it was.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The passage I read is this—

"It was a short cipher telegram, which, if I remember rightly, ran somewhat as follows:—'Osman Digna's followers have been dispersed. There is no intention of sending troops from Suakin to Berber.'"

Sir Evelyn Baring does not add the exact date.

MR. GIBSON: Does he add any date at all?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No. The words are—"If I remember rightly," and the purport of the telegram is given by Sir Evelyn Baring from memory.

MR. GIBSON: Can the noble Lord give the House any clue at all as to the date?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : If the right hon. and learned Gentleman will compare the telegrams before the House, as no doubt he will, he will see the dates within which these telegrams were sent to General Gordon; and this telegram, no doubt, came within those dates.

SAVINGS BANKS—RATE OF INTEREST.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has come to any agreement with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the source from which the cost of management of the Government Savings Banks branches will be defrayed after the rate of interest on Consols shall have been reduced to the same rate as that allowed to depositors?

MR. FAWCETT : The hon. Gentleman's Question appears to assume that Two-and-a-Half per Cent Stock will be at par, and that all Post Office Savings Bank moneys will be invested in Government Stocks. This is not the case, and I, therefore, think that the Question is premature.

FATE OF THE CAPTIVES AT SINKAT.

MR. A. ROSS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, after the receipt of General Sir Gerald Graham's telegraphic despatch to the Secretary of State for War, dated 25th March 1884, stating that 150 women of Sinkat were alive in the mountains, any instructions have been sent to Consul Baker to attempt, through the mediation of the friendly tribes, either by ransom or otherwise, to obtain the release of these unfortunate women?

MR. LABOUCHERE asked whether the noble Lord had received any information that these women desired to be released?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : It has not been thought necessary to repeat the instructions conveyed in the telegram to General Graham of the 10th of March (Egypt, No. 12, page 157). The authorities at Suakin will, no doubt, use every endeavour to procure the release of the captives.

STATE OF IRELAND—MEETINGS OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE—INTRU-SION OF THE POLICE AT KILRO-SENTY, CO. WATERFORD.

MR. R. POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the police insist upon attending the meetings of the Kilrosenty Branch of the National League, in the county of Waterford; that they refused to withdraw when requested to do so, stating they were acting under the orders of Sub-Inspector Huggin; and, whether such orders have been given; and, if so, do the Government approve of them?

MR. TREVELYAN : I am informed that a sergeant attended the meeting of this branch held on the 27th of last month. Some of the persons present wished him to leave; but upon this being put to the meeting only about eight out of 50 expressed an affirmative opinion; and as the owner of the house was not amongst those who asked the sergeant to go, he remained. He had no orders from his District Inspector to refuse to withdraw, nor did he say that he had. This case occurred before the issue of the recent instructions on the subject, of which I have already informed the House.

MR. SEXTON : Are those instructions now in the hands of the police?

MR. TREVELYAN : Yes, Sir.

BURIAL ACTS—PAROCHIAL BURIAL PLACES.

MR. RICHARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in fulfilment of his promise at the close of last Session, the Government have considered the best mode of removing the practical difficulties experienced by burial authorities in providing new parochial burial places, under the existing Burial Acts; and, whether they will shortly introduce a measure for that purpose?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT : In concert with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), I have considered this matter carefully, and have endeavoured to frame a measure. It is not the case, as the Question seems to imply, that I promised to introduce a Bill. I do not think I gave any pledge of that character. But if we are able to do so we shall be very glad; but my hon. Friend knows the difficulties we have to contend with in the matter.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—JURIES —JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. William J. Doherty, C.E., of Clontarf House, Drumcondra, Dublin, a justice of the peace for the county of Donegal and a special juror for Dublin, has represented to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland that he was summoned to serve as a juror in the Barabilla conspiracy case, but, on answering to his name in Court, was ordered by the Crown to stand aside; and, what reply, if any, the Lord Chancellor has made, and what view he takes of the course pursued by counsel for the Crown in the case in question, in peremptorily challenging a justice of the peace who had been summoned to serve as a juror?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is the fact that Mr. Doherty has made the representations mentioned to the Lord Chancellor, by letter dated the 25th of April last, and the Lord Chancellor sent a reply thereto on the 3rd instant, stating that he has no power whatever to interfere with the right of peremptorily directing a juror to stand aside, which is vested in the Crown; and that the circumstance that a juror so ordered to stand aside holding Her Majesty's Commission of the Peace makes no difference either in the power or duty of the Lord Chancellor.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)— TENANTS' IMPROVEMENTS—

"GEORGE M'CORD v. SIR RICHARD WALLACE."

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to certain resolutions adopted at a meeting held on the 29th ult. by the Wallace (Lisburn) Tenants' Defence Association, in which resolutions the Association offer to produce credible witnesses who will, on oath, prove all the facts put forward in the Question recently addressed to him in reference to the case of George M'Cord, tenant, Sir Richard Wallace, landlord, and declare that the judicial rent, where land is held under the Ulster custom, should be arrived at by ascertaining separately the commercial value of the holding, and the value of the tenant's improvements, and his occupation right, and deducting the latter from the former, and that reasons for the decisions should be embodied in the findings; and urge upon the Government the necessity of watching lest the Land Act of 1881 should be rendered inoperative through the action of the Land Commission; whether he will state the source of the information by reason of which he referred to the former question as inaccurate and misleading, and will specify the particulars to which his statement especially referred; and, whether the Government will consider the suggestion and appeal submitted to them, as above, in the third and fourth resolutions adopted by the Tenants' Association?

MR. TREVELYAN: These resolutions have been communicated to us; but the Government cannot interfere with the judicial decisions of the Land Commission in the course suggested by the hon. Member, nor can they take any legislative action. I did not intend to say, in answer to a former Question, that "the Question of the hon. Member was inaccurate and misleading." My recollection was that I had received information from another quarter protesting against it as "inaccurate and misleading;" and that this showed the inconvenience, and perhaps the injustice, which might result from hon. Members giving an ex parte view in a judicial matter in the shape of a Question.

MR. SEXTON: On a future occasion I shall use the facilities of the debate to endeavour to extract from the right hon. Gentleman the particulars which he declines to give.

MR. TREVELYAN: What particulars?

MR. SEXTON: The particulars which rendered my Question "inaccurate and misleading."

MR. TREVELYAN: I did not say it was inaccurate and misleading. I said the hon. Member gave a statement of a case which was the subject of a Civil Bill suit in a Question in the House of Commons. I said I had received a communication from another party complaining that this statement was inaccurate and misleading; and I argued from that that it was inconvenient to state the subject of Civil Bill suits in Questions in the House of Commons.

Mr. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say who was the other party?

Mr. TREVELYAN: No, Sir. I am not in the least bound to say it.

METROPOLIS — IMPROVEMENTS AT HYDE PARK CORNER — THE ARCH ON CONSTITUTION HILL.

Mr. J. W. LOWTHER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been called to the erection of an elongated zinc chimney pot on the arch at the top of Constitution Hill; and, whether he has received any Petition from the Royal Academicians, protesting against its position there as a violation of every principle of propriety and of every canon of proportion?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: This chimney-pot was placed on the top of the Arch 40 years ago for the convenience of the police living in the place; and since that time, as far as I know, no one has thought it worth while to take up the time of the House by calling attention to it.

Mr. J. W. LOWTHER said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered that part of the Question as to whether he had received a Petition from Royal Academicians on the subject?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: I did not regard it as a serious Question.

MADRAS—MYSORE GOLD MINES—CONCESSIONS TO BRITISH OFFICIALS.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Madras Officials have up to date only paid the Mysore State £5,000 for the block of twenty square miles of gold mining land conceded them; and, whether certain speculators were prepared at the same time to pay one million sterling for the rights conceded to these officials; and, if so, whether pecuniary compensation will be made to the Rajah of Mysore, who was at the moment a minor and ward of the British Government?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: The Papers presented last year contain all the information we have respecting the amount paid to the Mysore State by the Kolar cessionnaires. As is clearly shown on page 4 of those Papers, and as I explained to the hon. Gentleman on the 9th of April last year, the sum of 5,500 rupees was paid for one square mile only—not 20 square miles, as stated in his Question. I am entirely ignorant of the amount which certain speculators may have been prepared to pay.

RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS—CONTINUATION OF POWERS—LEGISLATION.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE asked the President of the Board of Trade, When he intends to introduce the Bill for continuing the powers of the Railway Commissioners?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I am afraid I cannot give a positive reply to this Question. The House will agree with me that it is inexpedient, in view of the pressure upon the time of the Government, to introduce any further Bills, if they are likely, as this one is likely, to provoke any considerable discussion. Under these circumstances, I have endeavoured to secure something like an agreement among the parties chiefly concerned upon the principle of the Bill, and I am still hopeful that I shall succeed; in which case the Bill will very shortly be introduced.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON—RELIEF THROUGH ABYSSINIA.

Mr. STAVELEY HILL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether our relations with King Johannes are such as to admit of an expedition for the relief of General Gordon being despatched from Abyssinia to Khartoum down the Blue Nile?

Mr. GLADSTONE: In answer to this Question I have to say that our relations with Abyssinia are quite satisfactory; and I do not think it would be desirable to say anything beyond that.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—GENERAL GORDON'S MISSION — THE VOTE OF CENSURE (SIR M. HICKS-BEACH).

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister what facilities he can afford me for bringing under the consideration of the House the Motion of which I have given Notice with respect to General Gordon?

Mr. GLADSTONE: In consequence of the verbal Notice given by the right hon. Gentleman on Friday, in conjunction with my Colleagues I have considered the matter. We are desirous—I will not enter into any remarks on the Motion now—but we are desirous to give the right hon. Gentleman the earliest open day. The arrangements for to-day and Thursday having been made, the earliest open day will be Monday next. I may say that, looking to the limited scope of the Motion, confined as it is to the conduct of the Government in regard to the mission of General Gordon, we trust the debate will be brought to a close on that evening. Should it not be brought to a close on the same day, we could, although very reluctantly, place Tuesday morning at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman for the purpose of continuing the debate. It would be for him to consider whether he should make any arrangements for the Tuesday evening. I may add that that is the maximum of time that can possibly be given up by the Government to the Motion.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I think it will be generally agreed that the House ought to have before it, before the debate, which, I understand, is to be commenced on Monday, all the information that Her Majesty's Government can possibly give in regard to the telegrams that have passed between General Gordon and Sir Evelyn Baring. I understood the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in answer to a Question on Friday, to divide these telegrams into three classes. The telegram of April 18 from General Gordon, and the reply of Sir Evelyn Baring, and certain other telegrams in regard to the alleged intention of General Gordon to visit the Mahdi, the noble Lord said would be laid on the Table to-day. And he said there were other telegrams since the 25th of March from Sir Evelyn Baring which would be laid in due course. There was a third series which he said it would be injurious to the public interests to lay. I should like to ask whether he will not arrange that all telegrams which can be published consistently with the public interests shall be laid on the Table at once? If the presentation of telegrams from Sir Evelyn Baring since the 25th of March be postponed until they be published in due course, we shall not see them for two months to come. I think the House will be anxious to have them before the debate next Monday.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. GLADSTONE: I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is desirable that the House should have these telegrams before the debate. When my noble Friend used the expression "in due course," he did not mean to say that their publication would be postponed for two months and reserved for another Blue Book. They will be laid on the Table during the present week, or at the earliest moment after.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I beg to give Notice that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire brings forward his Motion I shall move, as an Amendment—

"That this House continues to place confidence in the general conduct of Business by Her Majesty's Government."

THE EGYPTIAN PAPERS—NO. 12, 1884.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reference to the Despatch numbered 86, and dated Cairo, 14th February, 1884, in the Egyptian Papers, No. 12, 1884, Whether the statement which it contains, viz.—

"Examination of archives shows that some telegrams passed between Sir Edward Malet and General Hicks besides those sent home; but they do not appear to add materially to the information in your Lordship's possession," is substantially correct?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes; the statement is substantially correct. The Blue Book contains the despatches and telegrams in question, and at page 182 the views of Her Majesty's Government thereupon.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £57,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Divine Service, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."

COLONEL COLTHURST wished to call attention to the inadequate arrangements for providing Roman Catholic priests on board the troopships proceeding annually to India between the months of September and April, some of which troopships brought home invalids. An arrangement had been entered into by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War that a Roman Catholic priest should accompany every detachment of troops exceeding 300 in number. The arrangement, however, had not been found to work satisfactorily. It was manifest that a vessel leaving this country with 300 Roman Catholics on board might come back from India without any invalids at all; whereas another vessel leaving the country with only 50 or 100 might have to bring home invalids. He wished, therefore, to place before the noble Marquess, whose anxiety to settle the question he felt bound to bear testimony to, two alternative suggestions. One was, that the number of Roman Catholic chaplains should be increased by two or three, which would enable the service to be duly performed. If the noble Marquess did not think that it would be possible to increase the number of commissioned chaplains by two or three, he would ask him to consent to a priest going out on each voyage. And for this reason—it would be much easier for the ecclesiastical authorities to provide a priest for each voyage between September and April, than only when the number of Roman Catholic soldiers sent out amounted to 300, because, with the utmost goodwill on the part of the authorities at the Horse Guards, it was impossible to make up the details until within a week or 10 days of the time the vessel started; and it was then frequently found impossible to provide, even with the best intentions, the services of a clergyman at a few days' notice. He would ask the noble Marquess to give a definite answer now, because the Army Estimates had come on much sooner than was expected, and the noble Marquess had not received the Notices which those interested in this question intended to give him. All he asked the noble Marquess to do now was to admit the necessity of changing the present arrangements, and to promise to consider the two suggestions he had ventured to make.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, that, before the noble Marquess answered the question of his hon. and gallant Friend, he wished to put another question to him. When the Army Estimates were last taken, and the noble Marquess made his Statement, he distinctly stated that the House should have before Whitsuntide an opportunity of discussing it. It would now appear that the noble Marquess wished to take the Votes one after another without previously taking a discussion upon the Statement which he had made. He ventured to say that that would be a most inconvenient course as far as the Committee were concerned. They had certainly a right to expect, after what the noble Marquess had stated—in point of fact, after the distinct pledge and promise he had given—that the earliest opportunity for criticizing the noble Marquess's Statement would be afforded. If they were to proceed with the Votes in regular order, this general discussion could not be taken until they reached Vote 8, and there was no certainty as to when that Vote would be reached. He understood the object of the promise of the noble Marquess to be that, at the commencement of a Sitting like this, an opportunity should be given for going carefully into the consideration of the present state of the Army.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was very sorry if there had been any misunderstanding upon the subject. He did not remember that any promise was made, except that an opportunity for discussion would be given before Whitsuntide; and he did not remember promising that the discussion should be given either upon Vote 8 or upon any other Vote. In fact, when the question was put to him the other day by an hon. Member, he had stated that he thought the most convenient course would be to proceed as usual, and take the Votes in their regular order. If, however, it was desired, as he thought it probably might be the case, to raise a general discussion on the state of the Army upon the recruiting question, it might be taken upon Vote 8 referred to by the hon. and gallant Member as the most convenient opportunity for doing so. If there was a desire on the part of the Committee to take that course, he would be quite ready to postpone Vote 8, in order that it might be taken as the first Vote on the next occasion the Army Estimates were reached. If necessary, the Army Estimates might be taken again shortly after Whitsuntide, and Vote 8 taken first.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, that in answer to what the noble

Marquess had just stated, he fancied that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley) did make a statement of his wish to discuss the state of the Army, and asked when they were to have the Army Estimates gone into again. His right hon. and gallant Friend moved to report Progress, so that they might have some statement from the noble Marquess; because it was fully admitted that, a general Statement having been made by the noble Marquess, it was most inconvenient that the Committee should not have an opportunity of discussing it. He thought they were entitled to have the question discussed at the earliest possible period that night, and that it would be most objectionable to follow the course which was taken last year, and put it off until a late period of the Session, when they might have again to sit into Sunday and consider the Army Estimates at a period when it was altogether impossible to discuss the grave questions raised in them. The noble Marquess must be aware that the House had always treated these Army questions in a fair and impartial spirit, and had not converted them into Party questions. Certainly they had a right to have the question of the condition of the Army fairly raised; and he thought that it would be better to take Vote 8 at once, rather than to adopt the other alternative of getting as much money as was possible that night, and then put off the discussion of Vote 8 until a late and inconvenient period of the Session.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that what occurred when the Army Estimates were introduced might be impressed upon the memory of the noble Marquess if he were to read what took place upon that occasion, and especially the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL rose to Order. He wished to know if the hon. and gallant Member would be in Order in reading extracts from a past debate in the present Session?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the statement he was about to refer to formed part of the same debate now before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand that the hon. and gallant Member is about to refer to a promise made by the Government, and he will be in Order in doing so.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the promise made was this—the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he hoped the question of Army organization would be discussed on the second Vote, as it had been in previous years. The noble Marquess followed, and said, with great clearness, that the first Vote was merely to be granted to the Government as a Vote on Account, and that the general discussion would be postponed until another occasion. The noble Marquess added that last Session, at all events, the House had nothing to complain of, but had a full opportunity for discussing the Estimates. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) thought that statement clearly showed that it was the intention of the noble Marquess to have the general discussion taken on the next occasion.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, he thought it was very desirable, if possible, to get on quickly with the Army Estimates that night, in order to reach the discussion upon the general organization of the Army, which, as it had been fairly put before the Committee by the noble Marquess, might be taken on Vote 8. The consideration of Vote 4 would probably take some time, seeing that it had reference to the Medical Department. Votes 3 and 4 would not require much discussion. They would pass then to Vote 5, which was for Militia Pay and Allowances; Vote 6 was for the Yeomanry Cavalry, and Vote 7 was the Volunteer Vote, upon which there was likely to be some discussion. If the noble Marquess would give an undertaking that he would go on with the Votes in their regular order until a certain hour, and then proceed with the discussion on Vote 8, he (Sir Henry Fletcher) thought that side of the House would be quite satisfied. It was most desirable that the discussion should take place that night, and that it should not be deferred until the month of July or August. He put this as a suggestion that unless the Vote were postponed until a very late hour of the night a general discussion should be taken upon it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he should have no objection to arrange, as far as it was in his power, that Vote 8, dealing with the Army Reserve, should come on that night at a reasonable hour. He did not think, as far as he could see, that there was any intervening Vote which was likely to occupy much time in discussion. The first Vote was that for Divine Service, which was now under consideration; the next had reference to Martial Law; and the third bore upon the Medical Service. He did not think that these Votes would take up much time; and he was quite willing, as far as he was concerned, to postpone the Militia, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteer Votes in order to take Vote 8, dealing with the Army Reserve at an hour that would enable a general discussion to be raised. No doubt there were hon. Gentlemen present who were interested in the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteer discussions; and he would appeal to them, if they had come down prepared to take the discussion of those Votes that night, to assist him in postponing the consideration of them until the next occasion when the Army Estimates were reached.

EARL PERCY confessed that he was placed in a position of difficulty. It was certainly understood, as had been mentioned by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that they were to have a general discussion on the Estimates that evening on some Vote which would enable it to be reached; but when he asked the noble Marquess privately what course he proposed to take, because he had been under the impression that a sort of undertaking had been given, the noble Marquess told him he intended to take the Votes serialim. He should like to propose to the noble Marquess that he might take the Militia and Volunteer Votes, and omit the Medical Vote. He did not know that there were any hon. Members who were anxious to have the Medical Vote that evening; and he certainly thought the course he suggested—namely, of taking the Militia and Volunteer Votes, would be most conducive to the general convenience of the Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not think the Medical Vote was likely to occupy a long time in discussion. He hoped the Committee would agree to the suggestion he had made. He thought it would be better for the Committee to accept that proposal, and thus avoid any further misunderstanding on the subject.

EARL PERCY asked whether the noble Marquess could name an hour at which he would take Vote 8?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not think it would be possible to postpone a Vote when they were in the middle of the discussion of it.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he was of opinion that if the noble Marquess could not agree with the proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) it would be much better to go on with the Votes in their regular order. It would be most objectionable to follow the course which was taken last year. He had no doubt the noble Marquess intended to bring on the Army Estimates again soon after Whitsuntide if he could; but it was a matter in which the noble Marquess had no power whatever. He would remind the noble Marquess of what occurred last year. The Army Estimates were not brought on for discussion until Saturday the 18th of August. The House met on that day at 12 o'clock. The Army Estimates were not reached until a late hour, and they were not finished at 2 o'clock on Sunday morning. The result was that in the end, on his (Major General Alexander's) proposal, Supply was granted to Her Majesty without any adequate discussion of the Votes whatever, on the understanding that a discussion should be taken on the Report. Under these circumstances, he strongly deprecated any similar course being pursued on the present occasion. He hoped, if the noble Marquess could not agree to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex, that they would be allowed to take the Votes in their regular order.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON remarked, that there were other discussions last year upon the Army Estimates than that which was referred to by the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (Major General Alexander). Full opportunity for discussion was given at an early period of the Session.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, that 19 Votes were passed on Saturday night and Sunday morning.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that certainly upon some of the Votes a full opportunity for a general discussion was given at a reasonable period of the Session. He understood that the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would be satisfied to take the general discussion that evening after reasonable progress had been made with the Votes in their regular order.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he should like to ask the opinion of the Chair as to how far a general discussion of the Army Estimates could be raised on a single Vote—Vote 8—after previous Votes had been passed? Would hon. Members be permitted to discuss the whole subject of Army organization upon that Vote? It certainly seemed to him that, after the Committee had voted the money required for the Militia and Volunteers, it would be open to any hon. Member to rise to Order, and question the propriety of discussing those branches of the Service on any subsequent Vote. He thought there ought to be no misunderstanding upon that point.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that reference had been made to what he had said the other night. He quite agreed with what had been stated by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Major General Alexander), that there would be a certain amount of inconvenience in postponing the consideration of important questions for an indefinite period. He also agreed with the remarks of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell), that it would be inconvenient to raise a discussion upon questions relating to particular Services after the Votes for those Services had been passed. It was in consequence of that feeling that he had moved to report Progress on the last occasion; and he did so as a protest against the doctrine that having once passed a certain stage they could go back exactly to the same position they were in before. They could only, after a certain amount of inconvenience, discuss all the general questions connected with the organization and state of the Army upon the Vote for the Reserves; but he would point out that the Reserve Vote did contain in itself a reference to almost every subject connected with the state of the Army. Of course, the other Votes could be dealt with within due limits. He, therefore, thought that the proposal of the noble Marquess was a fair one—namely, that they should go forward with the Votes in their regular order until they reached the Militia Vote, and then go on with Vote 8. Of course, it would be impossible to please everyone; but, in taking the Votes consecutively up to a certain point, there would be a certain amount of give-and-take on the part of the Government which he regarded as satisfactory.

THE CHAIRMAN: In answer to the question put to me by the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell), I think that Vote 10 would have been the Vote upon which the general question could have been most legitimately raised. But the Committee will bear in mind that the general question was raised last year upon Vote 8; and I am not prepared to say that it was not open to the Committee to take that course. I, therefore, fortified by the custom that has prevailed, do not think that on the present occasion hon. Members would be precluded on Vote 8 from entering into a general discussion.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, his experience induced him to believe that there was nothing which led to so much loss of time as a departure from well-recognized rules. These understandings and multiplied understandings, generally ending in a misunderstanding, occupied a considerable portion of the time of the House in every Session; and he was very much disposed to urge on the Committee the desirability of going on with the Votes in the order in which they appeared in the Estimates. If the Committee decided upon taking them in the order in which they appeared, and wished to select one for a general discussion, it seemed to him that they ought to select Vote 16, which referred to the payment of the salaries and miscellaneous charges in the War Office; and upon that Vote for the Office of the Secretary of State for War every question of policy connected with the Army might be legitimately raised. He wished to ask the Chairman if he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) would be in Order in moving the reduction of a certain sum by which he had wished to reduce the Estimates on the last occasion? It would be in the recollection of the Committee that, practically, the first Vote in the Army Estimates was passed without the Committee having any option in the matter. He was told upon that occasion, both by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Marquess, that, whatever he might have to say, that Vote must be passed, and the consequence was that the discussion was greatly curtailed. He had wished to move the reduction of the Vote by some thousands of pounds on account of an item which seemed to him to be absolutely unnecessary—he alluded to the item for the Riding Establishment at Woolwich. The noble Marquess said that his attention had not been called to the matter, and that he was not in a position to offer any opinion upon it. He promised, however, to look into the subject. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) wanted to know whether the noble Marquess had found time since to inquire into the advisability of continuing that Establishment?

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that that is not a question of Order. There is no Question now before the Committee in regard to the Riding Establishment at Woolwich.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had only been desirous of eliciting that answer from the Chairman, because it enabled him now to adduce a direct illustration of the unsatisfactory manner in which the Estimates were discussed. The noble Marquess suggested that he should move the reduction upon Vote 2, which had reference to the provision for Divine Service. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON dissented.] The noble Marquess shook his head; but he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) only wished to point out the utter incongruity of moving the reduction of a Vote for the Riding Establishment at Woolwich on a Vote which was to cover the provision for Divine Service. He wished, further, to point out that it would be futile to discuss that question upon Vote 8; and it therefore appeared to him, from the way in which the Votes were to be taken, that it would be altogether precluded from raising that question, because the Effective Vote had already been passed, and they were now on the Vote for Divine Service; and it was irregular to raise a discussion upon any branch of the Service covered by a Vote already agreed to. Under these circumstances, he hoped the Government would resolve not to have any more of these understandings and departures from their well-recognized rules; and he would urge the desirability of going through the Votes in a regular and straightforward manner.

MR. RYLANDS appealed to the Committee that it would be a great saving of time, and also a most convenient course, if they adopted the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, and carried out the views of the noble Marquess, by proceeding with the Votes in their regular order. After they had gone through several Votes they would be in a position to ascertain whether sufficient time was left for a general discussion or not; and an arrangement might then be made, if it was necessary, for having the general discussion upon some future occasion. His own impression was, that the best course would be to go on steadily with the Votes, on the understanding that the general discussion would take place at an early period, either on Vote 8, as suggested by the Government, or on Vote 10, as suggested by the Chairman.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL wished to point out that the Committee were wasting valuable time in a desultory discussion. They had already wasted 20 minutes. The noble Marquess had shown his readiness to meet the views of the Committee; and he thought the proposal which the noble Marquess had made found favour on both sides of the House. If they would take that course they would prevent not only a further waste of public time, but also a waste of public money. If they at once proceeded to Business, and went on with the Votes, they would probably reach Vote 8 in sufficient time to have the general discussion.

MR. CAUSTON said, he was anxious to proceed to Business; but he thought there ought to be an understanding that hon. Members who wished to raise a discussion on Vote 1 should have an opportunity of doing so. Under the present regulations the Staff clerks considered that they were suffering under a grievance, and he had undertaken to bring their case before the House. He had been under the impression that upon Vote 1 they would have had a general discussion upon all Army matters; and before they proceeded to Business that evening he hoped there would be a definite promise from the noble Marquess that hon. Members would have a full opportunity of bringing the grievances they complained of, in connection with the Army, under the consideration of the Committee.

EARL PERCY said, he would make a suggestion, which he thought would meet the wishes of the Committee, or, at any rate, of hon. Members sitting on that side of the House, who were anxious to take the Militia Vote that night. He would suggest—and he hoped it would meet the views of the noble Marquess—that they should proceed with Votes 2, 3, and 4, and if they were concluded before 9 o'clock that they should then take Vote 5; but if they were not concluded before 9 o'clock, that then they should omit the other Votes and go on with Vote 8.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had come there for the purpose of considering every Army matter, including the Militia; and he, therefore, thought they ought to go straight forward with the Votes after they had taken the discussion which it was promised they should have upon Vote 2. That was, undoubtedly, the impression produced by the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Army Estimates were introduced. Now, looking at Vote 1, he found that the general Staff of the Army in 1872 cost the country £83,000 odd. It now cost the country £173,000, or double the amount within 11 years. He wished to have that matter fully explained to the Committee; and it was certainly impossible to obtain the explanation he desired upon the Vote for Divine Service, or upon any Vote except Vote 1. If he were to attempt to raise it on any other Vote, he would inevitably find himself stopped by the Chairman, and he would only be placed in a ridiculous position. If the Government could not show him a reason for the large increase in certain items, then, he contended, the Vote ought to be reduced; but to raise the important questions he wished to raise on any Vote except Vote 1 would necessarily, as he had stated, place him in a ridiculous position.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL remarked, that, in accordance with the ruling of the Chair, as to the propriety of raising the discussion upon the whole organization of the Army upon Vote 8, he wanted to know, on the same principle, why it could not be raised upon any other Vote—2, 3, or 4, for instance; and, if so, why not take it at once?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had simply proposed to follow the course which had been taken on other occasions—namely, to dispose of the Vote for Divine Service, and similar Votes of minor importance, in order to raise the general question more properly upon Vote 8. He believed that all the questions affecting Army organization bearing upon the condition of the Army could be legitimately raised on Vote 8. There were, however, a certain number of minor questions referred to in the previous Votes which he did not suppose could be properly brought forward on Vote 8; but they might all of them be conveniently dealt with on the Vote for the administration of the Army. He thought there were very few questions of administration which the Committee would not be able to deal with upon that Vote. He would, therefore, adhere to the suggestion he had made in the first instance.

THE CHAIRMAN: Perhaps the Committee will allow me to call their attention to what has occurred. A promise has been made that the general discussion should take place on Vote 8, which has to come on upon a future occasion. Under those circumstances, I do not think I should be acting unfairly to the Committee if I now say that the time has arrived for stopping the discussion, which is certainly not strictly in Order. As has been pointed out, Votes 8 and 10 are Votes which embrace the general policy of the organization and administration of the Army, and almost every question connected with the state of the Army can be raised upon them. The Question now before the Committee is Vote 2—

After what has been stated by the noble Marquess, I will again point out to the Committee that upon Vote 8 or Vote 10 it will be possible to enter into any question relating to the administration of the Army; but it will not be regular to enter into a discussion of any of the items included in Vote 1, and already passed. The conversation which has been proceeding for some time past has certainly not been directed to the Question before the Committee.

DR. FARQUHARSON wished to point out that last year no proper opportunity was afforded for discussing the Medical Vote, on which Vote many important questions had now to be decided—questions affecting the entire organization of the Army Medical Department. If they were now going to enter upon Vote 8, that important question would be still further delayed.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No; we propose to take it in its order.

DR. FARQUHARSON said, he was glad to hear that announcement, and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would adhere to it.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already pointed out to the Committee that the Question before the Committee is Vote 2, and I am not quite sure that the discussion which has taken place is not altogether irregular. I must now call upon hon. Members to confine themselves to the Vote for Divine Service in connection with the Army, which is the Question now before the Committee.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he thought the most regular course would be to proceed at once with Vote 2. He would, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote of which he had given Notice—namely, that it be reduced by the sum of £4,103, made up as follows:—On account of troops stationed at Halifax, £838; ditto, in Jamaica, £509; ditto, in Windward and Leeward Islands, £642; ditto, in Cape Colony and Natal, £1,515; ditto, in Ceylon, £599.

MR. CAUSTON rose to Order. His hon. Friend was, no doubt, anxious to proceed with the Business of the Committee; but he (Mr. Causton) wished clearly to understand what the arrangement that had been made was. Was it to be understood that after certain Votes had been passed the general discussion which had been alluded to would be allowed to take place?

THE CHAIRMAN: May I ask what is the point of Order raised by the hon. Member?

MR. CAUSTON: I think before the Amendment is moved to the Vote by my hon. Friend there should be a clear understanding with the noble Marquess.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a point of Order, and I must call upon the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy to proceed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it seemed to him that his hon. Friend was wholly out of Order; and if he desired to raise any question in reference to the Staff clerks he should have raised it on Vote 1. He (Sir George Campbell) took the opportunity, on Vote 2, which related to the Colonies, of raising the question of the tyranny exercised by the Colonies over the Mother Country in regard to fiscal matters. What had happened was this. We had really surrendered all our powers over the greater Colonies; and, whereas it was formerly said we tyrannized over the Colonies, the Colonies now tyrannized over us in the matter of military expenditure. Our Colonies paid nothing whatever for their naval protection, which was the great protection we gave to our Possessions beyond the seas. And as regards military expenditure, what we found was this—that wherever the British Colonists prevailed, and not dark races, the Colony paid nothing at all, or very little indeed. It seemed to him to be very hard that we should employ our Army and Navy in protecting the Colonies without the Colonies contributing one farthing to the expense incurred. At the present moment, almost the entire charge of several of these was paid by the taxpayers of this country without the smallest contribution from the Colonies. Why should we have a great Naval Station at Halifax, except that Canada was supposed to be a British Possession? No doubt, the military force stationed there was a small one; but its presence involved a certain risk. Why should the country bear the whole cost of the defence of the Island of Jamaica, or of the Windward or Leeward Islands? No one could say that those Possessions were of any great advantage to this country. Again, we retained the nucleus of a garrison at Cape Town, and a considerable force at Natal, and the consequence was that we were involved in nearly all the wars with the Natives. It was in that way that we found ourselves mixed up with the Transkei War, and we were obliged to send troops there at very great expense. Natal was the worst case of all. That Colony was strongly in favour of war, and the Colonists were continually urging upon us to make war on their behalf. We had, therefore, found it necessary to maintain a considerable military force in the Colony, which had cost us £250,000 per annum in quiet times, besides other expenses. But what was the contribution of the Colony towards our military expenditure? With a Revenue which amounted to £800,000 a-year, and which was constantly growing at our expense, the contribution of the Colony towards our military expenditure amounted to the paltry sum of £4,000, or not one-half per cent of the Revenue. Ceylon was the last Colony he would refer to. That was differently situated. There was a tax upon the food of the Natives there, and the Colony had hitherto paid the whole expense of the troops stationed there. The Colony was not very prosperous at this moment; but it was practically protected by the Indian Army in its immediate neighbourhood, and it required but a very small force in the Colony itself for its protection. Yet it was treated very differently from India. India had always been obliged to pay the uttermost farthing of its own military expense. In the case of Ceylon, having regard to the fact that it was not very prosperous at this moment, Her Majesty's Government had consented to remit about £20,000 of the charge which had hitherto been paid by Ceylon. The result was, that whereas in India one-third of the effective Revenue of the Empire was spent in its defence, and the Natives were charged at the rate of one rupee per head, in Ceylon only one-tenth of the Revenue was paid for defence, and the population only paid one-third of a rupee per head, or one-third of the amount that fell upon the poor Natives of India. And Her Majesty's Government were now remitting a portion of that payment. It was quite evident that Her Majesty's Government, in these arrangements, were not dealing equally with India and the Colonies. The present Vote was for Divine Service, and he confessed that he had not intended to go into that question beyond the general considerations he had mentioned; but, in regard to the Colony of Ceylon, there was one point touching the question of Divine Service to which he should like to allude. Bishops were generally good men, but some of those sent to the Colonies were "apt to play pranks before high Heaven," of which Her Majesty's Government did not approve; and, no doubt, although they had not always the courage or opportunity of doing so, Her Majesty's Government would like to bring about a change of arrangements. At one time the Colonial Office certainly did bring the Bishop of Ceylon to his bearings. He had abused his franking privileges, and they were taken away from him. Yet, he (Sir George Campbell) found, in the present year, while the Colony of Ceylon was not able to pay the chaplains furnished for Divine Service for the troops and came to this country for payment, they had repaid to the Bishop the equivalent of the sum we had taken away from him by the withdrawal of his privilege of franking. In moving the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £4,103, he desired only to express in general terms to the House the opinion that Her Majesty's Government should take care in future that more equal justice was done between the Colonies and the taxpayers of the Mother Country. Having said so much, he hoped it would not be necessary for him to intrude upon the Committee again that evening.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member move the reduction of the Vote?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Yes; by the sum of £4,103.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £53,397, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Divine Service, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."—(Sir George Campbell.)

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY desired to say a few words in reference to the Motion which had been made by his hon. Friend. It had struck him, in listening to the speech, that the sting of it was in the tail. His hon. Friend was concerned less because the Colonies were paying too little than because India was paying too much. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) did not intend to enter into the question whether India was paying too much or not; his business would be to address himself, as shortly as he could, to the remarks in regard to the payment by the Colonies. First of all, he would remind his hon. Friend, in reference to the large self-governed Colonies, that the Government of this country would not like, and would not think it right, even if it were possible, to obtain contributions from their Legislatures to wards the cost of the Imperial troops that were stationed within their borders for Imperial purposes; because, if that were done, the Colonies would claim the right to employ those troops, and might interfere and try to influence our policy. Therefore, as far as the self-governed Colonies were concerned, it was not right to call upon them to contribute towards the payment of the Imperial troops. In the next place, when the hon. Member talked about contributing towards the defence of the United Empire, to a large extent Canada and the Cape, as also the Australias, did contribute already. They voted large sums of money for their own defence in maintaining local troops. He would run briefly through the instances which had been put down by his hon. Friend in his indictment. The first case was that of Halifax. Halifax was an Imperial station for our Navy; and, although the hon. Member seemed to think that Canada was in a position to defend herself, he would remind the hon. Member that the Naval Station at Halifax was useful for more than local defence, and that it was used for many other purposes beyond that of a mere local station. Therefore, there was no reason why we should expect a contribution in respect of it from the Colony. It was necessary that we should deal with each Colony by itself; and, in the first instance, we must consider its history before we laid down any rule as to what contributions we ought to expect, because existing arrangements were, in some instances, explained by historical transactions. No doubt, there were some cases in which certain Colonies might be called upon to contribute more than they did. That he did not deny. But let them look at the history of Jamaica and the Windward Islands. He did not deny that the terms upon which the Imperial troops were maintained in those Colonies were a very liberal arrangement for the Colonies themselves. We contributed not only to the defence of those Colonies, but towards their civil establishments. That practice ought not to be continued. We paid the entire cost of the military establishments out there, and other things of that kind. It was impossible to say, at this moment, what change ought to be brought about; but he would remind the hon. Member that the arrangement with Jamaica dated from the time of the emancipation of the slaves. Although changing circumstances might justify the revision of the arrangement in some cases, we could not break through the pledge which had been given on special grounds. An immense deal had been done, of late years, in the way of reducing our Colonial military expenditure, and there was no reason why something further should not be done. With regard to the Cape Colony, he would simply say this—that the Imperial forces now maintained in that Colony were entirely for Imperial purposes, and it was only a very few years ago that the barracks occupied by Imperial troops for Imperial purposes were handed over to the local Government. As for Natal, he was of opinion that in that case a larger contribution ought to be paid. He fully admitted that; but, at the same time, he would point out to his hon. Friend and the Committee that we had given Natal representative institutions, and we could not in a high-handed manner force the Colony to vote more money for our troops. Of course, it might be said that we had the remedy in our own hands, and that we could withdraw our troops; but as long as the Zulu border presented such dangers and difficulties, we could not hold a pistol to the head of Natal, and say—"If you do not do what we think you ought to do our troops shall be withdrawn." The financial arrangement under which Imperial troops were employed there was entered into in 1860—a good many years ago. The hon. Member said that Natal ought to contribute more. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) was of the same opinion; but he did not think it was to be done in the offhand way pointed out. He came, lastly, to the Colony of Ceylon. Up to the present time that Colony had paid every farthing of the expenditure for Imperial purposes, and we had recognized their present position by not asking them this year to continue to pay upon the same scale. His hon. Friend quite agreed that Ceylon had hitherto paid its full share; and he did not know why his hon. Friend should have dragged Ceylon in, except in reference to India, with which he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) had nothing whatever to do. He thought he might say that, with the exception of Natal, there was a good answer in every case.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he had no desire to impede the progress of Business; but, on the contrary, he was anxious that it should be proceeded with as fast as possible. Nevertheless, he had risen to move that the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. The Chairman had already reproved the preliminary conversation which the Committee indulged in before entering into the present Vote, on the ground that it was irregular. He (Sir Herbert Maxwell) was sorry that it had been thought necessary to do so; because, at the time the conversation was stopped, the Committee were left in a state of absurd mist and uncertainty as to the order of Business that evening. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had undoubtedly showed great anxiety to meet the views of all sides of the House; and this Motion to report Progress was made in order to give the noble Marquess an opportunity of explaining to the Committee, decidedly and clearly, what Votes were to be taken that night, and in what order.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Herbert Maxwell.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked if the noble Marquess would explain, at the same time, how the questions connected with the Army Pay Department and the continuation of the Riding Establishment at Woolwich stood?

COLONEL WALROND said, there was a very important Vote—Vote 7—which he hoped would be taken that evening. Last year it was not taken until the middle of August, at a period of the year which was much too late to allow many officers to be present. He hoped that Vote 7 would be taken that night, and that it would be taken in the order in which it stood in the Estimates.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, he hoped the Committee would be able to agree with the suggestion of the noble Marquess, and would go straight on with the Votes. ["No, no!"] He had understood the noble Marquess to say that the best course would be to go on regularly with the Votes. Vote 7, which had been alluded to by his hon. and gallant Friend, was a very important one, and it would be highly unsatisfactory to have it delayed as it was last year.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the explanation the hon. and gallant Member had attributed to him was not the explanation he had himself given. The suggestion he had made, and which he understood to be generally accepted, was that the Militia and Volunteer Votes should be postponed until after they had disposed of Vote 8, and that the general discussion should be brought on upon Vote 8. If there were any objection to that course, it would be better, he thought, to go straight on with the Votes, and, if necessary, to postpone Vote 8 until a future period. He did not know whether it would be in Order to refer to the question which had been put to him by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) as to the Riding School at Woolwich, to which reference was made in Vote 1. That was a question that had not yet been fully considered; it was still under consideration. With regard to the question of the Army Pay Department, that was a matter which the hon. Gentleman might raise on the Vote for the administration of the War Office.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM said, he had certainly understood the noble Marquess to state that he intended to take the Votes in the order in which they stood. He should like to know if it was really intended to pursue that course? He had come down for the purpose of considering Vote 7; but if it was not to be taken that night, he should certainly go home to dinner.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, that his object had not been to detain the Committee, or to prevent them from going on with the consideration of the Votes. All he desired was that they should have a reasonable time for the discussion of the great question of Army Organization. He did not make any objection to the statement which the noble Marquess had made. He was perfectly satisfied with it; and all he desired was that the Committee should have some reasonable time for the discussion of Vote 8.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that, with the leave of the House, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would also ask leave to withdraw his Motion. He only wished to say that he thought his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies had misunderstood his object. His object had certainly not been to protest against India being required to pay the whole of the Imperial expenditure in connection with that country. He did not think that one Possession should be differently treated from any other Possession; and he certainly did not see why Ceylon, being practically a part of India, should not pay her fair proportion of the expenditure in the same way as the inhabitants of India did. So far as Natal was concerned, if the giving of representative institutions to a small minority of the population of a Colony—much less than one-tenth—was to have the effect of allowing them to tyrannize over the Mother Country, and refuse to pay their fair share of the military expenditure which Her Majesty's Government thought they ought to pay, he certainly thought this country ought to object in future to confer representative institutions upon such Colonies. So far as Halifax was concerned, he hoped we should soon be able to withdraw from it altogether. He begged to withdraw the Motion he had made for the reduction of the Vote.

MR. RYLANDS wished to say a word before the Amendment was withdrawn. He thought his hon. Friend had taken a most singular course. He had, upon a small Vote, availed himself of the opportunity of raising a most important question; a question which he (Mr. Rylands) had intended to raise, if he could have obtained an opportunity, on Vote 1; a question not merely confined to the payment of £4,000 for the clergy connected with another Establishment in the Colonies, but an expenditure of more than £2,000,000 a-year on account of Colonial Services generally. The manner in which the question had been introduced by his hon. Friend might induce people out-of-doors to suppose that it was one of small moment; whereas it was really one of very great moment. He ventured to submit to the Government that when they came into power in 1880 the policy which they then laid down was one based upon the principle of economy. He had understood that they intended, as far as possible, to keep down the expenditure for Colonial Services, especially in regard to the employment of Imperial troops. We were now paying an enormous sum for military establishments in the Colonies. The total this year amounted to £1,750,000, and that was by no means the full extent of our expenditure. This sum of £1,750,000 only appeared under certain heads; but there were very heavy items not included in the expenditure given in the Return which he held in his hand. For instance, there was nothing included in regard to the Non-Effective Services. The Committee were fully aware that the Estimates were materially swelled in consequence of the services rendered by our Army in defence of our Colonies.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is altogether exceeding the limits of this Vote by going into questions of our Colonial policy generally. The Question before the Committee is the Vote for Divine Service, and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) has proposed to withdraw an Amendment he has moved for the diminution of that Vote. The present Question is that the Amendment, by leave, be withdrawn.

MR. RYLANDS said, he had understood, from the manner in which the question had been raised by his hon. Friend, and also from the reply of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, that the Chairman would have allowed a little latitude in raising the question of Imperial contributions in aid of Colonial expenditure. At the same time, there were other Votes upon which this principle might be introduced again. It would have been most properly discussed under Vote 1; and he had thought that it might be for the convenience of the Committee if the matter were discussed now. Still, at the same time, he was bound to say that it ought to be discussed on grounds much wider than the mere payment of £4,000 to the chaplains, and he should be glad if some opportunity could be afforded to the Committee for dealing more generally with this expenditure.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would suggest to the hon. Member that if he brought forward this question on Vote 13, where there was a considerable charge for expenditure on fortifications and on other matters connected with the Colonies, he would, no doubt, be perfectly in Order.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR rose to Order. He wished to know whether it would be competent to hon. Members to discuss at a future time upon another Vote details of items in a previous Votes?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it would be his duty to decide questions of Order of the kind proposed by the hon. Member when they arose.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he desired to reply to the question put to him by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst) with regard to the employment of Roman Catholic chaplains on board transports carrying troops between this country and India. The hon. and gallant Gentleman would be aware that efforts had been made to satisfy reasonable demands in this matter. Two years ago, an arrangement was entered into between the War Office, the Admiralty, and the India Office, that in all cases in which more than 300 Roman Catholic soldiers were on board a transport a Roman Catholic priest should be employed at a remuneration to be settled between the parties. That was the endeavour they wished to see carried out; but he was bound to say that the arrangement had not been found to give full satisfaction. In the first place, it was not very frequently the case that so large a number of Roman Catholics as 300 were embarked in one transport; and, in the next place, although the matter was conducted with the assistance of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Southwark, it was not always possible to secure the services of priests. All he could say was that he would enter further into communication on this subject with the India Office, with whom it more particularly rested, because it was upon them that the expense would chiefly fall. He believed the hon. and gallant Member would see that what they had already done had been in the direction of meeting the wishes of Roman Catholics on this subject. If the Departments could see their way, improvements should be suggested. The suggestion had been made that Roman Catholic priests should be placed on the establishment for the purpose; but that would involve considerable expense, nor was that the only difficulty. He would, however, communicate with the Admiralty and India Office on the subject, and he should be glad if they would meet the object of his hon. and gallant Friend.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he desired to do full justice to the efforts of the noble Marquess; but he wished to point out that it would be impossible, under the present system, to insure what was asked for—namely, that Roman Catholic invalids coming from India should have the ministration of priests of their Church. He saw that six vessels from India had brought home Roman Catholic invalids; and it would have been necessary in that case that at least on six voyages priests should have been sent. If the Bishop of Southwark knew that he had to supply priests on every occasion, he would, no doubt, be able to do so. He attached no blame to the War Office in this matter, and was quite satisfied to leave it in the hands of the noble Marquess, with the hope that he would be able to carry out the suggestion that at least on the return voyages the services of Roman Catholic priests might be available for invalids.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BIGGAR said, he rose to call attention to what Irish Members looked upon as a grievance—namely, the absence of suitable provision for supplying religious ministration to the Militia at Carrickfergus. It seemed to him that the War Office treated the members of the Roman Catholic Church in that district in the most improper manner. Carrickfergus was a town of 10,000 inhabitants, only a limited proportion of whom were Roman Catholics. There was only one priest there, who had to officiate at two services on Sunday, and also to attend at the chapels in the adjacent rural districts for the same purpose. There was, therefore, no Roman Catholic ministration for the men who were locked up in barracks on Sundays to keep them out of mischief. He was disposed to think that even from the point of view of expediency that Roman Catholic chaplains should be attached to each Militia regiment when in training. The Government would say they gave 12s. a-week to provide a chaplain for the regiment at Carrickfergus, the calculation being that the chaplain who performed the service, and who came from some distance, should get one day's pay at a rate nearly as low as the pay of a fourth-class chaplain, which was 10s. 6d. a-day. There were not sufficient priests at Carrickfergus to meet the demands of the district; and how the noble Marquess could ask priests to come there from the South of Ireland for one day a-week at the lowest rate paid to any priest in the Service, he was at a loss to understand. Priests could, of course, be obtained if they were properly remunerated. The condition of things at Carrickfergus was different from that in other districts of Ireland. As he had already said, there should be a special chaplain for each Militia regiment, an arrangement which would be good from the point of view of economy, because the Militia, who were generally enlisted from the most disreputable class in the country, would be more under restraint, and behave themselves better than they did at present. He did not know what answer the noble Marquess would make to this; but certainly, taking all conditions into account, a more mean mode of saving money could not be imagined than the present arrangement. In order to give Irish Members an opportunity of expressing their views upon this subject, he would move the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £57,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Divine Service, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."—(Mr. Biggar.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that in the case referred to by the hon. Member for Cavan, the War Office had acted strictly in accordance with the Regulations; he might say that perhaps they had gone somewhat beyond them. The hon. Member said it would be proper to give a larger rate of remuneration to the priest at Carrickfergus; but he must be aware that that could not be done without extending the remuneration in ordinary cases. They had no power to alter the Regulations to meet a particular case. The usual rate of payment was one guinea where the number of men was 200, and 10s. 6d. where it was under 200.

MR. SEXTON said, he hoped that some modifications of the Regulations would take place. The noble Marquess thought this case of Carrickfergus was not exceptional; but he wished to impress upon him that it was really unique. The peculiarity of the case as regarded Carrickfergus was that the parish church was so small that it would only hold 230 persons, and the consequence was that the soldiers of the Line and the civil population filled it to the doors; there was no room for the Militia, and the Roman Catholic priest had to perform Divine Service at a country church miles away. It was sad to think that a priest should be expected to perform the duties of his office for a sum of money weekly, which, in a period of three months, would amount to only £10. He was sure there must be at the War Office an account for Sundries, as there was in other Departments, out of which a fitting remuneration could be given to a priest for the performance of Divine Service for the Militia at Carrickfergus; and he could not believe that it was out of the power of the noble Marquess to meet the necessities of the case. He thought the noble Marquess might say he would consider how the difficulty in his way might be overcome. It was impossible for the local priest to perform the service, because he had to attend elsewhere. The money provided by the Government was insufficient for the purpose intended; and all he and his hon. Friends asked was that the clergyman who should come from another place might be indemnified. He was bound to say that the beggarly treatment which the War Office extended to the Militia in the matter of Divine Service very ill accorded with the remarks of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Colthurst), to the effect that the noble Marquess was attentive to the requirements of Roman Catholics. This paltry and beggarly method of treating men in the Service of the Queen tended neither to the credit of the Department over which the noble Marquess presided nor to the welfare of the Militia.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the noble Marquess appeared to think that, if he made any exceptional arrangement with regard to the chaplain at Carrickfergus, it would oblige him to make similar arrangements in the case of other chaplains. But he was unable to see the cogency of that proposition. The case of Carrickfergus was in this matter peculiar and exceptional; and all that he and his hon. Friends asked of the noble Marquess was that the special circumstances should be taken into consideration within a short space of time by the War Office, and if they called for special treatment, that, without insisting upon an alteration of the Regulations, some remedy should be found for the admitted evils in this case. These services in Ireland were by no means amply provided for; the scale of allowances was extremely moderate; and here was an instance in which the Catholic community of the place were obliged to trust to the ministration of one priest. The Government of the country choosing to increase the population during a period of two months by sending 200 or 300 Militiamen into the district, he could not understand why Her Majesty's Government thought it right to reply upon this question to Irish Members in the way they had, for they sought for no general alteration, they wanted nothing more than that which would indemnify the parish priest for the expenses if he provided this ministration; and because they asked under the circumstances described they were told that their request could not be granted, because it would render necessary similar alterations elsewhere. He trusted, however, that some words might come from the Treasury Bench which would assure them that the matter should be taken into consideration.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he would submit one consideration to the noble Marquess that might have escaped him. He presumed the noble Marquess was aware that it was incumbent upon all Roman Catholics to attend the celebration of Mass on Sundays. If by enlistment into a Militia regiment a man debarred himself from performing his religious duties, he was, by that very enlistment, committing an offence; and it was the duty of everyone who knew that enlistment in a Militia regiment involved the failure of attending Mass on Sunday to tell the recruit that he ought not so to enlist. That was the duty, not only of the parish priest, but of every man acquainted with the individual. Under those circumstances, it appeared to him that the noble Marquess, by meeting this question with a simple non possumus, was throwing a very important difficulty in the way of recruiting for the Militia regiment at Carrickfergus.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not know whether the circumstances detailed by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had been brought to the notice of the War Office. He believed they had; but he would undertake to look into the matter again. If he could find in the case any circumstances which could be regarded as exceptional, and if it were not necessary to make any alteration in the Regulations, he would see what could be done. However, he believed the subject had been under consideration more than once.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the noble Marquess should say something more definite on this subject. As had been pointed out by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), the church at Carrickfergus would only contain the local population and the soldiers permanently located in the town. The noble Marquess entirely ignored the fact that there were other duties which devolved on a priest besides the duty of performing Divine Service on Sunday. A priest should be always at hand in case of sickness. He appealed to the noble Marquess to give a more explicit promise than he had given, such as that, he believed, on the merits of this case, something should be done. He thought the noble Marquess might state so much as his own personal opinion. There were other places in Ireland where the same difficulty presented itself, but in a less degree; and he knew of no place where it was felt so much as at Carrickfergus. There was a Roman Catholic population in Armagh; but in Carrickfergus there was no Roman Catholic population, and if the priest there was unable to spare time to perform the service he could not afford to employ a curate for the work. His contention was, that if a priest came from a distance he should be paid so much as would compensate him, not extravagantly, but reasonably, for his time and expense in ministering to the Militia at Carrickfergus.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have said I would look into the matter again, and that if it were possible the case should be met, if it could be done without alteration of the Regulations.

MR. W. REDMOND said, unless some definite promise were given, he believed the answer of the noble Marquess would be taken by the people of Ireland, and particularly by those chiefly interested in the matter, as most unsatisfactory. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had stated certain exceptional circumstances in connection with the religious services at Carrickfergus, and the noble Marquess merely said he would make further inquiries with regard to the case in Ireland. It seemed to him that this way of treating the Representatives of Ireland in this House was anything but satisfactory, and highly calculated to inspire the people with discontent. The hon. Member for Sligo had stated, from his own knowledge, that there were exceptional circumstances surrounding this case which rendered it absolutely necessary that the clergyman going to Carrickfergus to perform Divine Service for the soldiers should be remunerated in an exceptional manner; and instead of taking the statements of the hon. Member as final and correct, they only had it from the noble Marquess that further inquiries should be made. Now, if the noble Marquess made further inquiries in Ireland, he hoped he would not inquire of the officials at the Castle in Dublin, who did not possess the confidence of the people. He thought it only reasonable for Irish Members to expect that their representations should be taken as correct by the occupants of the Treasury Bench. He did not think it was at all fair, or calculated to promote harmony of feeling in that House, that the representations of the Members for Ireland on matters like this should be disregarded; that they should be told that they were not sufficient, and that the noble Marquess would make inquiries of the officials at Dublin Castle. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had pointed out clearly, not only that the allowance made by Her Majesty's Government for the purpose of Divine Service on Sundays was insufficient, but that it was likewise insufficient for the other duties which a Roman Catholic minister had to perform. Where there was a large number of men, it was only reasonable to expect that the ministrations of the priest who went on Sunday to say Mass at Carrickfergus would be required in other cases, and on other days. Would the noble Marquess say that the priest should be remunerated for those services? At present they had only an undertaking that the priest should be remunerated for going on Sunday to say Mass. As the case stood at present, only a paltry allowance was given, and the other great services of the priest were ignored. Unless some definite promise on this point were given, it would be regarded throughout Ireland as most unsatisfactory.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it was, perhaps, hardly fair to expect the noble Marquess to go further than he felt himself at liberty to go at that moment. The noble Marquess had said that the remarks of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had thrown new light upon this question, and that he was prepared to reconsider it. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) should not be disposed to press the noble Marquess any further; but he would ask whether he would consent to postpone the Report of the Vote until the War Office decision had been arrived at and communicated to Irish Members? If so, he would be willing to assent to the withdrawal of the Motion for the reduction of the Vote.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he should be glad to agree to the suggestion of the hon. Member who had just sat down, if it were in his power to do so. He was, however, afraid the matter was one which would take some time. The Vote was, as the hon. Member observed, a small one; but the official communications on the subject would pass through several hands. He would see if the Report of the Vote could be postponed; and, if not, he would answer the question on some other occasion.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the chaplain might be remunerated by a yearly salary, instead of being paid so much for performing one service. In the hope that the noble Marquess would be able before the Report to give a satisfactory answer to his appeal, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £36,800, Administration of Military Law.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he had last year asked a Question with regard to the condition of the Army in respect of crime and courts martial, and he should be glad of any further information which the Judge Advocate General could give the Committee upon that subject.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, that, as he had anticipated last year, the year 1883 had shown an improvement in respect of Crime in the Army as compared with 1882. He was happy to say that the preliminary Return which had just been published fully bore out that expectation. The Return, as he had said, was but preliminary, and related only to the Home Army; the other Return would not be published for two months. He thought the proper course would be to compare the crimes stated in that Return with the crimes in the Home Army during the year 1882, and in so comparing them it would be found that there had been a distinct improvement during the year 1883. He should mention that the number of troops constituting the Home Army in 1883 was less than in 1882. In round numbers, there were in 1882, 90,000 men; whereas in 1883 the Home Army consisted of 86,000 men. Making allowance for the diminution of numbers, he was able to say that the year 1883 compared favourably with 1882; and with the permission of the Committee he would give some figures relating to those two years. In 1882 the number of courts martial in the Home Army was 8,472; in 1883 it was 7,526. The sentences passed in the Home Army were in 1882, 8,382, as against 7,392 in 1883. With regard to offences, he found that in 1882 there were 12,144; but in 1883 they only amounted to 10,703; while under every one of the 13 heads under which crimes in the Army were classed, except two, there was a diminution. There was a very remarkable diminution of crimes relating to enlistment, those in 1882 numbering 883, while in 1883 there were only 602. Another satisfactory decrease appeared in the number of offences arising out of drunkenness; the number of charges of drunkenness on duty which in 1882 numbered 982, was in 1883, 733. He might add that the number of men in the Home Army fined for drunkenness was at the rate of 150 per 1,000 in 1882, and it was satisfactory to observe that the rate had fallen in 1883 to 102 per 1,000. Notwithstanding that this Return was confined to the Home Army, he believed he should not be wrong in stating that as regards the Army abroad the same improvement would be found to have taken place. In Egypt the conduct of the Army had been especially good; during this year the number of courts martial held there was 90, there being only one general and 89 district courts martial.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that the Returns quoted by the Judge Advocate General showed an undoubted decrease in the number of crimes, so far as the Forces at home were concerned; but he must express his regret that, although those Returns were tolerably full, they were not made a little fuller. He thought those very interesting figures which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given the Committee, both as to last year and the present, might have been put into two columns in the Returns, because there was this disadvantage in the way they were presented—that although they could see very well what had happened in 1883, they could not see what had happened in 1882. They had, therefore, no means of comparing the two years with each other, and of seeing if there had been any improvement last year, or otherwise. He suggested that, when the Returns were brought up again, the figures relating to the previous year and the present year should be given in two columns.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): The noble Lord will find that is done in the Returns of 1882.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that was, no doubt, the case in one sense; but it would be much more convenient, and of greater use, if it were given on the same page, as was the case with the ordinary Estimates, in which one could see at a glance any increase or decrease of the items. He did not doubt the accuracy of the statement of the Judge Advocate General with regard to the conduct of the Army, and the decrease in the number of courts martial; but he observed a large item under the term Miscellaneous. In the Cavalry and Line, for instance, the total number of courts martial was 685; 239, or more than one-third of these, being returned for miscellaneous offences alone. What those miscellaneous offences were was not stated; and, therefore, he thought it would be of great advantage to the Committee that some information should be forthcoming on that point. He believed that a Member of the Committee last year drew attention to the same fact. The view he took was that as so much information was given in the Returns, the Committee might as well have a little more; and he quite agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir George Balfour) that it was a good thing to give the Judge Advocate General an opportunity of making a further explanation. It was always satisfactory to hear anything good of the state of the Army; but, of course, it was much more so at the present time. When they had Forces abroad, as was the case now in Egypt, and when little expeditions were being sent into the interior of Africa, it would be well if there were some means of knowing how the men had conducted themselves under those circumstances. He did not understand from the Judge Advocate General, who stated that this Return applied only to the Home Service, that the men were really quartered in the United Kingdom. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had a private Return, he should very much like it to be made public.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): It is only a partial Return.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Quite so. He was only suggesting that, having so many troops just now in Egypt, and having sent little expeditions into the Soudan, it would be for the benefit of the Army itself, and for the convenience of the House, if a separate Return was given of the number of courts martial and crimes connected with the Expeditionary Forces, from which they might arrive at a conclusion, which he doubted not would be satisfactory, as to the way in which the men had conducted themselves. He asked this especially, because, during the last three years, as the Committee would be aware, changes had been made in the character of punishments in the Army. Corporal punishment had been abolished, and they knew that the late Secretary of State for War—the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers)—had created, or rather recommended, other punishments. He recollected the right hon. Gentleman mentioning a number of punishments which were not exactly approved either on that side of the House or the other—such as tying the men to trees, throwing pails of water over them, and so forth. There was nothing to show whether men had been sentenced to those punishments, either by commanding officers or by courts martial; and, therefore, it was desirable to know how far they had tended to the reduction or prevention of crime. Of course, they had been informed that the punishments were experimental; but if it were proved on trial that they were such as could not be inflicted in a practical way, he thought it would be well to admit the fact at once, so as to save further time, and let the House know the position in which they stood. Hon. Gentlemen on the Benches around him had always said that corporal punishment was a disagreeable necessity; and, at the same time, they believed there was nothing between it and the punishment of death. Of course, if it were proved that corporal punishment could be done away with altogether, without detriment to the discipline of the Army, he thought it was certainly a matter worth stating, and none would be more rejoiced at it than Gentlemen on those Benches. At the same time, they ought to have some statistics to show how far the punishment substituted had succeeded, or otherwise. With these few remarks he would conclude, as he began, by expressing his satisfaction at hearing that the state of the Army at home was so good; and he trusted that on another occasion they should be allowed to know a little more as to the state of the Army abroad.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he thought the Committee and the country would be satisfied with the information obtained from the Judge Advocate General with regard to the diminution in the number of courts martial and in the crimes and punishments in the Home Army. The minor courts martial might appear to be numerous; but hon. Members would be aware that the offences tried by such courts martial were not of great importance. The general courts martial were of more importance; and he thought that a Return showing more fully the number abroad would be exceedingly valuable to the officers of the Army. On the whole, he regarded the explanations as satisfactory.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he had just one remark to make with reference to an article in The Times on the subject of courts martial. The article, commenting on the number of courts martial in the Infantry, said it was very hard that good regiments should be confounded with bad; and it was added that this would always be the case, because Her Majesty's Government refused to grant the Returns of the number of courts martial for each regiment. Now, he hoped Her Majesty's Government would continue to refuse such a Return, because he was sure it would be injurious and pernicious to the best interests of the Service. The effect of it would be to induce commanding officers to settle themselves questions that ought to be brought under the cognizance of courts martial. Those who, so to speak, were behind the scenes well knew that there were many ways of doing this; by taking crimes out of one category and placing them in another. Take the crime of insubordination, for instance. A commanding officer and his adjutant would lay their heads together, and, not wishing a court martial for insubordination to appear in the Return, they would agree to try the accused for using improper language instead of threatening language; the matter would then be settled by the commanding officer, who would sentence the individual to seven days' cell. That was an improper way of dealing with offences of the kind; but it was one which would be resorted to if the Returns, suggested in the article in The Times, were given by Her Majesty's Government. No doubt, courts martial were, to a certain extent, a criterion of the state of a regiment; but that was a matter to be settled by a confidential official Report, and not by the general public. He said that the Return would have the effect of deterring officers from doing their duty, and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would resolutely refuse it.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON assured the Committee that even the Returns which were now furnished, and which only went to the Horse Guards, were a great inducement to commanding officers to enter under one head crimes that ought to be placed under another. He had frequently drawn the attention of commanding officers to this. These were purely confidential Returns, which ought to go to the Commander-in-Chief, or to the Secretary of State for War alone, and he hoped the Government would not agree to furnish them.

Major General Alexander

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he had a question to ask with regard to the reduction to a lower grade of non-commissioned officers. Would the Judge Advocate General state how that matter stood as compared with last year? The number of reductions seemed to be very large; and he would like to know what were the crimes committed by the men who had been reduced? He did not coincide with all that had been said by his hon. and gallant Friend, but would not go further into that matter then. He simply asked his right hon. and learned Friend to give some information on the subject he had referred to. Then there was another point to which he had called attention on a former occasion. It related to the question of pensions in the case of non-commissioned officers who were reduced. He asked whether a non-commissioned officer, who had always done his duty and worked well for a number of years, and was then reduced for a small offence, would be allowed to remain on to complete his time, though reduced to the ranks, so as to earn a pension? Because it seemed to him a very hard thing that a man should, under the circumstances, lose his pension after having served almost all his time. He commended this matter to the noble Marquess as one deserving his serious attention.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (MR. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he would take a note of the various suggestions made by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Eustace Cecil). With regard to the statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major General Alexander), he did not find, as a general rule, that crimes in the Army were leniently dealt with by commanding officers. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had remarked that the number of reductions in 1883 was very considerable; but he would point out that the reduction was not always to the ranks—it was generally from the grade of colour sergeant to that of sergeant or lance corporal. The number of reductions, however, had fallen off considerably; they amounted in 1883 to 1,183, and in 1882 to 1,290, the improvement being 12 per cent. With regard to corporal punishment, he could, of course, only state the results since its abolition, and those from the figures he had laid before the Committee were satisfactory.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the reply of the Judge Advocate General only confirmed the statement that commanding officers were sometimes induced to deal with crimes in the Army in the manner described. The essence of the contention was that the crimes did not come forward under their correct headings, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman could not, therefore, be cognizant of their real character; he had no possible means of judging. The only persons acquainted with the facts were the officers on the Staff. The Judge Advocate General must take the cases as they came before him.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): I beg pardon; I see the whole of the evidence. I read it in all cases of court martial, to ascertain whether the crime charged against the individual is adapted to the actual offence committed.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the Judge Advocate General expressed exactly what he had intended to convey. There were a vast number of men who were never brought to trial at all. The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of courts martial. The cases he (Sir Alexander Gordon) referred to were kept back from trial, in order that they might be excluded from the Return of the more serious offences.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £303,000, Medical Establishment and Services.

MR. GUY DAWNAY said, that he must apologize, as a civilian, for trespassing on the attention of the House in regard to a military subject; but he might say in excuse that he had had the working of the Medical Service in the field forced upon his notice on one or two occasions, and he had done all that lay in his power to promote inquiry into that subject, so far as it was connected with the Egyptian Campaign. He thought it a matter for regret that they had not had a discussion on the Report of Lord Morley's Committee last year, when the circumstances were fresh in mind. For his own part, he had done everything he could to obtain it, having tried throughout last Session, though in vain, to bring forward a Motion on the subject, while the discussion on the Vote itself was put off until a ridiculously late time in the Session—a Saturday Sitting at the latter end of August. He was glad that so early an opportunity of discussing the question had presented itself this year; and he wished now to refer to a few facts connected with the inquiry into the working of the Army Hospital Service; and, in the second place, to call attention to the inefficiency and non-economy of the present Unification or Departmental system, under which the medical officers of the Army were at present appointed. He did not think there could be any difference of opinion at all as to the general value of the inquiry which took place last year; and he was sure that, whenever another campaign was forced upon the country, the sick and wounded would owe no small debt of gratitude to the Committee over which Lord Morley presided, as well as to the outcry that called forth that Committee, if only the authorities would give effect to its recommendations; and it was to be hoped that when they received the details of the Suakin Campaign, they would find that already a good effect had been produced. No one on that Committee would deny that the evidence adduced showed an ample case for a searching inquiry into the organization of the Army Hospital Service, and the breakdown alleged to have taken place in the Egyptian Campaign. The most had been made of one or two exaggerated and unfounded statements which had found their way into the public Press; but, with those statements eliminated, the fact remained, upheld by the testimony of everyone connected with the Service—by officers and men alike—indirectly even by the medical officers themselves—by the nurses whose devotion was as usual the brightest spot in the Hospital history—supported also by the valuable testimony of Lord Wolseley—that owing to the inherent defects in the system of organization—the glaring defects in the method of selecting and training the Army Hospital Corps—and owing to the unwillingness of the medical authorities to assume proper authority and responsibility, a very considerable amount of needless suffering had been inflicted on our soldiers, and a large amount of wasted expenditure upon the nation. Some references had been made to alleged inconsistencies between Lord Wolseley's evidence before the Committee and the Report made by him during the campaign. He would express his satisfaction that Lord Wolseley had been able to corroborate with the great weight of his authority the evidence of those who served under him in the campaign; and he would point out that it was sufficiently clear that Lord Wolseley was prepared to pass over, without blame to the Department, any failures that could possibly be attributed to the sudden strain upon their resources at Ismailia; that he was satisfied, and justly satisfied, with their performance at Tel-el-Kebir; but that, with all his readiness to make allowance for the Department, and his appreciation of individual energy, he could not tolerate and pass over that Departmental apathy and want of organizing power which was forced upon his notice by the want of arrangements for the comfort of the sick and wounded in Cairo. It would be a very invidious task to attempt to apportion any blame to individuals; but he would like briefly to bear his testimony to the unflagging energy with which the surgeons at the front did their duty. It had been clearly acknowledged in the Report itself that, as regarded the administrative medical officers at Cairo and Ismailia, there was a lack of initiative and energetic supervision; but for the medical officers at the front there had been nothing but praise and commendations; indeed, he might say, in truth, there had been nothing but praise and commendation—for out of all the Orders and Decorations showered abroad in connection with the campaign, none had reached any one of those who bore the burden and heat of the day. He had come in contact more especially with the surgeons of the Life Guards and Blues and Foot Guards; and he could state that nothing could have exceeded the zealous and kindly care which they manifested throughout a campaign in which the numbers of sick, if not of wounded, certainly taxed their energies very severely. The want had been, not of professional care, but of Departmental organization. Attempts had been made to rebut this charge by pointing to the small death-rate in Egypt. No doubt, the death-rate was satisfactory; but the question still remained, did there, or did there not, exist a distinct amount of preventable suffering, and a distinct absence of procurable comfort?

He was afraid that everyone who read the evidence contained in the Blue Book impartially must come to the conclusion that the question on both points could only be answered in the affirmative. The country was ready to pay any sum which might be demanded to lessen the sufferings of the troops; and he could not understand how it was that, with a harbour for a base, containing the finest fleet of transports ever collected for the conveyance of stores and troops, with the exceptional advantage of a commodious building ready for immediate use as a hospital, on the 10th day after landing, sick men were obliged to lie on bare boards instead of the palliasses, which were an essential part of ordinary field hospital equipment. It was in evidence also, and he would like to hear it explained, why, on board first-class transports, convalescents, to whom good food meant recovery and meant life, should have been kept so hungry that they had to beg bits of biscuit from the sailors? Neither could he understand why the bread, which was refused by commanders of regiments at Ismailia, should have been accepted and served out by the medical officers in the hospital after only verbal remonstrances. Officers in command of regiments at Ismailia not only condemned and refused the Commissariat bread, but forced the Commissariat officer to replace it with locally purchased bread; while in the far more important case of the sick and wounded in the hospital, the medical officers contented themselves with simple remonstrances and protests, and then served out to the wounded men in their charge this atrocious compound of unwholesome flour and indifferent water. There was a worse case still. It could not be understood why, on the very day that 400 wounded men came down from Tel-el-Kebir to Ismailia, three days after the fight, it was so arranged that two field hospitals were ordered up from Ismailia to the front, thereby denuding the hospitals at the base of their proper attendants, and rendering it necessary to supply their places with men taken from one of the regiments stationed there. He asked the Committee to picture the scene which was described by Miss Lloyd, in the Blue Book—the 400 wounded soldiers lying at Ismailia all night in their helplessness and pain, without any orderlies to attend to them, or, if orderlies were forthcoming, finding themselves not only at the mercy of men utterly ignorant and untrained as nurses, but brutally drunk in the bargain. Could the authorities excuse, or could the country permit, an organization which allowed such a disgraceful scene as that in the Ismailia hospital on the night in question? It had been said that a great part of the complaints made of the hospital treatment came from officers. As a matter of fact, he knew there were several officers who could have given very valuable evidence in condemnation of the Medical Department in the Egyptian Campaign; but they refused to volunteer their evidence, because they feared it might be said they were grumblers. That might be a feeling worthy of respect; but he would assert that no officer had come forward to give evidence, or would have wished to have done so, except on the far higher and more worthy grounds of the fulfilment of a public duty in exposing the faults and errors of the present system. Again, the men themselves were afraid to find fault, or to come before Lord Morley's Committee and give evidence. He hoped hon. Members would give him credit for not trying to make a long Blue Book speech. But, if he had thought it necessary, he could have corroborated by quotation from the Blue Book every point he had raised. Although during the consideration of the Army Estimates the attendance was not large, all who were present were acquainted with the subject; and he thought they would agree with him when he said there was ample evidence of the fact that the men themselves were afraid to give evidence. As to the only other means of information—the doctors—the doctors, of course, considered that the inquiry was a direct attack upon themselves. One of them said the cooking was "fairly good." Lord Wolseley said, "I have never seen such bad cooking." And another surgeon said he was "fairly satisfied with his orderlies." He thought that that gentleman's evidence would have little weight with those who had studied the rest of the evidence. Good could not fail to come of the inquiry with regard to hospital orderlies. They would learn discipline instead of drill; they would get some proper hard training; and he hoped that in the future there would be fewer cases of hospital orderlies stealing the medical comforts, and giving pills and applying mustard plaisters to the wrong patients, and still fewer cases of them using bad language and threats to the wounded and helpless soldiers. The recommendations of Lord Morley's Committee on these points were very valuable, as were also the recommendations with respect to field panniers; the abolition of the foolish rule under which, in non-dieted hospitals, a patient was subject to 24 hours' starvation; the provision for the proper cooking instruction of the Army Hospital Corps; and last, but by no means least, the recommendation as to the more general and recognized employment of nursing sisters. There was one recommendation, however, which seemed so entirely opposed to all the evidence which was given before the Committee, that one was astounded to find it included in the Report at all, and sanctioned by the signatures of any of the Committee—he meant the recommendation that the Army should not be allowed to return, as would have been expected from the evidence, to a modified form of the regimental system; but that the Medical Service of the Household Troops should be assimilated to that of the rest of the Army. Two Members of the Committee had dissented from that view; and he could not understand how any body of individuals could make such a recommendation after hearing the evidence. Without exception, every commanding officer who was examined before the Committee, besides the Duke of Cambridge, Lord Wolseley, and Sir Daniel Lysons, had condemned the present system, and advocated a return to a modified form of the regimental system—a system that should attach surgeons to regiments for periods, say, of five years. They had pointed out, in the clearest and most convincing manner, the disadvantage of a system which entailed constant changes of medical officers; the constant ignorance as to who was temporarily in charge of the men as medical officer. They had dwelt upon the waste of force that must necessarily ensue from this planetary system of medical supervision; they had dwelt upon the very great dislike which was entertained, both by the men and the married women, for these constant changes; and yet, in spite of this overwhelming testimony, in spite of the fact that the best medical officers themselves detested the shuttle-cock principle on which they were treated; in spite of this mass of evidence, the Committee arrived at a conclusion which was not only discreditable to their own common sense, but which was equally opposed to the best interests and wishes of the Army. If any hon. Member had not studied the question he (Mr. Guy Dawnay) asked him to refer to the evidence, given in the Index, under the head of "Regimental Medical System," and especially to the evidence of Colonel Nicholls, of the 3rd Battalion of the Rifle Brigade. Colonel Nicholls related how, in 14 months, at the Curragh his regiment had been under the charge of 13 different medical officers, and also referred to the case of a man in the Rifle Brigade who, one cold morning, two years ago, when the regiment was starting for a march out, was sent by his colonel to hospital at Aldershot suffering from severe bronchitis. The man was at once sent back as a malingerer. The commanding officer then sent him to his hut; and when the battalion returned from its march, the poor fellow, who but a few hours before had been turned away from the hospital as a shammer and malingerer, was found dead. The case against the present system was ably and clearly stated in the Appendix to the Report, which contained the dissent of Major General Hawley and Colonel Loyd Lindsay to the recommendations of the Committee. Those gallant officers said—

"With reference to the above important question (namely, the distribution of medical officers), we are of opinion that the inconvenience to the Service (which the Report admits to be justly complained of in the Army) is due to defects inherent in the unification system itself, and not to faulty working of details which might be remedied. The two systems under which the Army Medical Service can be worked—namely, the unification and the regimental systems—are distinct both in principle and in practice. Under the first—namely, the unification system—the medical officers form a separate professional department. This system proceeds on the principle of detaching them from regiments, and from the duties that would there devolve upon them, and of attaching them to station hospitals. If medical officers were to drop the military character which has always attached to them, this system might be made to work fairly well in time of peace; but without great alteration in detail it could not be carried out efficiently in time of war. . . . Under the second—namely, the regimental system—medical officers are attached to regiments, the sanitation of which they have in charge, under the commanding officers, together with medical attendance on the wives and families of men belonging to the regiment. This is the system which officers in the Army, from the Commander-in-Chief downwards, are unanimously in favour of. Every branch of the Service—Engineers, Artillery, Cavalry, and Line—have given evidence in favour of it before this Committee; and the General Officer commanding at Aldershot has also, in his evidence, advocated the advantage of it. It is the system adopted in every Continental Army without exception; and it is the system to which our own Army reverts in time of war, when a medical officer is attached to every regiment proceeding on active service. . . . The system at present in force (and which the Army regards with so much objection) is a compromise. It wavers from side to side, inclining to a civil organization in time of peace, and to a regimental system in time of war—thereby necessitating a sudden change of system and of organization at the very moment when smooth working (which can only be attained by practice and experience) is of vital importance to the efficiency of the Medical Service during a campaign. For these reasons, we recommend a return to the regimental system, so far as it attaches a medical officer to each unit of the Service."

That was very strong testimony; but he thought the matter was still more clearly stated in the Table of the comparative advantages and disadvantages of a return to the regimental system. Anyone who read that Table must see that the advantages of a return to the regimental system far outweighed the possible disadvantages. Now, what were the objections to a return to a modified form of the regimental system? In the first place, it was said—

"It is undesirable to introduce changes until the present system had had a fair trial."

The present system had had a long trial, and in the opinion of all military men it had completely broken down. Secondly, it was said that—

"It would create considerable, though perhaps not insuperable, difficulties in the arrangement of the roster of medical officers for foreign service."

In this case it was allowed that the difficulty was not insuperable. Thirdly, it was said that—"It is impossible to administer the station hospitals with the two classes of medical officers without great friction;"

This was one of those vague arguments which was, for that reason, difficult to answer; but he could not but think it a trivial point. Again, it was said that—"It would not provide for the medical attendance of detachments, which would be in the same position as at present."

Mr. Guy Dawnay

The experience of the Household Troops, however, proved conclusively that there was no force in this objection. Fifthly,

"It would, in some cases, involve a waste of power and a probable deterioration in the professional competence of the medical officer so attached, owing to want of practice; and that at the larger stations the advantage of being able to distribute the medical officers, so that special classes of cases may be dealt with by specially qualified surgeons, would be lost;"

but under the system that had been suggested by the Duke of Cambridge and others—namely, that a medical officer should be attached to a regiment for five years, that would be entirely obviated, and there would be ample opportunity for proper practice. The sixth, and the last, objection was the real one. It was said—"It would entail additional expense." That expense had been put down by the authorities themselves at £22,500 a-year. He maintained that the present system sacrificed the efficiency and the comfort of the Army to an utterly false economy; that, in fact, it involved at critical times a far greater outlay than could possibly be saved in time of peace; it helped most materially to disgust the men whom already we found such difficulty in attracting as recruits to our Army, or in retaining when trained in the Army, and all that for the sake of saving, at the outside, £22,500 a-year, and for the sake of giving a further fair trial, as it was called, to a system which, in the opinion of every military expert, and every reliable authority, had already completely broken down. After what he had said, he did not think he need dwell on the proposal to assimilate the Medical Service of the Household Troops to that of the rest of the Army. If the beauties of uniformity were alone to justify such a proposal, he might point out that it could be attained as easily and with real advantage to the Service by assimilating the Medical Service of the rest of the Army to that of the Brigade of Guards, and by providing that, as in the Brigade, the regimental medical officers should do duty at the station hospital. He must point out, however, that if the proposed assimilation were carried out the grossest injustice would be done; because the medical officers of the Household Troops had joined that branch of the Service on the distinct understanding that they should be retained as medical officers in the Household Troops. They joined that branch of the Service, though well aware of any such disadvantages attaching to the position as those mentioned in Lord Morley's Report—namely, that they were excluded from advancement to the higher grades; and yet, with that knowledge, not only did they join willingly and gladly in the first instance, but now they were equally surprised and disgusted to find it was seriously proposed by Lord Morley's Committee to assimilate to the broken down and generally condemned medical system of the rest of the Army that system, under which their services were first engaged, and for which they had already resigned any participation in the chance of advancement to higher grades, to which a different choice in their profession at the first would have entitled them. He did not suppose, however, that this recommendation of the Committee would receive the serious attention of the authorities; and in any case he would leave the subject to others better qualified by their connection with the Guards to deal with the question. He regretted to have taken up so much of the time of the Committee as a civilian; but he had thought himself bound to allude to the results of that inquiry which he had done his utmost to promote, and he had, at least, had opportunities of forming an impartial opinion as to the absolute necessity of a return to a modified form of the regimental system. By the new Rules he was precluded from bringing forward at this stage of the Estimates a Motion; but he expressed the hope that the general judgment, not only of the House, but of the authorities, might agree with him, in the terms of a Motion which stood in his name on the Paper, that—

"The present method of appointing Medical Officers in the Army according to the Unification System has not contributed either to the efficiency or economy of the Service, and that such economy and efficiency would be better secured by a return to a modified form of the Regimental System."

DR. FARQUHARSON said, that, before he ventured to make a few remarks on the various questions touched on by his hon. Friend, he desired to congratulate the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) upon the saving of £600 a-year which had been effected by the abolition of the post of Commandant at Netley. He had got, however, a slight suspicion that this long-standing grievance was not altogether dead yet. He did not want to accuse the noble Marquess of any desire to perpetuate the grievance in another form; but he thought the military authorities were very anxious to cling to this particular piece of patronage. He noticed that in "another place" military authorities had maintained that every military hospital ought to have a commandant of this kind attached to them. He should like to know whether Colonel Pell was now, in a modified form, Commandant at Netley; whether he was to be allowed to have access to the wards at all times, and inspect them as a field officer? Because, if that were so, the new state of things would be nothing more or less than a perpetuation of the old grievance. He hoped the noble Marquess would be able to assure the Committee that this officer would be entirely subordinate to the officer commanding the district. The gentleman could not, according to the Army Regulations, have anything to do with the school at Netley, which had a separate existence under the Secretary of State for War. He (Dr. Farquharson) should consider the gentleman's duties were merely extracted or filched from those of the officer commanding the district. He thought the Medical Department would hear with great satisfaction that there was a determination to amalgamate the Army Hospital Corps into one large Corps. He hoped it would succeed in attracting a better class of men to the Corps. The Army Hospital Corps were much complained of for their conduct in the recent campaign in Egypt. To a certain degree the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Guy Dawnay's) accusations were borne out by the facts. It was said the men were intemperate, lazy, and dishonest. They certainly performed their duties of nursing badly; but it must be remembered they were never taught nursing. Many of them had never seen a sick man in bed before they went out to Egypt; therefore, it was not to be wondered at that many of them were unfit to discharge the difficult duties of nursing sick men. It was a fact that some of them had only three months' training at home prior to being sent out, and that a great part of the time was taken up with the ordinary drill of the soldier. Moreover, when they were out in Egypt they were greatly overworked. At Ismailia, owing to deficiency of transport, the men of the Army Hospital Corps had to work like beasts of burden, bringing up the stores to the hospitals. Their duties were hard and laborious, and they were very often disagreeable duties. There was, therefore, some excuse for the men; and the Committee must not be too hard upon them, considering the very few opportunities they had had beforehand of learning the work they were called upon to do. It was evident that in future the men of this Corps must have a long and special training. It was quite evident they must have at least two months' nursing experience, and that they must be taught cooking. They ought to be well paid; their prospects of promotion ought to be improved; and their characters, previous to entering the Service, ought to be more carefully sifted than they had been hitherto. Of course, it was quite evident also that it was best to recruit the men from civil life. A commanding officer would not give up his best men for hospital service; therefore, it was well the Army Hospital Corps should be recruited directly from civil life. It was desirable, too, that the Army Medical Department should have some opportunity of practising bearers and field hospital drill. It was important that an entire field hospital should occasionally be mobilized in this country, as was the case so often in Germany. As to the regimental system, they had been told that terrible results had followed the abandonment of the old regimental system. Personally, he was in favour of a return to some modified form of the regimental system, which, of course, was now quite dead, and could never be revived. It would be well if medical officers were appointed to a regiment for four or five years, and during that time had an opportunity of attending hospitals. He did not believe the regimental and hospital duties would clash at all; on the contrary, he was of opinion that the plan would work extremely well. The present system was an exceedingly bad one socially for the Medical Department; and it was otherwise an uncomfortable and disagreeable one, inasmuch as the doctors had no settled home. It was also a very inconvenient system to the regimental officers themselves. It was a bad system, because officers did not know to whom they should send in case of need; he knew that men had been attended by two or three different doctors. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had made what he (Dr. Farquharson) considered a very unjust attack upon the Medical Department during the recent campaign in Egypt. He gathered from the Blue Book that the Medical Department in that campaign was one of the most successful Departments, in a medical point of view, that had ever been known in this or in any other country. Those who were attached to the Department did their duty with zeal, efficiency, and skill; and the Report of Sir William M'Cormack in the Blue Book bore ample testimony to the difficulties which had to be encountered. There were great difficulties in connection with the character of the roads, and also in the absence of transport. The troops pushing rapidly to the front were without the means of transport; and, bearing in mind the nature of the difficulties, the medical results were far better than in any previous campaign. Sir William M'Cormack, a great authority upon such matters, expressed that opinion over and over again. During the period the Army were in the field, and afterwards those scourges to which the military were subject in hospital—such as gangrene, erysipelas, &c.—were almost unknown. Although ophthalmia constantly occurred early in the campaign, it was satisfactory to find that not a single man lost his sight. Everything was sent out that was required, or could be desired, for the comfort and ease of the Army in the field. The Medical Department were not responsible for the places which were used as hospitals. He knew that at Ismailia a disused palace was suddenly handed over, and at 48 hours' notice a large hospital had to be extemporized out of practically nothing, because, although it was a very large building, there was absolutely nothing in it when it was handed over. When the ships arrived the transport for the use of the Medical Department was taken away for military purposes and field hospitals. No. 2 and 3 had to be dragged up with great labour by the men of the Army Hospital Corps. It was opened on the 23rd of August; and when they were inspected on the 25th by Sir John Adye he said that they appeared to be comfortably arranged, and that everything had been done for the comfort of the men that could be done. Lord Wolseley visited the hospitals, and expressed himself satisfied with everything that was being done. Under these circumstances, what occurred afterwards in his Lordship's evidence before the Morley Committee came upon the Department like a thunder-bolt. He was sorry to detain the Committee so long, but these were very important points. On the 16th of September Lord Wolseley wrote—

"The medical arrangements were all they could have been, and reflect the highest credit upon Surgeon-General Hanbury."

On the 24th of the same month he wrote—

"The Medical Department, under Surgeon General Hanbury, C.B., have done everything that could possibly be done for the care and comfort of the sick and wounded. The manner in which the wounded were removed from the fighting line by the Bearer Company was most satisfactory."

And on the 30th Lord Wolseley telegraphed to Dr. Crawford, the Director General of the Army Medical Department, from Abdin—

"Dr. Hanbury has shown me your telegram as to the alleged defects in medical arrangements. I have told him he need not answer, as full explanations go home by post. We are all too busy here to reply to the false and malicious reports to which you refer. The Medical Department is working to my entire satisfaction."

No wonder that the statements subsequently made came upon the Medical Department like a thunder-bolt. He found that most of the complaints in regard to the supply of food were made by men who had had no experience of warfare. The staff of cooks was certainly not composed of experienced men. It was impossible to keep meat there, and it was necessary to cook it quickly every night. When the men were asked why they asserted that they had nothing to eat, they said it was provided for them as medical comforts, not as food; but, at the same time, it must be borne in mind that, for medical reasons, the men were purposely kept low. As he had said, if they were to analyze the complaints they would find that they were made by inexperienced men, who had had no previous experience of war, and who were fretting in consequence of the restrictions upon their ease and comfort, which restrictions, however, were absolutely necessary. The complaints were principally complaints with regard to the food supply. They were made by one officer and six men of the Life Guards, by four men of the Royal Horse Guards, and by one or two of the Coldstream Guards and the Scots Guards. On the other hand, the Infantry generally expressed themselves satisfied with all that was done for them. As to the deficiency of beds, to which allusion had been made, it must be remembered that Ismailia was only a naval hospital.

Mr. GUY DAWNAY said, he had referred to the want of palliasses.

Dr. FARQUHARSON remarked that complaint had also been made of the deficiency of drugs, and especially of carbolic oil; but this was a clumsy way of using antiseptic treatment, and a far better plan was to make a lotion with water and carbolic acid, of which there was an ample supply. In regard to the complaints made against the Medical Department for abstaining from purchasing articles required in connection with the service in Egypt, he would simply remind the Committee of a paragraph in a letter from the War Office, dated August 5, 1882, and addressed to the General Officer commanding the troops in Egypt. This letter said—

“It is essential that, except in the case of petty office or departmental purchases (which may be made by heads of department) there should be but one purchasing department in the local market, and all articles required should be provided by means of requisitions upon the Commissariat Department, which should give all the necessary information as to quantities and description, and the measures proposed for obtaining the supplies. The responsibility of making the purchases in the best possible manner will then rest with the senior Commissariat officer, subject to your orders.”

They were told that the bread was bad. No doubt the bread was bad, and it was reported against by the medical officer. At the earliest moment, and as soon as possible, better bread was issued. It was said—“Why did not the Medical Department buy bread for themselves?” It was impossible to do so, because there was not nearly enough bread in the market at the time to supply the hospitals. That fact was fully borne out by the evidence. Major Butler, who was the commandant, admitted that some of the officers at their own table were able to get excellent bread. Very likely that was the reason why the medical officers were not able to obtain it for the hospitals. What would have happened if the medical officers had decided on purchasing for themselves all the articles of which there was a deficiency? No doubt they were most anxious to have everything that was required; but if they had purchased without authority, would they have had any prospect of getting their money back again? A supply of mosquito curtains had been sent out; but when they were wanted they could not be found, and what could be bought were perfectly valueless, and neither the men nor the officers could use them—they considered it far more desirable to have plenty of fresh air. The fact was that the public mind had been contaminated, not only by the unfortunate evidence before the Morley Committee, which was all on one side of the question, but by the credulity of certain newspaper correspondents. He recollected a painful story which appeared in England about the amputation of a Life Guardsman's shoulder without the use of chloroform; but it was simply the vague floating gossip which was going about at the time, and which had been told in conversation to one of the newspaper correspondents, who, without taking the slightest pains to verify the story, sent it home as a fact. Another similar instance of credulity was to be found in the story of a correspondent who pointed out that the officers in the Medical Department were in the habit of going round the hospitals and serving all the sick men with pills out of the same box. Now, the fact of the matter was that the pill pannier was divided into a large number of partitions; and this innocent newspaper correspondent, because the medical officer took the pills he wanted from the same pannier, jumped at the conclusion that he was giving to every man the same kind of drug. He desired to say a single word in reference to the question which had been introduced in reference to the Guards. As an old Guards' medical officer, he deprecated any interference with their ancient privileges. As long as they were retained as a special Corps, he did not see why they should not have specialities of their own; and he did not think any evidence had been adduced to show that any other system would work better. It would only entail extra expense to the medical officers, without effecting any public saving. The argument of Sir William M'Cormack was that a medical officer should be afforded an opportunity of coming to London, where he would have better facilities for study; but the Guards' medical work was not of an ordinary character, and it occupied a great deal of time. It would not be easy for a medical officer to do his duty thoroughly, and to be in attendance at barracks, if he were required to go away at 12 or 1 o'clock for attendance in the hospitals scattered about over the town. It must also be remembered that in many of the Provincial towns—such as Leeds, Liverpool, and Manchester—where the Guards were stationed, there were excellent medical hospitals and schools. At all events, if this change were to be made—if the fiat had gone forth that the alteration was to be carried out, he hoped it would be distinctly understood that none of the medical officers now serving would be affected by it. He apologized once more for having detained the Committee so long.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the question had been discussed with great ability; and he was sure the speeches that had been delivered had been listened to with great pleasure on both sides of the House. In regard to the speech of his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Guy Dawnay), he thought his hon. Friend had brought to light in the very best taste, and in the very best way, the prominent points that were the subject of investigation by the Committee last year; and although it could not be considered that the medical discussion had sustained any injury in consequence of being postponed, still, at the same time, there might have been some advantage if it could have been raised when the matters were more freshly in the recollection of the House. The charge of inefficiency and want of care, brought at an early period against the medical officers, had now been entirely dropped; and it had become more and more clear that the Medical Department, as far as the professional requirements of the officers themselves were concerned, had come out of the inquiry, so to speak, with flying colours. No doubt, great defects had been brought to light in regard to medical matters in the Egyptian Campaign. No one, after reading the Blue Book, could for a moment doubt that fact; but that which seemed to him to underlay the whole was the fact, as Sir John Adye had said, that military necessities overruled everything else. There was a sudden, and, to a great extent, a secret change of plan. He did not know whether that was the right word; but, at any rate, a sudden change was made in pursuance of which secrecy was necessary, and there were not the same opportunities afforded which would have been afforded had the movement been made openly, and the ordinary arrangements made beforehand. The very basis on which the hospital equipment depended was not only shifted, but the means of transport necessary for the Medical Service were appropriated to other purposes instead of those for which they were originally intended. All that, undoubtedly, occasioned severe pressure, and produced results which no one could pretend to underrate, and which all must deplore. He thought, however, that Sir William M'Cormack, and others who supported him, were justified when they pointed out that the general results of the Egyptian Campaign, from a medical point of view, compared very favourably with those of any campaign on an extensive scale, which had been undertaken in times past. A good deal of these complaints seemed to have arisen from defects in the system of hospital orderlies; and he hoped the noble Marquess, when he rose to reply, would tell the Committee that he had not lost sight of that point, but would inform them what changes and further improvements he had introduced, and intended to introduce, into the hospital system. With regard to the bad bread, Lord Wolseley seemed to have given evidence, which, as the hon. Gentleman opposite (Dr. Farquharson) said, had fallen like a thunder-clap after the previous good Reports of the good working of the medical system; but he (Colonel Stanley) must say that, after those Reports, Lord Wolseley did not appear to have stinted himself in the use of forcible language; but there appeared to be a great deal that was entirely reconcilable between the first account of Lord Wolseley and his evidence before the Committee. What he understood Lord Wolseley to complain of, in the main, as one of the prin-

cial faults was that the initiative was not taken freely enough by the medical officers. He was bound to say, although he spoke with great respect as far as the financial point of view was concerned, that the medical officers would have been fully justified, under the circumstances of the case, in acting on their own account, as Lord Wolseley had said; and, perhaps, when things were not at hand and absolutely at their disposal for the immediate use of their patients, they might have risked a little more in assuming responsibility, and the authorities would not have failed to support them. He did not remember, speaking from memory, a single case in the South African Campaign where any charge was thrown upon a medical officer, where he had incurred it on his own responsibility, meaning to act for the good of the Service. He, therefore, thought a little more boldness would have prevented many of the things which were complained of in the Blue Book. When the mosquito curtains, which were said to have been purchased, were not at hand when they ought to have been, and the men were suffering from the want of them, and their suffering might have been avoided by a little expenditure and a little risk, he was satisfied the authorities and the public would have fully condoned the medical officers if they had taken steps to procure curtains, and the medical officers themselves would have obtained credit, and would not, in the end, have lost in pocket. Perhaps he might be allowed to say one or two words on a somewhat more delicate subject which cropped up in all these questions—namely, how far was it the fault not of the circumstances, but of the system? It seemed to him that a great deal was often laid at the door of the unification system, which was hardly fair towards it. Personally, he was able to speak without bias upon this point. He had been brought up under the system, which all liked very much, and which he believed had been found to work very well, certainly in peace times, and, with certain exceptions, it worked well in a time of war—he referred to the regimental system. With respect to that regimental system, he had come to the same conclusion as his noble Friend and Predecessor Lord Cardwell—that they could not revert to that system as it was. Nor was it entirely due to those who, for theoretical reasons, wanted to make the station hospital the unit rather than the regiment. The fact was that the change had been forced on Lord Cardwell by circumstances not from within, but from without the Department. Day by day the difficulties were found to be greater in obtaining for the benefit of the Medical Service such candidates as, in former times, would have been willing to enter; and although there was not in a great honoured and learned Profession, such as the Medical Profession, anything like Trade Unionism, still there was something like it in the way in which young men from the medical schools were drawn aside from the Army, and told that there was no prospect for them, and that they must not expect to rise as they would be able to do in Civil life. There was a great deal of truth in that. There were in the higher ranks of the Army Medical Service comparatively few advantages; and he believed it was merely on account of that that the medical schools—and he said it, he hoped, without offence—set their faces against candidates going into the Army. It was a very serious state of things. Lord Cardwell, among other things, attempted to deal with it by an increase of pay and position in the higher ranks; and in order to do that he endeavoured to meet the difficulty, first of all, by a diminution in the number of medical officers; and, secondly, by a system which would admit of the more free introduction and use of medical officers. Lord Cranbrook succeeded to that system; but it was not found to work well. The complaints were frequent; competition for entrance into the Department became rare; and there were often more places than competitors for them. One proposal after another was made; and to bring himself to a more recent date he believed the Warrant under which the Medical Service was now constituted was one which was passed at the time he had had the honour to be at the War Office. One of its immediate effects was to bring a number of candidates forward, and there was actually competition for entrance into the Service. They were thus able to have a selection of the best men, where, up to that time, there had been comparatively no selection at all. First of all, it equalized the conditions of the Service, when they could be equalized in no other way; and, secondly, it gave the men entering the Service a better prospect in regard to their future lives. The men did not feel, in comparatively early years, that they had reached a point beyond which they could not go; but that there was a career, and not an ill-paid career, open to officers in the Medical Department, by which they had an opportunity of rising even to the very highest positions. He had never been able, himself, entirely to appreciate—perhaps it was part of the old heaven still remaining—the difficulty which seemed to have been felt, in officers, although they belonged to and were interchangeable in a Department, yet being attached to regiments for a considerable time, doing duty in those regiments, and yet doing joint duty with others in a station hospital. There never appeared to his mind much greater difficulty in that, although he did not say the cases were precisely analogous, than there was in the case of an officer doing regimental duty, and also garrison duty. There was one point on which, perhaps, undue stress had been laid in regard to the abolition of regimental medical officers. There was a tendency to exaggerate the difficulties that would arise to officers in discharging their regimental duties if they were also to perform duties at a station hospital. There was nothing in the Departmental system, as originally explained, to prevent the attachment of a medical officer to the battalion and to every regiment and battery in the Service, and the closer such a system were adhered to the better it would be for all persons concerned. But there were two difficulties; first of all, he would frankly say there was an influential Department of the State in charge of the public purse, which was supposed to take the views of the Secretary of State for War; but there was a still greater difficulty. It did not appear to the War Office in the years 1878, 1879, and 1880 to be desirable, just at the moment they had a good attendance, to re-introduce the system of selecting candidates by competition, when they had a chance, as it were for the moment, of raising the Medical Service of the Army to something beyond the point at which they were obliged to be contented to stop. It did not seem to them to be wise at that moment to provide more places than there were men to fill them, and thus to sweep away the advantage of the very competition which, on the other hand, they thought it desirable to re-introduce as essential for the good of the Service. That had a good deal to do with the question at the moment. There were also other subsidiary questions. A number of gentlemen, who were civil practitioners, had been specially engaged at the time, some of whom had gone out to South Africa, and elsewhere, at considerable inconvenience, and it would not be either right or wise to displace them. There were other points of that nature which required consideration; but what he wished to emphasize was that there was nothing in the Departmental system, as then constituted, which inherently prevented the attachment of a medical officer to each battalion and battery; and the longer, he ventured to say, that could be done, so long as the officer could be left without detriment to the Service, so much the better it would be for all parties concerned. A case occurred to him at that moment. A regiment was sent out on foreign service, the medical officer of which was also going out to the same destination; but he was taken away from the regiment and attached to another battalion, which was going to the same destination as his own proper battalion, but in another ship. Now, that seemed to him to be one of the many needless changes, which he did not mean to say were not justified, because if they had a roster it was necessary to adhere to it, but which showed the advantages of the regimental over the Departmental system. It seemed, to his mind, to be a case where a compromise between the regimental and the Departmental systems might have produced a better effect than was produced at the time. That was the light in which he read the assent to the system which had been given by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Berkshire (Sir Robert Lloyd Lindsay), whose absence at that moment he deeply regretted, and also of General Hawley, whom they all knew to be one of the best regimental officers in the Service. He did not think it followed as a corollary; but he shared the feeling of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson), that this was not exactly the moment in which they could go out of their way to alter the system which prevailed in the Brigade of Guards. He waited with some anxiety to hear what the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War would have to say on that point; but it did appear to him that there were various points connected with the system which it would be wise to leave alone, provided the public generally did not suffer. A good deal had been made of the establishment of a general large hospital in London. It was said that the officers would gain by being interchanged with officers in other regiments now quartered out of London, and that officers out of London would gain by going up to London and being within reach of all the most refined appliances and the latest lessons of medical teaching. He doubted, however, from all he had hitherto heard, whether it would be a kindness to bring officers up to London every two or three years in this manner. It would be asking them to throw away a good deal of money, and to sacrifice many advantages which they at present enjoyed. Moreover, they would be initiating a system, which would certainly not be a very popular one, without enjoying any of those distinct advantages which an alteration of the medical system in other directions had produced. He hoped it was a sine quâ non that it would be understood that the changes in the Warrant would not apply to any of the existing officers without their own consent. As far as he remembered, the question was, to a certain extent, discussed in 1879; and he thought what was then arrived at as a compromise was that no medical officer should reach the higher branches of the Service unless he had been for a certain time actively employed abroad; but upon a medical officer giving up his chance of obtaining a higher post he was to be exempt from the necessity of going abroad and quitting the battalion to which he had been attached. That, at the time it was arrived at, was considered to be a fair compromise; and he believed that it was accepted by the Medical Service as such. He doubted, also, whether it would be found, unless they were prepared to give a higher rate of pay and increased allowances that there would, in point of fact, be any great kindness in bringing officers up to London to live here for two or three years in charge of hospitals, who had no particular connections in London, and who would necessarily have to set up establishments for themselves at no inconsiderable cost. He did not think the proposal would be accepted with such approval as seemed to be anticipated in some quarters. At the present moment, as far as he was aware, they had no large hospital in London which they could use, so that if they brought in a new system, after all they would only create one central staff for the purpose of sub-dividing it. For all these reasons, and without expressing at that moment an absolute and final opinion upon the point, he would ask the noble Marquess to hold his hand in the matter until it was proved that all parties concerned would benefit by the proposed change. It was perfectly certain that one result would be to sacrifice a good deal of the public money; and if it did not produce a better result than that which now existed, there would be a good deal of heartburning in consequence. As he had stated before, he spoke with a bias which he could not pretend had been wholly effaced; but he did think that these were common-sense points, which he hoped the noble Marquess would fully appreciate. He was sorry to have trespassed so long on the time of the Committee; but he had considered it his duty, having had to do with the Administration formerly, to make these remarks on the subject. He had pointed out the general principles within which they could act legitimately in connection with all that had been done before; and he hoped that the noble Marquess and his advisers, having regard to the wants of the Service, would look carefully through all the details, and see whether, by the careful working of them, they could not still bring those general principles, which most people considered to be absolutely necessary, into harmony with the general conditions of the Service.

DR. LYONS said, he did not intend, nor, indeed, did he think it necessary, to enter at any length into the merits or demerits of the Medical Department in the late Egyptian Campaign. It was not necessary he should do so, because public opinion, as was usually the case when time was given it to form a correct estimate, had veered round in the right direction. He believed there was now no doubt in the mind of anyone who had inquired into all the circumstances, and informed themselves properly that the charges which were hastily, unwisely, and unjustly made against the Medical Department for the part they played in the Egyptian Campaign of 1882 had completely fallen to the ground. The House and the country could congratulate themselves upon the success of that campaign. If, in the future, the country found itself engaged in any other expeditions or wars, it would, indeed, be very fortunate if it had as little to complain of as it had in respect to the Egyptian War. No doubt, some of the success which was achieved was due to the singular rapidity with which the campaign was conducted. It must always be borne in mind that scenes of war were necessarily attended with more or less of human suffering; and that it was the object and desire of the Medical Profession, and of the Government who feel it its duty to throw an army into the field, to diminish the sufferings of humanity to the lowest possible point. He ventured to say that that point was almost reached during the campaign they were contemplating. His hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) had entered at some length, and with considerable ability, into many very interesting subjects. It was not necessary he should follow his hon. Friend very closely into the subjects he had so effectively dealt with. One subject—namely, that of the bread supply to the troops in Egypt, had been incidentally touched upon. He was of opinion that it was utterly impossible for the medical officer on the spot to make any better arrangements, and that view of the case was fully borne out by the evidence. The question of the supply of food was always the most difficult one in connection with the movement of great masses of men. The question of the Army medical system had of late occupied a good deal of public attention. The treatment of regiments by their own medical officers, which was so popular for a long time in the country, was never likely to be revived again to its full extent; but those who had seen warlike operations must admit that some other means of dealing with wounded men than those recently adopted must in practice be found. It was always well that the medical officers should be personally known to the men; that they should be acquainted with the characters and constitutional history of the men of the regiment; and he could quite conceive that it would be possible that a medical officer might be attached to a regiment for a period of five years, and that after that time, or even during the five years, a certain portion of his time might be given up to dealing with disease and injury in hospital centres. There was another point on which he wished to say a word; he mentioned it on a former occasion. Nursing was, undoubtedly, one of the most difficult of all the practical questions that had to be dealt with in connection with large masses of men engaged in a campaign. He was of opinion that a solution of the question would be found in a very much enlarged nursing organization. They could not get men to discharge more than the mere routine duty of an hospital attendant. The more careful class of nurses must be looked for in females of good constitution and of superior education, and with a special vocation for nursing. Of course, it would be very difficult to get a good and efficient corps of female nurses; but if it could be formed he was persuaded the very greatest advantage would accrue. He disapproved of any kind of responsibility being attached to the medical officer for the errors and sins, either of omission or commission, of the nurses, no matter how carefully they might have been selected. In any future campaigns in which they might be engaged, he trusted there would be a more intimate relation between the Commander in the field and the Chief of the Medical Staff. The first medical officer ought to be in confidential communication with the Commander; indeed, he should hold some recognized position upon the Staff.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I shall detain the Committee for a very short time with any reference to the remarks which were made by the hon. Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay) upon the Report of Lord Morley's Committee. Sir, I am inclined to agree generally in the reply given to the hon. Gentleman by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farqu-harrison). I do not think that the hon. Member (Mr. Guy Dawnay), notwithstanding all the care and attention which he told us he had bestowed on that inquiry, established any of the allegations which had been made now for more than a year and a-half, and which I am sorry to say the hon. Member has repeated in a general form, as to the breakdown of the medical administration in Egypt. In my opinion, it was sufficiently proved, by the investigation of Lord Morley's Committee, that there was nothing which could be called a breakdown in either the medical or in any of the other arrangements in Egypt. There was a certain amount of inconvenience; there was a certain amount of hardship; there was a certain amount of want of preparation at particular stages of that campaign; but I think it has been conclusively proved by the Report of Lord Morley's Committee, and by the various discussions which have taken place upon it, that such inconveniences and such failures as did take place were owing either to the conditions of the campaign, or to the fact that there was a necessarily sudden military movement, which made it impossible for all the Departments to be as efficiently organized to perform their duties as they would have been had the campaign been conducted under other circumstances. To a great extent, anything that has been complained of was due to that circumstance. I do not say that everything was due to that circumstance. What took place at Cairo afterwards, so far as there was any reason for complaint, probably could not be attributed to Lord Wolseley's movements; but such complaints as are justified, and are not to be attributed to the causes which I have mentioned, are to be attributed to a failure, which we thoroughly acknowledge, to solve an admittedly most difficult problem likely to befall any military nation—the thorough organization of its Departments of supply to its Army in the field. We quite admit that our organization requires constant care, although we do not think it is altogether faulty. I have myself appointed, as I mentioned some time ago, a Departmental Committee to inquire into some of the conditions of that problem; and the House of Commons has also appointed a Committee, which is now sitting, to inquire into some of the questions which arose in connection with the campaign in Egypt. Under these circumstances, while I fully admit that the Report of Lord Morley's Committee will be productive of a great deal of good, and while I admit that good lessons may be learnt from a careful study of that Report, and of the evidence on which it is founded, I doubt whether there is anything gained by the introduction in this House of charges more or less vague, more or less unsubstantiated, and which I must say the hon. Gentleman the Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay) did not support by his references to the Report of the Committee. The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that he did not make what is called a Blue Book speech, and that it would have been easy for him to do so. No doubt it would; but I must point out that although the hon. Member made a much more interesting and a much more effective speech by refraining from any lengthy reference to the Blue Book, he, at the same time, made it difficult to meet the somewhat vague allegations which he has repeatedly brought forward unless by reference to Blue Books. The greater part of the hon. Member's observations were directed to what is called the unification system, and to the modification of that system, which was proposed by the minority of Lord Morley's Committee. Now, Sir, the hon. Member supported his proposal for a modification of the present system by a reference to the military evidence which has been given before Lord Morley's Committee. But the hon. Member did not allege, and he could not allege, that the change which he advocated was supported by any of the medical witnesses who were examined before the Committee; and, in fact, he told the Committee that the medical witnesses appear to have been asked very few questions on the subject. Surely this is a matter on which a decision must be arrived at after hearing the medical as well as the military evidence. In my opinion, the military evidence, to which the hon. Gentleman has pointed, is not of that strong and conclusive character he would lead us to believe. He alluded, for instance, to the evidence of Colonel Nicholls. I have referred to that evidence, and no doubt Colonel Nicholls did relate an anecdote of a single case of hardship which might have occurred under any system. The rest of his evidence with regard to what is complained of is of a most inconclusive character. What does he say in answer to the second question put to him?—

“Could you inform the Committee whether you have experienced, either here or at other stations at which you have been quartered at home, any difficulty or inconvenience in regard to obtaining medical attendance on your men, or on the officers of your battalion?—The married people always say that they have got great difficulty in finding the doctor.”

In further examination, he said, in answer to the question—

“And there is no difficulty put in the way of regimental officers visiting him?—Not the least. The doctors are exactly the same as they were before in that respect; but it gives more trouble to find a man. And certainly the women of the regiment do not think that the present system is anything to compare with the old one; they look at the doctor now as their enemy, not as their friend. In old times he was quite their friend.”

Surely the medical administration of the Army is not to be decided by the women; and yet that is the main part of the evidence. The arguments for and against the present system are, as had been said, so fully stated in the Report of Lord Morley's Committee, and in the dissent of two Members from that Report, that I am afraid that anything I can say on the matter will not add very much to what may be gathered from a perusal of that Report. The majority of the Committee acknowledge that there is a reasonable complaint of there being too frequent changes in the medical officers in charge of the troops; and they think it will be possible to make arrangements by which these too frequent changes which have been complained of shall be, to a great extent, remedied. One of the great difficulties experienced is that it has not been found possible for the brigade surgeon, in charge of a considerable body of troops, to be accommodated with quarters in the camp, and he has been obliged to live in lodgings; but the War Office Committee have endeavoured to make arrangements for quarters in camp to be provided for the medical officers, so that they may be accessible at all times. There is considerable difficulty in this matter, because brigade surgeons are generally married men, and there is not sufficient accommodation for them in the married quarters; but we are doing what we can in the matter. Now, with regard to the proposition that, in all cases, medical officers should be attached to battalions, in the first place, the difficulty is one of a financial character. A few years ago, as has been stated, the position of the Army Medical Service was very deplorable. Candidates up to the standard could not be found for appointments in the Army Medical Department, and we were obliged to take them without competition; and, in consequence, the standard was not what it would have been under other circumstances. Great advantages were offered to, and great improvements have been made in the position of, medical officers, in regard to pay, prospects, and pensions. Those improvements could not be made without involving the expenditure of a considerable sum of money. The assent of the Treasury and of Parliament to those improvements in the position of the medical officers was distinctly obtained on the understanding that such economies as were consistent with the efficiency of the Service should be made; and one of the economies which, in the opinion of the principal medical authorities of the Army, could be made, not only without detriment to, but with actual improvement in, the efficiency of the Medical Service, was the substitution of a system of station hospitals for the system of regimental medical officers. It will, therefore, be a matter which will require very much consideration whether we should now go back to what would certainly be a more expensive system without having much stronger ground for it than has yet been brought forward. A Committee inquired into this and many other matters during the latter part of the administration of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley). That Committee reported that the attachment of medical officers to battalions would, under one contingency—that is to say, maintaining the principle of continuity of control in regard to the smaller hospitals—make it necessary to appoint 41 additional medical officers at an expense of over £22,000; or, if that principle were not insisted upon, then the increase of medical officers might be reduced to 21, at an expense of between £14,000 and £15,000 a-year. At the stations where single battalions are quartered, there would be practically no change. The hospital is now practically a regimental hospital, and the officer in charge is practically attached to the regiment. Neither would there be any change in the smaller hospitals. The change that would take place would be at the camps and at the larger stations, where, in my opinion, the change which was proposed would lead to a very great waste of power, and also to considerable friction. Then it is said that the officers attached to battalions might, in addition to their duties with the troops, also discharge duties in the station hospitals. No doubt that might be done; but that would almost certainly cause a considerable want of efficiency. The medical officers would be under the command of two different commanding officers; and that is a system which has never worked well under any circumstances. They would be under the command of one commanding officer in regard to their duties in the regiment, and under the principal medical officer in regard to their duties in respect to the hospitals; and, after all, unless at the expense of a great loss of efficiency, these officers, who are employed in the hospitals, would have nothing to do with the battalions to which they were attached. In order to secure the most efficient working and control over hospitals, particular officers must be told off to particular wards, and particular wards are devoted to particular diseases and ailments. Therefore, it would be a mere matter of chance whether a medical officer attached to a battalion, when performing duties in the hospital, would have anything to do with the men in his own regiment. Therefore, all the information which the medical officers could possess of the regiment and the men would be thrown away for those occasions when it would be of value. The argument as to their knowledge of the character and constitution of the men has, therefore, lost a great deal of force under the present circumstances. It may have had some force when a doctor had a chance of becoming acquainted with the men; but now, when men serve so short a time, and the change from home battalions to foreign battalions is so frequent, and the men pass from the care of one officer to another so rapidly, there is very little in that argument. Then it is said that the medical officers attached to battalions for a particular time would have an opportunity of acquiring habits of discipline in which they are now deficient. As to that argument, I have only to say that if a medical officer is to obtain the habits of discipline, it is necessary that he should do that at a very early period of his military career. If he is to acquire habits of discipline, that must be done when he enters the Service. If not, it is not likely that when he comes to be quartered with a battalion, he will be able to acquire any habits of discipline which he did not previously possess. But if a medical officer is to be attached to a battalion at the commencement of his military career, then the consequence will be that the officers and non-commissioned officers, and the men and their wives and families, will be condemned to receive permanently the medical attendance of the most inexperienced members of the Medical Profession. That would be a change which I do not think would be at all satisfactory; and, further, it would be a change which would be extremely injurious to the efficiency of the medical officers themselves. Instead of taking a position where they would gradually learn their profession, and have the fullest opportunity of obtaining that knowledge which is necessary, they would be placed, at the very outset of their career, in a position where they would have little practice, and comparatively little opportunity of improving their minds and increasing their knowledge. I believe that that is a change which would be altogether uncongenial to, and strongly deprecated by, the members of the Army Medical Department. During the last two and a-half years there had been 85 appointments made in the Army Medical Service, and for those there were 259 candidates; and it is easy to suppose that, under such circumstances, the quality of the Medical Service has gradually improved. Under these circumstances, I think it would be unwise to introduce changes which are altogether opposed to the feelings of the Medical Profession, and which have been rejected by a very large majority of very competent men examined before Lord Morley's Committee, who strongly recommended that the present system should be retained, with such modifications as might be thought desirable. For these reasons I cannot hold out any hope that we are likely to adopt a modified regimental system. There has been one other question raised, and that is as to establishing a properly organized general hospital in London. I believe the medical officers would be the last to deny, and I believe there is no doubt, that great advantage might be expected to accrue to the Medical Service and to the Army generally, and that arrangements more satisfactory to the Guards themselves would result, from the establishment of a properly organized general hospital in London. That would give the whole Army Medical Profession great opportunities of improving themselves, to which Army medical officers would look forward with considerable hope. But, as has been stated by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley), such a proposal would probably be a costly one, and that it is a proposal which cannot be entertained until the question of regimental medical officers has been disposed of. That is a question which has not yet been settled, and which may not be settled for some considerable time to come. Until it has been disposed of, we cannot entertain the idea of establishing a general hospital in London; and until that is done we do not think there would be any sufficient advantage in disturbing the present medical arrangements. I do not in the least wish to commit myself, or my Successors in the War Office, on this point, neither do I wish to preclude them from any course they may in future deem desirable. On this subject Lord Morley's Committee were unanimous. [Lord EUSTACE CECIL: Not unanimous.] The noble Lord is mistaken. Major General Hawley sent in a Paper, in which he objected to the decision of the majority that the present unification system should be maintained without modification; but that objection did not extend to the paragraph in the Committee's Report, which proposed that the medical system of the Guards should be amalgamated with that of the Army. It is not worth while arguing that point over now; and all I will say is that I do not wish to preclude either myself or my Successors from adopting, when circumstances make it desirable, what I believe to be the unanimous recommendation of the Committee. We do not, however, think that that recommendation could be carried into effect without full knowledge, and until it could be accompanied by a proposal for the formation of a general hospital in London; and therefore, until that scheme can be entertained, it would not be worth while to make any considerable change in the medical system of the Guards, which at present does, undoubtedly, give great satisfaction to the Army.

COLONEL MILNE-HOME said, he was sure it would give great pleasure to the medical officers of both the Guards and the Household Cavalry to hear that at present there would be no change made in the admirable system which had now existed for so many years; and he did not think he should have risen had he not thought it right, considering the part he had taken in the Egyptian Campaign, to pay his tribute of thanks to his noble Friend for what he had been good enough to say with reference to the regimental medical officers at the front. He was sure that, although no honours had been given them, amongst the many honours that had been flying about after the campaign, they would feel amply repaid by the remarks which the noble Marquess had made with reference to their services. In respect to those officers, he thought he ought to notice an error which had crept into the Report now before the Committee. In paragraph 120 it was stated that the Life Guards embarked on the Calabria without any supply of drugs, plaisters, or other medical paraphernalia; but, on inquiry, it was found that that was not the case. But the statement would have been quite true if it had been made with regard to the Holland, which took out the troops he had the honour to command. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were present, he would support him when he stated that the Holland sailed without the necessary medical paraphernalia, although, just as she left the Docks, an order having been got from the Secretary of State for War, a case of medicines was put on board. She also sailed without any Army Hospital men whatever; and it was only because she touched at Cowes that those men were able to go on board. The statement was, therefore, true as to the Holland, though not as to the Calabria. But when the case was opened at sea the medicines were found to be utterly useless, because they did not include anything that was applicable for ordinary medical work. He should also like to say, with reference to the regimental officer who accompanied these troops on board the Holland, that he applied, before they started, to the Army Medical Department to know whether he was to make any request for medical stores for the campaign. He was told that he would find everything when he got to Alexandria; but when he arrived there he found nothing. It was the same at Ismailia; and the result was that the expedition, which started at cock-crow about the 28th of August from Ismailia, started with nothing but one field-companion, although the officer had been told that he would find everything he wanted there and at Alexandria before he started with the expedition. Some severe things had been said in the evidence before Lord Morley's Committee with reference to the senior medical officer of the regiment to which he himself belonged—namely, Surgeon Major Hughes Pryse at Messana. The reason for what had been stated was that that officer declined to abide by the rules of red tape which governed the Surgeon General in command at Ismailia, and improvised a hospital at Messana, which had done exceedingly good work, as would be seen by reference to the evidence of General Sir Drury Lowe. He thought it only fair that some tribute should be paid to that officer for the excellent work he did at Messana. He effected cures, and gave relief to unfortunate sufferers, who would not have been attended to at all if he had acted according to the red-tapeism of the Department. With all due respect and deference to the noble Marquess, he felt that the noble Marquess had, perhaps, done all he could to acquiesce in the opinions expressed by his hon. Friend below him (Mr. Guy Dawnay) and by Lord Morley's Committee. He began by stating that there had been no breakdown in the Medical Department in Egypt at all, although he had acknowledged that at Cairo there had been some inconvenience and failure, which, however, were amply accounted for. Then he went on to detract from the military evidence which had been adduced by his hon. Friend below him; but he would remind the Committee what that evidence was. The noble Marquess had only quoted the evidence of a certain colonel of Infantry; but his hon. Friend had adduced the evidence of the Duke of Cambridge and of the Commander-in-Chief in Egypt, Lord Wolseley. The Duke of Cambridge's evidence was rather in favour of the regimental system; but he would not quote it, because his hon. Friend had done so, although the noble Marquess had scolded his hon. Friend for not bringing more evidence forward. But the Duke of Cambridge's evidence was entirely in favour of his hon. Friend's contention; and as to Lord Wolseley's evidence, he should like to read to the Committee two answers which he gave to Lord Morley's Committee, inasmuch as the noble Marquess might like to hear them again. His Lordship said—

"My orders were, if you cannot get good bread go out in the town and buy it. That is my complaint from the first day to the last day. The great complaint against the doctors was that they did not do everything that they could have done. I said to them, if you do not get anything that you can possibly want for your men go out into the town and buy it, no matter what you pay for it. I will pay you back; but they would not do it; they always went back to the Commissary, and that is what I complain about."

The hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) had said that if the officers had paid for these comforts they would not get their money back; yet here was Lord Wolseley saying that he would pay them back. Then, in the following page, Lord Wolseley said:—

"I then said to the doctor, 'Is it possible that up to this moment, although we have been five weeks in Cairo, not a man in your hospital has ever had a pudding or anything baked for him, or anything made for him, except what you can boil in a soldier's kettle?' And he said—'Yes; we have had nothing more.' I said—'It is very hard upon the men, considering that you have been here five weeks, and you might have bought any quantity of stores. If you had asked me for £1,000 for them, I would have authorized you to buy them; and yet you tell me now, at the end of five weeks, that you are still cooking for the hospital in those large trenches. In an hospital where there is an immense number of sick, and through which an immense number of sick are passing, you are now cooking for your sick patients in exactly the same way as soldiers out in a campaign would cook.'"

That was the evidence that the noble Marquess thought nothing of. The hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire had alluded to the complaints that had been made by some of the regiments; and had said that amongst the Highlanders there were no complaints. Since the hon. Member made that statement he had not been able to examine the Blue Book on that point; but possibly the Highlanders might have been better attended to on a particular day than the Life Guards or the Blues. His hon. Friend below him (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had remarked that some soldiers were rather backward in making complaints, thinking it might do them harm afterwards; and, as a matter of fact, soldiers and officers in general could not be got to state their grievances unless forced to do so. He knew well, from experience in his own regiment, that it was only when great pressure had been brought to bear upon them, that they could be induced to state their experiences at Ismailia and elsewhere; but, it having been pointed out to them that it was not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of the whole Service in future, they were induced to come forward and state exactly what had happened to them at those places. His hon. Friend had likewise alluded to the complaint that there was no carbolic oil in the hospitals. He believed he said it was too bulky to carry; but Surgeon Pelly stated, in his evidence, that he would gladly have done without carbolic oil if he could have obtained some carbolic acid, which would have answered the purpose as well. Then as to the cost of the oil. He was sorry to have to allude to these small items, but his hon. Friend had referred to them; and although carbolic oil was, no doubt, a very bulky article, it was about the most useful that could be at hand in such a climate, and under such circumstances. Surgeon Pelly was asked—

“Are you averse from the carbolic oil being used in the field owing to its great bulk?”

And the reply was—

From that he (Colonel Milne-Home) inferred that it was desirable to have some quantity of it, however bulky it might be. He had made these few observations because it seemed to him that he could not help rising to acknowledge the manner in which his hon. Friend had spoken of these regimental doctors; and to express his surprise, after the evidence which had been taken with reference to the excellent way in which their duties were performed, that they should have received absolutely nothing but general thanks. But he was further surprised that they were not to have a greater continuance of the regimental system in the Service. He agreed that it was necessary that young doctors should be found to learn their profession, and also that there should be depôts from which the men could be supplied to furnish surgeons for the Service. It seemed to him that a compromise might be effected here. It was requisite for the benefit of all regiments, especially a regiment on long service, that doctors should be appointed to them who might become acquainted with the men and their wives and families; but he did not see why they could not have from the depôts or stations assistant surgeons, who might come as apprentices as it were, and be drafted from regiment to regiment and station to station as occasion might require. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had brought in regulations permitting long service, under certain circumstances, in the Household Cavalry and regiments of the Line in future; and, therefore, he thought that surgeons might be attached to regiments as regimental officers, in order that they might become thoroughly acquainted with the married men and their families, and look after them as family doctors. That regimental system in the Household Cavalry had worked very satisfactorily; and he trusted he should never see the day when their sick soldiers would be removed to a general hospital in London, over which their officers could have no control. At present the Household Cavalry had their own regimental hospitals; the officers could visit that hospital, and look after the patients there, and see that they were cared for; but if the sick were sent to a general hospital in London that necessary and desirable supervision could not take place. Again, if they were to make that hospital into a sort of school, where medical officers from the rest of the Service were to be sent, it appeared to him that that would be degrading the position of medical officers in the Army.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he did not intend to take up the time of the Committee, except for the purpose of thanking the noble Marquess for the concessions he had made, and to add that the medical officers of the Guards would be grateful for his not abolishing a system which had worked well. With reference to the speech of the hon.

Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay), the noble Marquess had, in his reply, apparently forgotten that the hon. Gentleman had quoted Lord Wolseley in support of his allegation. He begged to remind the noble Marquess that Lord Wolseley said that one of the greatest evils with which they had to contend under the Departmental system was the system of malingering; that it could not exist under the regimental system, because every medical officer under that system knew his own men, and could, therefore, baffle any attempt at deception.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £524,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay and Allowances of a Force of Militia, not exceeding 136,808, including 30,000 Militia Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, in former years he had had occasion to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to a vital point connected with the annual training of the Militia, which his experience, and the experience of the officers of the Militia, had shown to be absolutely unsatisfactory and useless. He referred to the money which was devoted to the annual training of the Militia in musketry. He had received repeated assurances from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War and his Predecessors in Office that this point would be attended to. On his moving the reduction of this Vote on a former occasion by the sum of £20,000, which represented the money spent in the annual training of the Militia, the noble Marquess acknowledged that the question raised was one deserving of attention, and had pressed him not to divide the Committee on the Motion, giving him the assurance that before that time next year he would ascertain the opinion of the military authorities with regard to the question. He admitted that that was a sufficiently vague assurance; but he would like to hear from the noble Marquess whether the subject had met with that attention which it seemed to him to require from the Department? Nothing could be more vital to the efficiency of the soldier than that he should be able to shoot, except, perhaps, that he should be able to march; but the fact was that the present period of Militia training did not admit of anything like effective musketry instruction being given to the Militia. On former occasions suggestions had been made for the consideration of the Secretary of State for War, and three alternative courses were proposed. The first was, that the musketry training of disembodied Militia should be discontinued altogether; that the authorities should be content that the Militiaman should be taught to march and handle his arms, and not attempt to shoot. That, at least, would have the advantage of saving to the country £20,000 a-year, which, it was his impression, was absolutely wasted at the present time. The second course was that alternate trainings should be devoted to field exercise and to musketry instruction; and the third was that the Militia regiments should be had up in companies during the training period, and instructed in musketry at headquarters. He was sure that the noble Marquess would not expect him to enter into details, which he had already frequently stated in that House, as to the inconsistency and unsatisfactory nature of the present system of training. Anyone acquainted with musketry instruction would know that it was, above all others, that kind of instruction which had to be carried on deliberately, and with the greatest possible nicety, and with careful consideration of wind and weather. All that was absolutely impossible in the limited period of 27 days, which was all that was allowed to the Militia. But the noble Marquess had assured him that, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee appointed to consider the question of musketry instruction in the Service, more ammunition would be given to the Militia. What did that mean? It meant that their task was to be made more difficult; that whereas it was difficult for each man to fire away 40 rounds, which was the old allowance, in a very short time, it was now proposed to improve the instruction given by making him fire away 60 rounds in the same time. Why, that arrangement only complicated and aggravated the difficulty; and he was so convinced that the present system of musketry instruction in the Militia was loss of time, loss of money, and loss of energy, that he now proposed the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £20,000, the cost of ammunition expended annually by the Militia.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £504,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay and Allowances of a Force of Militia, not exceeding 136,806, including 30,000 Militia Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."—(Sir Herbert Maxwell.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the subject brought before the Committee last year by the hon. and gallant Member had been considered by the military authorities, whose duty it was to superintend the training of the Militia, and the Regulations for musketry instruction to that Force had been totally revised, and a new General Order had been issued. That Order was dated the 17th of April, 1884, and he was not sure whether it was generally known as yet; at any rate, he thought it could not have been known to the hon. and gallant Member, because he made no reference to it in his observations. The main feature of the Order was that no firing was required of the Militia beyond 300 yards, and this it was thought would so simplify matters as to enable every regiment to undergo instruction either by battalions or half-battalions. Hitherto the Regulations had been based upon practice at 600 yards, which, as had been explained by the hon. and gallant Member, greatly complicated the course of instruction, and which it was impossible for the regiment to undergo thoroughly in a short space of time. The Committee would perceive that by the revised Regulations a great deal of unnecessary complication had been done away with. Although it was impossible for him to say how far those revised Regulations would be successful for the object in view, he believed the Committee would see that he had not neglected the promise given to the hon. and gallant Member last year; that he had called the attention of the military authorities to this question, and that they had endeavoured so to simplify and reduce the theoretical requirements of the old Militia Regulations as to enable a course of musketry instruction to be gone through much more satisfactorily within a limited time. Without expressing any opinion as to how far the changes would meet the object in view, he might say that, at all events, they went in the direction of the hon. and gallant Member's wishes.

EARL PERCY said, he was afraid that the answer of the noble Marquess would not be entirely satisfactory to his hon. and gallant Friend, because the new Rules did not make any considerable change in the system hitherto obtaining. The main difficulty was the reduction of the distance at which the Militia might shoot. The practice of striking off half-battalions in alternate years had long been in operation; and the new Rule, which laid down that two companies were to be struck off at the beginning of the training, would have the effect of reducing the other drill of the regiment almost to a dead-lock, because they would have men who had become, so to speak, rusty by a year's absence, drilling with men in the middle of their training—they would have men of all degrees of efficiency mixed up together. It had always been the practice not to strike off companies until they had had a certain amount of drill, and that he thought was better than the system now proposed. A good deal of unnecessary expenditure had been caused by the system of drilling recruits on enlistment. It was evident that, where there were few recruits at the dépôt, the expenses attendant upon musketry instruction were thereby very much increased. He knew of a case where a Militia regiment had three recruits at headquarters, of whom one bought his discharge and another deserted, the result being that the remaining recruit had to be taken by rail a certain number of miles every day for musketry instruction, accompanied by a non-commissioned officer, buglers, and men, thereby causing a large and unnecessary expense to the country without any commensurate benefit resulting. He hoped the noble Marquess would not lose sight of the subject; and if his hon. and gallant Friend decided to take a Division on his Motion for the reduction of the Vote, he should feel it his duty to vote with him.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he was not disposed to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division. He was aware that it was not possible to enter into all the details of the Regulations in Committee; but he trusted the noble Marquess would not forget that the assurances given to the Committee were far from meeting the case he had endeavoured to lay before him. He had been 20 years in the Militia, and never during that time, as far as he was aware, had any regiment been required to fire at a greater distance than 300 yards. The permanent Staff were required to fire at 600 yards; but not so the Militia. The new Rule, therefore, meant nothing at all, and the other details which the noble Marquess had mentioned were simply matters of regimental arrangement. However, he presumed he must be satisfied with having entered his protest against what seemed to him to be a lavish expenditure of public money, not only without adequate result, but with no result at all. He would ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHESTER-MASTER desired to make one or two remarks with reference to the withdrawal of the enlistment money, which the Committee would remember was taken away on the 1st of September last year. This was done, as hon. Members would probably be aware, because so many Militia recruits did not turn up at the time of their training at the depôts or places where the regiment was called out. Formerly, the amount given on enlistment was 20s., which amount was some years ago reduced to 10s., and then taken away altogether. He wished to point out the difficulty resulting from that arrangement in agricultural and mining districts. Speaking from his own experience in an agricultural district of Gloucestershire, extending over 20 years, he believed he should be right in saying that recruiting sergeants personally knew the addresses to within 5 per cent of the recruits whom they enlisted in rural districts. Before the last reduction, he believed the absentees from his own regiment had never been more than 5 per cent. The orderly clerk of the regiment was instructed to make out a return of the recruits who came forward for enlistment, and the answers they gave between September 1, 1883, and March 1, 1884. Until then the North Gloucestershire as well as the South Gloucestershire regiment had never been below its strength, except by a small number; but this year they had recruited only 53 men. On the 1st of September they required 198 recruits, and on the 1st of March they had only obtained 53, of whom 17 elected to drill at the dépôt near Bristol, and 13 elected to go out with the recruits. The answers of 81 men were all to this effect—"We feel the benefit of 10s. in our hands," which in Gloucestershire was called "a dab in the fist;" and it meant that 10s. were worth more in the winter, when no work was to be got, than 20s. given at the end of the training. Their answer was, in fact—"No; we will not enlist, because we do not get anything on enlistment." The number of recruits in his regiment in former years had never fallen short of their number; but he had received a letter a few days ago to say that the regiment was more than 100 below its strength. He thought the noble Marquess should find some means of remedying this state of things. There was one other point to which he would like to draw the attention of the Committee, and it was this. The strength of the Militia was always taken from the day on which the inspecting officer inspected the regiment, and that was at the end of the training. He hoped he would not be accused of egotism if he again alluded to the Militia in his own locality. At the preliminary drill, or just before the preliminary drill commenced, in 1882 and 1883 the strength of the Gloucestershire regiment was, in 1882, 792 men, only eight below their strength; and in 1883 it was 799, being only one below its proper number; and yet, when the inspecting officer came at the end of the training, and sent in his return, their strength was, in 1882, only 680 men, and in 1883, 686 men. There were two or three reasons for this. In the first place, absentees from the regiment were not allowed to have their places filled up for three months; another reason was that men, temporarily discharged, were returned on the strength of the regiment, but were not allowed to be counted as present at the inspection at the end of the training. Another reason was that all men who enlisted into the Regular Army could not have their places filled up before the inspection. Of course, he need hardly point out to the Committee that it was a feather in the cap of the Militia regiment who sent the greatest number of men from its ranks into the regiments of the Line. He was one of those who did his utmost to get men of his regiment to join the Regular Army; and he thought that, however much it might tell against the strength and the esprit de corps of the Militia, it was the duty of the colonels and officers of the Militia regiments to draft as many men as they could from their ranks to the Regular Forces. What, however, he should like to suggest, if the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War could possibly see his way to it, was this—that the Militia regiments should be allowed, at any time, to go on recruiting up to 10 per cent over their proper strength. As was well known, there were always some absentees; there were always a certain number of deserters; and there were always a certain number every year who enlisted into the Line; but when Militia regiments had recruited up to their full strength they were obliged to stop. He thought they ought to be allowed to recruit to the extent of 5 or 10 per cent over their strength. In that there would be no extra expense to the country; but Militia regiments would then have at the end of the training a far larger complement of men than they had at the present time. He had only spoken of the years 1882 and 1883, when the Gloucestershire regiment was in the one year 120 below its strength, and in the other year 117 below its strength, simply and solely for the reasons he had stated. In those years, until they had got a certain number of men struck off their rolls, they were unable to continue their recruiting. He had made these few observations in the hope that the noble Marquess might be able to do something to remedy this state of things.

EARL PERCY said, he was very glad the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chester-Master) had called attention to the subject of the withdrawal of the 10s. bounty for enlistment, and he hoped the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War would give the Committee some information as to its effect upon the recruiting. He (Earl Percy) did not think the effect had been at all satisfactory. He held in his hand a Return he moved for some time ago, and which had been laid on the Table of the House, though it had not as yet been printed. That Return gave the number of recruits enlisted between the 1st of October, 1883, which was the date when the Order was issued, and the 1st of March, 1884, and it compared that number with the number enlisted between the 1st of October, 1882, and the 1st of March, 1883. The result shown was that in England and in Scotland the Artillery and the Engineers had fallen off to a large extent. The Infantry in England had slightly decreased, and the Infantry in Scotland had increased. He did not take Ireland, because that country was under peculiar conditions. The decrease in all arms in England had been from 11,022 to 10,940; but in Scotland, on the other hand, there had been an increase from 1,390 to 1,868. That might not be thought altogether to be an unsatisfactory result; but he would like to point out to the noble Marquess that when they came to look at which regiments had decreased, and which had increased, they found the increase was only in the case of a very few regiments, comparatively speaking. He found that 46 regiments in the United Kingdom had increased less, between the 1st of October, 1883, and the 1st of March, 1884, than they did in the preceding corresponding period. [An hon. MEMBER: In the rural districts.] Well, as that had been said, and as his hon. Friend who had just spoken stated that the rural districts were affected in this matter to a different extent to mining districts and populous places, he (Earl Percy) would like to quote his own personal experience. In spite of the fact that in the North of England the times were bad and many men were out of work, his regiment had recruited but few more recruits than they did last year, notwithstanding all the efforts made to obtain recruits. He believed, too, that there were many more absentees from the regiment than there were last year under the old system. He could not pretend to say whether, on the whole, the new system answered better in rural districts than in the more populous districts; but certainly, speaking from his own experience, the new system had worked very unsatisfactorily in populous places. There was another matter to which he wished to draw the attention of the Committee, and it was this. It had been alleged that the effect of the new system might be felt more strongly in regiments that were trained at a distance from their headquarters rather than in regiments which were trained at headquarters. He confessed that he had never been able to follow that argument; and, looking at the facts, he found that of the 46 regiments whose numbers had decreased in the course of the last six months, 29 were trained at their headquarters, and 17 were trained away from headquarters. It really came to this—that of the regiments which had been detrimentally affected by the operation of the new system, considerably more than half were trained at headquarters. He was quite aware there were some advantages to be gained by the system of withholding bounties; but certainly, as far as he could see, the system had failed in its main object, which was to prevent absenteeism, which in some regiments was found to be a great and growing evil. In his own case, so far from preventing absenteeism, he had more absentees this year than last. He was quite sure that the only plan upon which to manage the bounty question was the plan foreshadowed by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken—namely, that of making a difference between one district and another, leaving it to the discretion of the officer commanding a district, whether a bounty should be given and what amount should be given on enlistment, or whether the whole of the bounty should be withheld until the recruit came up for annual training. He was certain they never could make a hard-and-fast rule that would suit all parts of the country. The Return to which he had previously alluded only referred to the period from October last to the 1st of March in the present year; and he knew it had been alleged that a large influx of recruits had been effected just before the preliminary drill, that, in fact, there would be a larger number of recruits in future than there had been in former years. He had not found that to be so in the case of his own regiment; and he trusted the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War would be able to give some reassuring information to the Committee on this subject.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON wished to draw the attention of the Committee and the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War to what appeared to him to be a very unsatisfactory state of the Militia, both with regard to officers and men, at the present time. He would first deal with the case of the officers. He found by the last Return that there were no less than 648 wanting. He found that in 1880 there were only 307 officers wanting to complete the Establishment, so that now the number wanting was more than double what it was in that year. He should be glad if the noble Marquess could suggest a reason for this state of things. He wished to refer the Committee to a Return that was laid before the House a short time ago with regard to the number of appointments to and the number of retirements from the Militia. From that Return he found that in the course of the five years ending March, 1884, no less than 2,471 officers were appointed to the Militia, and that in the same period no less than 2,488 officers had left the Militia. Now, the total number of officers being 2,941, that showed that nearly the whole of the Militia Force were renewed every five years. It was a very curious state of things that the Militia officers should be renewed every five or five and a-half years; and the reason of it, as it appeared to him, was that the Militia was officered, as far as regarded the junior officers, on an entirely false basis. Young men were appointed to the Militia, not for the purpose of serving in the Militia permanently, but merely as a means of entering the Regular Army by the commissions which they obtained. Young men were appointed to the Militia, but remained in it only just as long as was necessary to fit them for the Army, and if they failed to get into the Army they left the Militia. Now-a-days, as a matter of fact, gentlemen merely joined the Militia as a stepping-stone to the Army. Now, that could not be a sound or workable system. He should like the noble Marquess to explain why there had been such variation in the number of commissions given to the Militia for the Army. In 1881 the number was the same as Lord Cardwell fixed it at. Sixty commissions were given to the officers of the Militia for the Army every half-year. Young men joined the Militia with the expectation of obtaining a commission in the Army; they knew there were a number of vacancies, and they took their chance of getting one of them. But in 1881 the commissions for the Army were reduced exactly one-half, and that caused a large number of young men to be disappointed. In March, 1882, the commissions were kept at one-half—namely, 30 every half-year; but in September, 1882, they were raised to 40 every half-year. In September of the following year they were increased to 70 in the half-year; and now this year they understood they were to be increased to 81 every half-year. Great injustice had already been done. Young men entered the Militia with the expectation of gaining an entrance to the Army; but the number of commissions given to them had been reduced, although subsequently they were raised to their original number, and now they were to be increased beyond that number. The uncertainty as to the number of commissions to be given had caused great hardship, and it was very desirable that there should be more regularity in the number of commissions given. Now, with regard to the men, he found by the last Return that no less than 42,745 men left the Militia every year. The total rank and file enrolled was only 99,440; therefore, nearly one-half of the Militia rank and file left last year. That, also, seemed to be a very singular state of things. The recruits last year were nearly 36,000, so that there was a deficiency of 6,000. The Militia would appear to be renewed every two years, so far as the rank and file were concerned. Now, if the Militia was to be really efficient in time of war that was a very alarming state of things. He wished also to point out that no less than 11,330 men deserted or were struck off the rolls of the Militia last year. He hoped the noble Marquess would be able to give some satisfactory explanation of these figures, because they led to the belief that the Militia was not in that satisfactory state that could be wished.

SIR ROBERT CUNLIFFE said, he should like the noble Marquess to give his careful consideration to some points which had recently been put before him. He (Sir Robert Cunliffe) entirely agreed with what fell from the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chester-Master) as to the present condition of recruiting in the Militia. His own experience as a Colonel of 10 or 12 years' standing was that in consequence of the change in respect of bounty, Militia regiments did not recruit men as well as they formerly did. His own regiment was 220 men below its strength. The district was a purely mining and rural one, and the regiment was trained at headquarters; therefore, none of these special reasons assigned for the lack of recruits could be cited in his case. Some years ago his regiment was scarcely below its strength. He entirely agreed with what had been said with regard to the officers of the Militia. He thought those Gentleman who, like himself, had had a large experience in the Militia would agree that the present condition of things was not what they would desire. Anyone who had had charge of a regiment must feel that it was very desirable that there should be more stability in the elements of which officers were composed. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) had stated that a considerable number of young men simply joined the Militia for the sake of passing into the Line. Under present circumstances, it was only natural they should do so; but looking at the importance of the Militia, and to the work which could be got out of the Militia if required, it seemed to him (Sir Robert Cunliffe) that the members of the permanent Staff of the Militia ought to be obtained on a principle which would secure more stability than there was at present. The Committee would agree with him that if the officers of the permanent Staff knew their work and did it, they could obtain wonderful results from a Militia regiment in the course of the annual training. It was impossible to find a more willing or a more easily managed set of men than Militiamen; and if they were properly handled and looked after, grand results could be obtained. Under a system by which the officers of a regiment were constantly being changed it was impossible to get such good results as they might otherwise expect. It appeared to him that these were circumstances which deserved to have the serious consideration of the War Office. He had felt it his duty to bear his testimony to the fact that the defects which had been pointed out existed; and he hoped the noble Marquess would be able to look into the question, and that possibly before another year would make some Regulation which might be of service.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked for a little information with regard to a point which appeared on the surface of the Votes. On page 35 he found that for bounty and expenses of enrolment there was almost a similar sum charged this year as last; last year the sum was £198,000, and this year it was £203,000. On page 37 he found there was a considerable change from the Vote which was submitted last year. The item for "levy money, attestation and medical fees, &c., on enrolment or re-enrolment," was, last year, £39,500. This year that item had sunk to the comparatively small sum of £9,000; whereas the item for "bounty payable on termination of training and on re-enrolment," had gone up from £128,500 to £164,000. Now, he presumed that that alteration in the figures was but a reflection of a very considerable alteration in the policy that had to be pursued with regard to the enlistment of Militiamen. He had waited for some time to hear any remarks which might throw light on that portion of the Vote; and he had no doubt the noble Marquess would have some clear explanation to offer. He assumed that the change had been brought about in order to secure a better attendance at training; and, under that impression, he sought for the figures which would show the payment made for provisions, and he was rather astonished to find that, whereas last year the amount was £299,400, this year it had sunk to £270,000, so that this theory which looked for increased attendance as an explanation for the change was hardly borne out by the charge for provisions.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, that, before the Vote was put, he wished to remind the Committee that, in 1881, certain provisions were made by the Predecessor of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War for the retirement of commanding officers of Militia on account of age, and it was provided that no commanding officer of Militia should serve after the age of 65, except in certain cases, where they might serve up to 67. He found, upon inquiry, that that Rule had never been made applicable to the Channel Islands Militia, over which the War Office, he understood, had no authority at all, that Militia being under the supervision and the control of the Governor. Under the circumstances, there was no means of ascertaining the ages of the officers; and it was suggested to him that, as at least one of the officers was verging upon 70, he (Major General Alexander) should move for a Return of the names and ages of the officers commanding the Channel Islands Militia. That Return the noble Marquess was good enough to give him as an unopposed Return, but it had not yet been presented to the House, and he was, therefore, unable to act upon it upon the present occasion; but should he find, when it was printed, that there were officers in the Channel Islands Militia who were 70 years of age, or were approaching the age of 70, he begged leave to give Notice that next year, either in this Parliament or the next Parliament, he should move the reduction of the Vote by the amount required for the Channel Islands Militia.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that with regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Cirencester (Mr. Chester-Master), it was the fact that Militia regiments were, under the present system, allowed, in certain circumstances, to recruit above their strength. As to the distinction which had been recommended between Militia regiments in agricultural and urban districts, he was afraid it would be undesirable, if not impossible, to make any such distinction. The Inspector General of Recruiting had said in his Report—

"As stated last year, there was strong objection urged against the existence of two different systems of enlisting recruits working side by side, one under which recruits of a brigade or battalion were receiving 10s. on enlistment, the other under which they were receiving no bounty on enlistment."

The distinction between the two systems of giving bounties had been abolished, because it was found to have a prejudicial effect upon the regiments which were at the headquarters at the regimental depôts; and he was afraid that exactly the same unfair result would be caused if distinctions were attempted to be drawn between regiments maintained in agricultural districts and those which were maintained in urban districts. The noble Earl (Earl Percy) had referred to the effect of the change which had been made in the matter of the preliminary drill, and that was also adverted to in the Report of the Inspector General, who said—

“It was naturally to be expected that in the detached battalions, where 10*s.* on enlistment had hitherto been given, and where the recruits had not the facility of drilling at the headquarters on enlistment, there would be a considerable falling off in the winter in consequence of this alteration. This has been the case, but the effect of the change can hardly be estimated fairly until after the coming training. Now that dates for the preliminary drill have been fixed and announced, those who are desirous of doing their preliminary drill and training together will come up at that time.”

The Inspector General was writing on the 28th of February; but now the dates of the preliminary drills had been fixed and announced. Since the beginning of the year the flow of men had been regular; and all that could now be said was that the effect of the change, which, as had been observed, could hardly be estimated as yet, should be very carefully watched, and if it was found necessary to make any further alteration, then they would have to consider what was to be done. Of the 32,049 troops which were raised last year, 19,434 were raised to be drilled on enlistment, and 12,615 were raised by brigades and battalions which were not drilled on enlistment; and he understood that out of every 800 men 600 elected to go through the preliminary drill on enlistment. The system appeared to be popular; and though it might suffer until it was thoroughly known, he did not think there was any reason to anticipate that it would suffer on the whole. So far as absentees were concerned, the new system appeared to be working well, and the percentage of absentees under the new system compared very favourably with the percentage of absentees under the old system. He did not think it was possible to go back, because if a 10*s.* bounty were given to a Militia recruit, no recruit would join the Army without going to the Militia first. The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had referred to the number of commissions in the Line given to Militia officers. That was a complaint of long standing; but he had not heard either the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself, nor any other Member who had addressed the Committee, make any practical suggestion for a change. It appeared to him (the Marquess of Hartington) that there was every reason for satisfaction, for, after all, the Militia was not a profession; and it was almost a matter of surprise to him that so many gentlemen should be found who were willing to devote a portion of their time to military duties of that nature, which must, to a very considerable extent, interfere with their other occupations. The hon. and gallant Gentleman complained of the system of passing from the Militia into the Line; but that he (the Marquess of Hartington) conceived to be a very great inducement to gentlemen to accept commissions in the Militia; and, if any change were made, it would not diminish, but would rather increase, the difficulty of finding officers to join the Militia. The hon. and gallant Gentleman referred to the large number of commissions in the Line recently given to Militia officers; but he (the Marquess of Hartington) endeavoured to explain, when he made his Statement in introducing the Estimates, what were the reasons which had made that necessary. A diminution in the number of commissions granted was made at a time when a considerable reduction in the number of regimental officers had been made, and when it was believed that fewer numbers would be required in future. But owing to causes which were then unforeseen—namely, that a great number of officers had accepted the terms of retirement which were now open to them—the number of vacancies in the Line had been much larger than was anticipated; and as Sandhurst could only supply a certain number of officers, there was no alternative but to accept a larger number of gentlemen who had served in the Militia, and who proved on examination to be qualified for commissions in the Line. Of course, it would be the object of the authorities, as soon as it was possible for them to ascertain what was the normal number of commissions in the Army likely to be required, to endeavour so to adjust the number of cadets at Sandhurst and the number of commissions offered to officers in the Militia as to provide that the number might be as established, and as little fluctuating as possible. With regard to the number of desertions from the Militia last year—no less than 11,330—the largeness of that number was due to the large number of desertions from the Irish regiments, owing to the suspension of the training of the Irish Militia for three years. During that period of suspension there had been no means of knowing how many men had left the Force; and, therefore, against last year were placed the whole of the arrears for three years. Of course, in some cases the men had died, and the number, therefore, of desertions was uncertain; but the whole number of men unaccounted for were put down for last year.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: They are not all real desertions, then?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, they were not; but the number covered all the men who during the last three years should have appeared on the roll, and whose disappearance could not be officially accounted for. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) had referred to some figures in the Estimate. He (the Marquess of Hartington) did not think he was quite able to follow the hon. Gentleman's observations; but the discrepancies which the hon. Gentleman had pointed out appeared to him to be due to the change in the system of enrolment, to which he had already referred, through the abolition of the 10s. bounty on enrolment. If the hon. Gentleman would take the sum of the three columns included under the head E, on page 37, he would see that the total amount for the present year was £203,000, as against £198,000 for last year. The items were differently distributed in consequence of the change, and the sum taken for levy-money and attestation and medical fees on enrolment appeared to be greatly reduced, while the sum paid afterwards appeared as a portion of the increase. He was, however, very glad that the hon. Gentleman had called attention to this matter.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, there was one matter which had been referred to by the noble Earl the Member for North Northumberland (Earl Percy) with respect to the position of those officers who, being adjutants of Militia or Volunteers, had failed to qualify for the Army. He (Colonel Colthurst) hoped that matter would be taken into consideration, for it was of great importance to the officers themselves and to the discipline of the regiments. He did not know whether the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War would be able to say whether any relaxation of the arrangements could be made on behalf of those officers. It would be well if the noble Marquess would look into the examination for the rank of captain. A certain standard was now laid down with a certain number of subjects, and the minimum number of marks required in each subject. An officer might pass in each subject, and might then find that, although he had so passed and qualified in each subject, he yet had not passed the examination, owing to the aggregate of efficiency being greater than the number of marks required in each subject would reach.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, this question did not really arise on the present Vote. The noble Earl was, however, going to call attention to the subject, and there would be an opportunity for making a statement upon it when it came on.

MR. BIGGAR wished to draw attention to a matter which related to the Antrim Militia. Some years ago there was some very loose conduct in that regiment, and a party of officers went into an hotel where another officer was staying and wrecked his room. He (Mr. Biggar) was informed last year, but never heard it until then, that one of the officers who was concerned in that attack—Major Johnson—based his defence before the Adjutant General in Dublin upon very different material to that on which he had based his defence to the War Office. When he was applied to by the War Office on the subject, Major Johnson denied point-blank that he had anything to do with the transaction; but that was not the ground which he (Mr. Biggar) understood him to have put forward before the Adjutant General. He could not, of course, ask the noble Marquess to discuss Major Johnson, because the noble Marquess had as yet only heard his (Mr. Biggar's) ex parte statement, and he (Mr. Biggar) only spoke from hearsay; but he thought that this was a matter in which the noble Marquess might undertake to make inquiry into the merits of the case. He did not think that the Statute of Limitations ought to run in a case of this sort. If Major Johnson had made a a statement of facts to the War Office or to the Adjutant General in Dublin last year relating to transactions which took place some years ago, there was no reason why he should now be let off because of the remoteness of those transactions. Still, under the circumstances, he (Mr. Biggar) could not ask the noble Marquess to do more than to make an inquiry; and if, after inquiry, it was found that there was any ground for the charge, then no doubt the noble Marquess would deal with the whole matter as it deserved. He (Mr. Biggar) had on previous occasions drawn attention to two cases which had occurred in this same regiment, and in both of those cases it was found that there were grounds for investigation. In one of them the colonel of the regiment retired rather than face the charges made; and in the other case, in which he (Mr. Biggar) drew the attention of the noble Marquess to the conduct of the adjutant, that officer was dismissed by the noble Marquess for the conduct complained of. Therefore, up to the present time, he (Mr. Biggar) had succeeded in making good the charge he raised as to the conduct of these officers; and all he asked in the case of Major Johnson was that the noble Marquess should undertake to make inquiries. He thought he was entitled to ask that from the noble Marquess.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was perfectly true that, in consequence of some charge being made by the hon. Member for Cavan on a previous occasion, an inquiry was instituted by the War Office into the conduct of the adjutant of the Antrim Militia respecting some Returns. It was found, he regretted to say, that incorrect Returns had been made by the officer in question, and the result was that that officer was removed from his appointment. As to the case of Major Johnson, he really could not undertake to make any inquiry into it. It was said to have occurred 11 years ago, and he believed that Major Johnson's presence on the occasion was altogether denied. He believed that some time ago there was a good deal of practical joking in the regiment of the kind that had been referred to; but the officer who commanded the regiment then did not command it now, and he had no reason to believe that anything of the sort had taken place for a great number of years. No good purpose whatever would be served by entering upon an inquiry. If inquiry ought to have been made at all, it should have been made at the time.

MR. BIGGAR said, the matter was this. Major Johnson was charged with having made one statement to the Adjutant General in Dublin, and quite a different one to the War Office. That was a much more serious matter than a practical joke occurring 10 or 11 years ago. Possibly, so far as the practical joke alone was concerned, the noble Marquess was not far wrong in saying that the Statute of Limitations ought to be allowed to run; but the other matter was much more serious, and perhaps upon that part of the case the noble Marquess would undertake to make some inquiry?

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £69,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."

COLONEL O'BEIRNE moved that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £8,000—the sum which the Irish taxpayers had to contribute towards the support of the Yeomanry. He did not think it was just that they should be called on to support English Yeomanry, in which they were not concerned in any manner, directly or indirectly. Ireland was not allowed to have Volunteers of her own, and yet was called upon to contribute to the Volunteers of Great Britain; and that was unfair. Another reason why he objected to the Vote was that at the present moment some regiments of the Regular Cavalry of the Line were not fit to go upon active service in a campaign. They were utterly inefficient and useless for any military purpose whatever; and that was not a proper state of things. Before any money was granted for the Reserve Forces, the first necessity was to put the Regular Cavalry of the Line into a really efficient condition, so that at least a certain portion of the regiments could be called on for a campaign. In the early part of the century the Yeomanry, Cavalry, and Volunteers were sent upon a campaign, and took part in the Peninsular War, and they did good service, and were mentioned by the Duke of Wellington in his despatches. If that were the state of things now he would admit that there would be good reason for the Vote; but the Yeomanry regiments that were now in existence certainly were never called upon to go on any foreign service whatever. He believed they were very good horsemen, and very intelligent men; but for military purposes they were of no use, and, therefore, such Votes as this were quite superfluous.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not persist in his intention to move the reduction of the Vote, but would rather join forces with him (Mr. Labouchere) and take a Division against the whole of this outlay of £69,000. When these Army Estimates were voted, every year, these discussions always took place; and instead of any protest being made against the way in which the Estimates went on increasing year by year, military men got up to ask that more money should be spent. He knew they always explained that in some particular item they would be ready to cast off a halfpenny; but they generally finished by wanting a much larger expenditure somewhere else. He knew them of old. He had the greatest respect for the common sense of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War when he was not trammelled by officialism; and he would ask him to tell the Committee of what real use this Yeomanry Force was. They were called out for eight days in the year; but everybody knew that it required much more than eight days in a year to make either a Cavalry soldier or a Cavalry horse. He had asked an hon. Friend of his who sat on the other side of the House of what use was this Yeomanry Force, and what reason could be given for maintaining such an absurdity; and the reply he received was—“Well, you see, if a foreign Army were to come here, the Yeomanry would be useful in this way: they are recruited from the farmers, who know the country, and who know how to ride, and they would be able to show the way to the English General;”—but whether it was to retreat or to advance he did not know. They were asked, then, to spend £69,000 a-year for that. The gentleman whom he questioned on the subject belonged to a Midland county, where it was exceedingly improbable that any foreign Army would come; and he did not think there was much necessity for anybody to show an English General the road he wanted to go. At all events, they need not spend £69,000 a-year for such a purpose as that. In this case, as in many others, it was the poor man who suffered for the rich man's benefit. Each year the Vote grew more and more; the permanent Staff had increased; and of the 35 troops of which the Yeomanry Cavalry Force consisted each troop of 265 men had 18 officers. [An hon. MEMBER: Each regiment.] They might call it a regiment if they liked—they might even call each troop an army; but what he wanted to call attention to was that in a really genuine bond fide regiment where there were 550 men there were only 24 officers, so that a Yeomanry regiment had proportionately more officers than any of the Cavalry regiments of the Line. Were they really to take a serious view of these things, or were they to go on with this wasteful expenditure? Unless some case could be made out in favour of the Yeomanry they ought to do away with it, once for all. How was it managed? They knew there were a certain number of people who liked to swagger about with feathers and a sword by their side, and who came out on the horses which they had been hunting with to have eight days' drill and a Yeomanry ball, or something of that sort. That was the whole story. There was no sort of use in these relics of mediævalism—of a past age—and he wanted some one to tell him what quid pro quo they got for this £69,000 a-year?

Mr. C. T. D. ACLAND, as an officer interested in the Yeomanry Force, was not prepared to say that they were of any more use than the Volunteers; indeed, he would not for a moment say that they were of so much use, because he quite admitted that farmers could not be got to devote so much time to acquiring military drill efficiently as tradesmen, to whom it was a positive recreation to come out and learn their drill. The hon. Member who had just sat down had, however, said that the Yeomanry were of no use at all, because they were never called on for foreign service. It was true they were not so called on; but that was because we were never attacked by any foreign Army. It might just as well be said that the Volunteers were of no use; but not a single Member would agree with such an observation if it were made. If the Volunteers were of any use, he maintained that the Yeomanry in their sphere were of equal use. If an Infantry Volunteer could be made into an efficient Infantry soldier, so a good man and horse could be made useful in the same way and turned into a good Cavalry soldier. He would ask the hon. Member for Northampton to go and witness the Yeomanry Cavalry when they were at drill; and he would point out to him that those who were best qualified to judge as to the ability of the Yeomanry Reserve—the Inspectors General of the Yeomanry Force—had constantly testified to the ability and efficiency of the Yeomanry men. Probably, the hon. Member was not aware of it; but during the past 10 years there had been an efficient school for training auxiliary officers of the Cavalry at Aldershot. Every officer of the regiment had to go through this auxiliary Cavalry school. They did all go through it; and he had no doubt that if the hon. Gentleman would attend the school in order to see the officers of the Yeomanry regiments go through their work, he would be perfectly satisfied as to their efficiency and their knowledge of what they had to do. The officers who belonged to regiments before that school was instituted made use of it. He (Mr. Acland) did not suppose anyone desired to see this Vote increased, and he knew very well there was a prejudice against it in some quarters; but, still, it would be admitted by most people that those in authority were doing their very best to get the Service to which they belonged brought into an efficient state. Many Yeomanry officers were prepared to admit that in bygone days it was anything but efficient, and that the description which had been given by the hon. Member would apply very well to the condition of things which existed 20 or 30 years ago. His description, however, did not apply to the existing state of affairs. The actual cost to the country for the Yeomanry was something like £4 a man; while that of the Infantry Volunteers was something like £2 6s. 8d. Now, in order to get the Yeomanry Force together it was necessary to pay for horses as well as for men. He only wished they could get more training out of the men than they did; but considering the circumstances, and the difficulty they experienced in getting the men to train at all, he was sorry to say he did not see how, without giving a very much larger allowance for horses, the country could get any more service at all out of the Force. He was sorry to see that apparently the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had not been able to grant the Yeomanry what they were promised last year—namely, a small allowance for extra troop drill; because it was exceedingly difficult to get men to bring their horses away from the work of the farms—to bring them sometimes 10 or 20 miles for a day's drill—without some extra compensation. But, be that as it might, he did not know what the argument of the hon. Member for Northampton was founded on; and he trusted the Committee would think twice before it consented to anything in the nature of doing away with a Force which could be made much more efficient than it was, and which he did not believe necessitated an extravagant expenditure of public money.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he had asked a Question on the subject of the Yeomanry that day, and the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had given him an answer which was not likely to be considered very satisfactory by the men of that Force. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Acland) had alluded to the subject to which he was referring. A doubt seemed to be cast upon the fact whether any such promise as that alluded to had been made. Well, he was informed that a Memorial to the effect that additional grants would be made was last year sent to the different regiments; at any rate, there was no doubt in the world that the men had expected an increase. Another Question he had put had been as to the distance which entitled men to a day's pay in marching in. The distance was 20 miles; that was to say, if the men had to march in 20 miles they got an extra day's pay for it. But a new Memorial had been issued on the 4th of April this year, stating that the distance for which the day's pay would be granted would be increased from 20 to 30 miles. When they came to consider that this Force was not in any very great state of training at this period of the year, and that they would have to march 30 miles to their duty, which it would be admitted would give a horse a very hard week's work, or rather a hard nine days' work, as they were out nine days altogether, hon. Members would see that the effect would be to put a stop to a great deal of recruiting. As to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Northampton with regard to the Yeomanry, it was no doubt a fact, and hon. Members would agree with him, that great difficulty was experienced in getting employers of labour to avail themselves of the services of the Reserve men after they left the Colours. Employers had long been against such employment, their argument being that the men might be called away to serve at any time, and that, therefore, they could not be relied upon for any length of time. This, however, was not the case with regard to the Yeomanry. Employers belonging to that Force could be appealed to, and with success, to employ Reserve men, on the ground that being soldiers themselves they should employ soldiers. He was told that in very many instances this argument was used with good effect. The hon. Member for Northampton had given his version of the utility of the Yeomanry in the event of their active services being required; but the hon. Member could hardly be looked upon as an authority on such matters.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : I think it scarcely necessary to reply at any great length to the observations of the hon. Member for Northampton, which I think are made annually either by himself or some other hon. Member. I feel the Committee is very much indebted to the hon. Member for having made his remarks with such brevity. With regard to the Yeomanry, I would only repeat what I stated in moving the Army Estimates—namely, that I think there is no branch of the Service in which greater improvement has been effected than in this Force. A few years ago, no doubt, the Yeomanry were very much open to criticism, for, as the hon. Member for Northampton pointed out, the duty performed by them was little more than a seven or eight days' outing in the county town. Recently, however, owing to the appointment of Inspecting Officers for Auxiliary Cavalry, and active and efficient Cavalry officers as Yeomanry adjutants, and owing further to the appointment of active non-commissioned Cavalry officers as troop sergeant-majors, the efficiency of the Force has been very greatly increased. I quoted to the Committee the other day from the Report of the Inspecting Officers for Auxiliary Cavalry, and I pointed out that he expressed himself as astonished at the efficiency exhibited by these regiments. In his Report, this officer commented upon the very great progress the Yeomanry had made in drill with the very limited opportunities at their disposal. I think there can be little doubt, as my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Acland) says, that if there is a necessity for a Volunteer Infantry Force, there is also a necessity for the Yeomanry Force. As I have said, it is in a state of very fair efficiency at present; and I have no doubt that if, unhappily, any occasion should arise for its being called into active service, and it were embodied for any length of time, that its efficiency would very rapidly increase, and that it would become a most useful and important arm of the Service. I do not think the Committee will be in any way disposed to take the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton; but it was true that there was considerable difficulty in asking the House this year for any considerable increase in this Vote. What we have endeavoured to do has been to increase the efficiency of the Force as far as possible without adding to the expense the country is now put to. It was, undoubtedly, the intention of the War Office, and I had hoped that it would have been in my power, to give the Yeomanry some small payments to assist them in having extra troop drills in the course of the year. As I stated originally, it would have been possible to make these payments without a large increase in the Vote, because it was found that during recent years the sum voted by Parliament had not been entirely spent. An examination of the accounts of last year, however, seemed to show that that would not be the case—that there would be no saving, in consequence of the improvement which had taken place in the officers and non-commissioned officers of the Force. This year, at all events, it would not be possible for us to make the grant; but I am still in hopes that it will be possible to save a small sum from the amount annually granted, from which the allowance might be made. Though it is true that no promise was ever made that the allowance would be granted, no doubt a Circular was issued leading the Force generally to expect that some such allowance would be forthcoming; and I am sure there must have been great disappointment experienced when it was found that nothing was to be given. I can only promise to do all in my power, consistently with the limits of the Vote and the efficiency of the Force, to find some way of making this increased payment.

MR. O. T. D. ACLAND said, the noble Marquess had stated that he would cause further inquiries than those instituted last year to be made with reference to the power of the Yeomanry to carry a more efficient weapon than that with which they were served at present, and also as to whether any arrangement should be made by which non-commissioned officers from the Yeomanry ranks could be admitted to some share in the course of instruction at Aldershot. The non-commissioned officers could be afforded this instruction at a very slight cost; and if they could obtain it he was sure a great many of them would go in for it, if it took place at a time of the year when they were not engaged in getting in the harvest. He had no doubt in the world that such instruction would be of the greatest practical use.

(6.) £568,500, Volunteer Corps.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, the Volunteer Force had to thank the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War for an issue of Martini-Henrys—especially that part of the Force which was represented by the National Rifle Association. He should like to ask, further, if there was not to be a further issue of these rifles? It was most important that the men should have them. Everybody knew what a bad arm was supplied at present, and how extremely necessary it was that it should be taken away and a better one given in its place. He understood that at the present moment the Government had in store upwards of 240,000 Martini-Henrys; and he hoped the noble Marquess was going to order the issue of a certain number of these to the Volunteer regiments. He should like to know whether that was the case; and, if so, he should like also to know whether the issue would be made pro rata to the Force or by regiments? To his mind, the pro rata system would not be so good as the regiment system. It was desirable to have each regiment homogeneously armed, rather than that there should be two kinds of arms in each.

MR. GURDON wished to say just two words on the point alluded to by hon. Gentleman opposite, when, some time ago, he asked a Question as to the reduction in camp allowances to Volunteers. There was no doubt that the Volunteers felt this reduction very much indeed. They had not expected any such arrangement at the War Office. He could speak intimately of the battalions of Norfolk and Suffolk Volunteers, who had for the last seven or eight years been in the habit of having annual encampments. These battalions had almost every year received high praise from the inspecting officer, and they themselves believed that they deserved it. They knew perfectly well that all the praise they had received arose from their spending a short time in camp every year. The battalions were recruited from agricultural districts, and it would be impossible for the men, unless they went through a training of this kind, ever to arrive at a state of efficiency. When he first heard of the new Order he received it with dismay, feeling that it was a real blow aimed at the Volunteers. There were always three courses open in this matter—Either to give up the encampments altogether—and that was the very last thing they would think of doing, because the adoption of such a course would be the death-blow of many of the Volunteer battalions in the East of England; or to call on the officers of the regiments to contribute; or that the whole cost should fall on the commanding officers. To his mind, he thought the second of those courses would have to be adopted. There was no difficulty in obtaining good men in the Service; they got the same excellent class that they had obtained from the first; but there was great difficulty in obtaining the right class of officers. Many, of course, were too busy; some were too idle; and others said they could not bear the expense. Many of the officers were in poor circumstances, and if they were to be asked for £5 or £10 towards the expense of the camp much greater difficulty would be experienced than was felt now in getting them to consent to go into camp. He appealed, therefore, to the noble Marquess whether it was not a fair demand to make to ask that the camp allowance should be allowed to continue? How was it to be expected that men would accept commissions which involved all this trouble and expense? He hoped the noble Marquess would reconsider this question, and ask for a small Supplementary Estimate, or, at any rate, promise that this reduction should not be made next year.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER reminded the noble Marquess that he had asked a question on this subject a few days ago, and the noble Marquess promised to answer any questions that might be brought forward upon the Estimates in Committee. He wished now to appeal to the noble Marquess to use his best efforts on behalf of the Volunteer Force, so that the whole number who had applied to go into camp this year might be allowed to do so. The Volunteer Force had now arrived at what he thought was a very efficient state; and he could speak from 25 years' experience of the Force. He had worked hard and long to bring that Force into a condition of efficiency; and he maintained that the great efficiency at which the Volunteers had now arrived was owing in a large degree to the regimental camps which had been carried out for many years past. There were now, he believed, something like 84,000 applicants to go into camp this year; and the Volunteers were most anxious, through what had taken place in past years, to prove their efficiency in years to come. That desire was owing to these camps. The sum of money proposed this year was only £34,000 for regimental camps for military instruction; but he hoped the noble Marquess would see his way to bringing in a Supplementary Vote, so that the whole of the men who had applied might be enabled to go into camp, for that was of the utmost importance to the efficiency of the Volunteer Force; and he thought they ought to receive a little more encouragement from Her Majesty's Government than they had received during the past 20 years. The commanding officers had worked hard to effect the present state of efficiency; but for many years during the early existence of the Force they had received no encouragement whatever from the Government. They had used their best efforts to produce efficiency; and these regimental camps had had a great deal to do with the present efficiency of the Force. There could be no doubt that discipline had been greatly promoted by these camps; and if only a small further sum of money was granted all the requirements of the Force might be attained; and he could not too strongly urge the noble Marquess to enable all the men who desired to go into camp this year to do so. But there was another consideration he wished to urge, and that was that, if not this year, in future years there should be a larger capitation grant. All through the past years the officers had put their hands into their pockets to bring up the efficiency of the Force; but he thought the Government ought now to do what was necessary to maintain the existing state of efficiency.

MR. BRAND, in reply to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. A. F. Egerton) with regard to the issue of Martini-Henry rifles to the Volunteers, said, the present reserve was 250,000 stand of arms, and it was not thought desirable to reduce that any further until there had been a fresh manufacture of rifles. But, under present circumstances, it was not desirable to manufacture too freely, because there was a question under consideration with regard to providing the Army with a new rifle. That question had not yet been decided upon; but a Departmental Committee had made a Report, he believed, in favour of a new arm, and the matter would come before the Secretary of State for War in the course of a few days for his decision. With reference to the present issue of the Martini-Henry rifle to the Volunteers, 8,000 had been issued to them through the National Rifle Association upon loan from the Government. He had instructed the authorities to make inquiries in the different districts as to the number of rifles it would be necessary to issue to the Volunteers in order to bring them up to the 12 per cent point. With regard to the Wimbledon competitions, he understood that the National Rifle Association had decided that in future the competitions should not be carried on with the Snider rifle; and, therefore, it was desirable that the Volunteers should be able to compete with the superior rifle. As soon as the Returns were received from the different districts, the War Office would be prepared to issue the number of rifles required to make up the 12 per cent; the Volunteers, of course, retaining their Sniders until there had been a full issue of the Martini-Henry. The Secretary of State for War would answer the question as to an increased capitation grant.

MR. A. F. EGERTON asked if he was to understand that the question of making a further issue of a new rifle to the Volunteers would be considered as soon as the question had been decided between the Committee and the War Office?

MR. BRAND: Yes; it will be considered then.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM said, he did not propose to detain the Committee any length of time; but with regard to the question of issuing the Martini-Henry, he wished to point out that it was now three years since Lord Morley, in distributing the prizes to a battalion of Volunteers in the county which he represented (West Kent), stated that the Martini-Henry would be issued to the Volunteers at an early date; but that had not yet been done. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brand) had now stated that a new rifle was to be distributed to the Army.

MR. BRAND said, he had only stated that the question of a new rifle was now before the War Office, a Committee having reported upon it.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM said, that, in that case, his only suggestion was that this new rifle should be issued to the Volunteers as well as the Army as soon as possible. With regard to the proposal to reduce the camp allowance, he was sure that would be received with universal regret by everybody who was interested in the Volunteer Force. It was not necessary now to point out the advantages which the Volunteers who went into camp received from the camp instruction; but it was perfectly clear that in districts where the companies of battalions were scattered, and were at considerable distances apart, these camps were the only opportunity they had of meeting and joining in battalion drill two or three times a-day for five or six days. In that way they learned their work in camping with others; and everyone who understood the subject must admit that the lessons they thus received were of the utmost importance to them. He had recently had a conversation with a gentleman who for some years had been in command of one of the districts; and that officer had expressed the opinion that the great increase in efficiency which had recently been noticed in the Force was entirely owing to these camps of instruction. Speaking of one particular battalion, he said that before they went into camp they were practically useless; but after their first year in camp, such was their efficiency that he found he could do anything he pleased with them. He himself had had the honour of going into camp with Volunteers for something like 14 years; and he could answer for it that the advantages they had derived had been enormous; and when it was considered how small an increase in the Estimate was wanted to enable the 20 per cent extra to go into camp, he felt sure that the Government, when they thought the matter over, would agree that the expense ought to be borne by them, and not by the battalions themselves. If that was not done, either the officers of the battalions must bear the expense of taking the extra 20 per cent into camp; or if, as was often the case, the officers were not men who could bear that expense, they would be reduced to the invidious and unpopular position of having to select the 20 per cent who were not to go into camp. He thought that was a very serious matter, for this proposition meant either that 20 per cent would not be taken into camp at all, or the expenses would have to be borne by the funds of the battalions which were already so heavily burdened. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would see their way to a small extra grant which would enable the further 20 per cent to go into camp.

MR. BULWER said, he had been a Volunteer for 25 years, and he wished to say a few words on this subject. When his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Henry Fletcher) asked a Question upon this matter a few nights ago, he understood the answer to be that the original intention of the Government was that each corps should be assisted to camp out once in three years. He had looked at the Volunteer Regulations to refresh his memory, for when that answer was given he could not remember that there was anything like an expressed intention in those Regulations to assist each corps to camp out only once in three years. He could not find that there was any such intention expressed in the Regulations; but, on the contrary, this camp allowance was held out as an inducement to Volunteers to go into camp and make themselves efficient. What had been the result? The Government having held out that inducement, year after year increasing numbers of men had gone into camp; and now, after the system had produced most satisfactory results, they were told that 20 per cent of those who had applied to go could not have the allowance. What would be the consequence of that? Either 20 per cent of the men would not be allowed the opportunity of making themselves efficient, and so lose the capitation grant, and the Force would be weakened to that extent; or they could only remain efficient by the officers bearing the expense. He thought it was a crying shame that the Government should, for the sake of a paltry economy of this kind, impose upon the officers the expense of keeping up the efficiency of the Force. Everyone knew what our Army was. Gallant fellows they all were; but if it were not for the Militia and the Volunteers, we should not be able to resist invasion. Everybody knew that, though everybody did not like to admit it. As to the effects of these camps, he wished to supplement what had been said by the opinion of a higher authority than any of the hon. Gentlemen who had already spoken, and that was Lord Napier of Magdala. He (Mr. Bulwer) was intimately acquainted with the corps in question, and he was sorry that the noble Lord the Member for Winchester (Lord Baring), who held a command in the corps, was not at that moment present in the House. The corps to which he referred was the 1st Hampshire Volunteers, one of the first battalions to go into camp. They had gone into camp for 20 years, and originally almost the entire expense was borne by the officers, and that was the only mode in which they had been able to make themselves efficient. Last year they went into camp 900 strong; and

Mr. Bulwer

Lord Napier of Magdala, happening to be residing in the neighbourhood, went out every day to watch their progress, and afterwards drew up a Memorandum, which he sent to the commanding officer, expressing the result of his observation of the men. From this Memorandum he would read a few sentences, with a view to impressing on the Committee the advantages which Volunteers derived from being in camp. These men were recruited from different districts in the county, and they only met occasionally for their company drills; while their only opportunity of learning their battalion drill and qualifying themselves to take their place in line with the Regular troops, or with any troops, was this annual week's practice. This they did very thoroughly. And with regard to cooking, he might mention that whole carcasses of sheep were delivered in camp, and were cut up and distributed to the men just as would be done on actual service; and everything was done according to strict regulations. Lord Napier, after having watched them for one week, published this voluntary compliment to them—

"I had frequent opportunities of seeing the 1st Hampshire Volunteers during their eight days' encampment at Camberley. They were steady at drill; Battalion movements smartly done, not entirely without mistakes, but with fewer than could possibly have been expected; the distances well preserved. The skirmishing was good, and I noticed the attention of the non-commissioned officers, and the willingness of the men to be taught. The camp was well pitched, and all its arrangements, camp kitchens, &c., very business-like and satisfactory. The conduct of the men in town was exemplary, and thoroughly won the goodwill of the inhabitants, who hope to see them again next year. The working of the Battalion showed that the company officers and the men had attended to their drill during the year, and thus they were able to appear in combined movements as if they had been embodied for a long time, and made it very difficult to realize that they had been together only a few days. On the whole, I consider the 1st Hampshire Volunteers a most serviceable and intelligent body of men, very creditable to their battalion, and to their officers and non-commissioned officers. I congratulate Colonel Sir W. Humphery on having brought the corps to such a highly creditable condition."

That was entirely owing to their having been in camp every year for 20 years, the numbers going into camp having increased from 500 to 1,000. The Government proposed now that only 800 of those men should be assisted to go into camp; and as that was their only means of making themselves efficient 200 must be returned as non-efficient, or the officers must provide the money which the Government declined to give. He sincerely trusted that if the Committee of the House recognized the value of the Volunteers they would not sanction this parsimony. With regard to the issue of the Martini-Henry, he was not so anxious to encourage the practice of "pot-hunting" by the issue of this rifle for a fortnight. He thought it was of more importance to consider the general improvement in shooting by the Volunteers than the shooting of a few men at Wimbledon. He would rather have a few battalions shoot better than they now could, than have good shooting confined to a few particular men. He hoped the noble Marquess would have no hesitation in asking for a supplement to the Vote proposed, which was not sufficient to meet the wants of all the men who wished to go into camp this year, so that no Volunteers might be disappointed in receiving their allowance.

Mr. STAVELEY HILL, as almost the oldest Volunteer in the House, said, he would venture to say a few words on a question which was of such considerable interest as this. As he read the Order of 1881 in the Regulations, it was that 2s. a-day, for a period not exceeding six days annually, be allowed to Volunteer corps for each man, under the circumstances described in paragraph 999. That was the Regulation distinctly laid down. Under those conditions camps of instruction had been formed which had been of very great use; and, speaking as one who had had the honour of entertaining one of these camps each year in his own place, he could bear testimony to the advantage these camps had been, not only in bringing up the efficiency of the men, but in promoting their health and discipline. Under these circumstances, a letter had been issued, dated March 31, 1884, which, he thought, was unworthy of a Government which had any desire to promote the Military Service of the country. The reason given for reducing the allowance by 20 per cent was that the numbers of men applying to go into camp throughout the country being in excess of the amount provided for in the annual Estimate, it had become necessary to limit the amount sanctioned for each corps. So that simply because it was not thought fit to put a few hundred pounds on to this Vote—an amount which would never have been grudged by the House or by the country—it was deemed necessary to limit the amount granted. He would apply that to the one camp with which he was acquainted. The number of men who went into that camp was 1,150. Of those, there were 200 men for three days at 6s. per man, which would come to £80; 100 men for five days at 10s. each—total, £50; 850 at 12s. each—total, £510; making altogether £620 for these 1,150 men. What did the Government propose to do? To grant only £496 of that £620, and to put the officers or men to the expense of £124 to enable all the men to go into camp.

COLONEL WALROND said, he was glad the Government had taken this Vote thus early in the Session, instead of deferring it, as they did last year, to a later period. It was a very important Vote, more especially on account of the Memorandum which his hon. Friend had quoted. The question of camps of instruction was a very serious one to the Volunteer Force generally; but as it had been discussed so fully already, he would not say much upon it. But he wished to say that many battalions of Provincial Volunteers now looked entirely to these camps for their efficiency. They could not afford to have battalion drills in their own districts; and if they could not have this annual week in camp they would suffer serious loss. Therefore, he hoped the noble Marquess would see his way to making an increased grant. He was quite sure that the noble Marquess and his hon. Friends were ready to do this; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer turned a deaf ear to them. All the military authorities in the House and at the War Office were, he was sure, willing that the Volunteers should receive their fair measure of money. He was much disappointed by the statement of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brand) with regard to the Martini-Henry rifles; because he knew that the Council of the National Rifle Association understood that, in addition to the Martini-Henry rifles they now had, they were to receive 12,000. [Mr. BRAND dissented.] The hon. Member shook his head; but that was what was understood by the Council; and, as a member of that Council, he thought it his duty to mention that now. He had also hoped that there would be an additional number of rifles issued to the whole Force in the course of the year; and he thought it would be a disastrous policy to issue Martini-Henry rifles to the Volunteer Force on a percentage system, as proposed. He could imagine nothing so likely to promote the practice of "pot-hunting" as to issue a certain number of Martini-Henry's to the good shots; because there were men now armed with that rifle who had given up the Snider entirely, and only shot with the Martini-Henry. If there was only a percentage of Martini-Henry's issued, the men who had them would give up the Snider, and that would seriously interfere with class shooting. It was desirable that general shooting should be encouraged, rather than that attention should be directed to getting a certain number of good shots. There was an impression that the Volunteers could shoot better than the men in the Army; but although, no doubt, it was possible to pick out a certain number of Volunteers who would make good practice, his opinion was that, in general, the Volunteers were in this respect inferior to the Regular troops. He trusted that the question of rifles would receive the earnest attention of Her Majesty's Government. He had referred to that subject two or three weeks ago, and the reply was that 250,000 Martini-Henry rifles were in store. He could see no reason why those weapons should not be as safe in the armouries of Volunteer Corps as they were in the Tower of London; at any rate, he was certain they could be returned into store within a week if necessary; that they would be rather improved by a little practice being made with them; and that their issue would tend to increase the efficiency of the Volunteer Force. It was somewhat late (1 A.M.) to call attention to one or two points that he desired to refer to; but the present was the only opportunity that would present itself of discussing Volunteer questions during the Session. One point was as to whether it was desirable that there should be an increased capitation grant, because the present grant was, in the opinion of many persons, insufficient, and it was considered that an additional sum should be given. His own view was that, if any further grant were made, it should be done by means of re-arrangement of the class firing; and he thought that if a scheme were drawn up to encourage the men to shoot, and thereby obtain an increased grant for efficiency with the rifle, it would do some good to the regiment. Then he wished to draw attention for one moment to the examination which Volunteer officers had to go through. He complained that the officers had to pay all their expenses in going to the place of examination, and that, when that examination was passed, they received as a grant 10*s.* for the benefit of their regiments. He thought that when an officer had passed his examination, the grant might be increased from 10*s.* to 50*s.*, or even more; and that would, no doubt, induce a larger number of officers to present themselves and do their best. So much had been said about the advantage of those examinations that he would not further refer to them. He thought it a subject for much congratulation that the Volunteer Force had increased in efficiency; and he was sure the Committee would be satisfied with the statement of the noble Marquess that during last year 1,390 Volunteers had enlisted in the Regular Army. It had always been his opinion that the Volunteer Force was a valuable addition to the Regular Army, not only in time of peace, but in time of war; and he was convinced that there was sufficient spirit amongst them to induce them to join the Army in the hour of need. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would be able to carry out the views he had recommended.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was anxious, after what had been said by hon. and gallant Gentlemen in different parts of the House, to ask the noble Marquess to consider, in the most favourable light that circumstances would allow, the applications made by Volunteers to camp out. He trusted the noble Marquess would not be compelled to baulk the desire of the Volunteers to go into camp. Recalling the Regulations, he believed there had always been some reservation as to the grant to be given. Paragraph 913 distinctly stated that the general expense would be covered by 2*s.* a-day; but there did not appear to be any limitation of the numbers. There were, of course, difficulties in the way—that was to say, the noble Marquess could not go to the country for an additional grant; he must wait until the exigencies of the Service pressed it upon him. But he could not help thinking that if the noble Marquess could see his way to allow a large proportion of the Volunteers applying to go into camp, it would go far to remove the feeling of discouragement which he understood was rather widely spread in consequence of the Regulation. With regard to the issue of Martini-Henry rifles, it appeared to him that a mistake had been made in issuing them by percentage, which would tend to mix up the arms of the regiment, and to complicate the arrangements for making and storing them; it would introduce two kinds of arms and ammunition, where it was never desirable or convenient to have more than one; and it would have a tendency to encourage the doctrine that the rifles in question were issued to assist a few men to shoot exceedingly well, rather than to bring up the whole regiment to a better average of shooting. It might be well if the rate of distribution were increased; and he thought the noble Marquess would be justified in keeping a lower reserve than, perhaps, would at other times be desirable. As had been pointed out, the arms would not be lost to the Army, and they would be always available in case of emergency. On the whole, he should be glad to see the abandonment of the percentage principle, which had been generally unacceptable, and was believed to be undesirable in itself.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he hoped his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley) would not think he was going too far in saying that they ought not to be satisfied with less than the proper allowance for every Volunteer on going into camp. In Lancashire, which was at the head of all the counties in respect to the Volunteer Service, both in numbers and efficiency, it had become more and more the custom every year to go into camp; and he thought that the inclination to adopt what was really the best system of training ought to be encouraged in every possible way. But the diminution of the allowance must have a discouraging effect. He knew already of one very efficient Lancashire corps which had decided not to go into camp upon the reduced allowance offered this year. The officers did not feel themselves justified in putting their hands into their pockets to make up the difference between the grant and the amount actually required. His own experience was that the great benefit to be derived from camping out depended upon its continuity. Those Volunteers who had been into camp one year were in a much better condition to profit by their next year's duties, and so on with respect to other years. The corps to which he belonged had gone regularly into camp for several years; and, as an instance of the progress made from year to year, he might mention that three years ago the men undertook to do their own cooking. The first year they had the assistance of eight skilled cooks from one of the Regular regiments; the next year they only required four; and the following year only one. Now, cooking was essential to enable a regiment to march, and that was just the kind of instruction that was derived from going into camp; and he hoped the Government would not act so as to discourage this very hopeful means of bringing the Volunteer Service into a condition of efficiency. There was much in the Report issued this year which must be gratifying to those interested in the Volunteer Force. The efficiency of the Force had greatly increased; and yet they were sensible of the fact that much remained to be done to enable it, in case of need, to take the field. He thought the Government would not go too far if, in addition to the Martini-Henry rifles, they were to provide accoutrements of the most approved pattern, and also valises. As it was, Volunteers were obliged to march into camp with the old knapsack, which was the only means they had of making up their kits; and it would be obvious that no regiment could take the field with an equipment of that kind. Therefore, he hoped the authorities would take into consideration the question of supplying accoutrements and valises to those Volunteers who desired to make themselves efficient. Some distinguished military men thought the Government ought to provide the Force with great coats, and that also he commended to the attention of the noble Marquess. At that hour he would not go into any other matters connected with the Force, though there were several which he had wished to notice; and he would, therefore, conclude by saying that he did not think he could too strongly express the hope that Her Majesty's Government would yield to the desire, on the part of most Volunteers, that a sufficient grant should be made to enable those who desired it to go into camp.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the discussion which had taken place showed that a strong feeling existed amongst hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in the Volunteer Force with reference to camping out. He did not think that subject had been prominently before him until a Question was asked upon it a few days ago; and until that evening he was not aware that so strong a feeling existed in connection with it. It was quite clear that before next year the subject must, at all events, be thoroughly considered; either some increase in the provision must be made, or else some method of selection less objectionable than the present method of dealing with the grants must be adopted. He did not, however, think that amongst the Volunteers of North-West Lancashire any idea of breach of faith was associated with the Circular which had been issued.

COLONEL STANLEY: I hope the noble Marquess will not think I said there was any breach of faith. I said it was wise to avoid the appearance of it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought the Regulation must be held to be governed by the first paragraph relating to regimental camps, which said that a portion of the Volunteer Force would in each year be assisted to form camps for Volunteer exercise, and then went on to describe the Regulations as to Volunteers who wished to form camps. There was nothing whatever about a greater force being assisted to camp out every year. He had already stated that they should be allowed to camp out every third year. As he had stated the other day, the permission to receive this assistance was not at first very much taken advantage of; apparently but a small number of corps desired to camp out at all, and those who did received the allowance year after year. The number, however, had continued rapidly to increase, and it was thought to be desirable and more agreeable to the position of the Volunteers themselves that, instead of making a selection of corps, a reduction of 20 per cent should be made on the number of men all round who were desirous of camping out. But, as he had said, the question must be considered before next year. If he could see his way to do so, he should be very glad to meet the suggestion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley), to reconsider the matter at once; but considering the heavy expenses with which the Military Estimates were burdened this year, it was much more likely there would be a deficiency than a saving, and he could not, therefore, make any further provision by way of Supplementary Estimate this year. It was necessary that some control should be exercised over this and other expenditure on account of the Volunteer Force; although he was free to admit that up to the present time the Force had been an economical one, and he believed that its high popularity was largely due to that fact. He was somewhat sorry to hear that the exertions of the authorities to maintain that economy had been met with a request for an increased expenditure. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Walrond) was probably correct when he said that the House would cheerfully vote the sum required for an increased capitation grant. No doubt it would, and also a great many other items; but when hon. Members, on whichever side of the House they sat, came to consider the expenditure of the Government from a broader point of view, he did not see that there was any such unanimous acquiescence in the general increase of military expenditure; on the contrary, accusations of extravagance in military matters had proceeded with tolerable impartiality from both sides of the House. Under those circumstances—considering that it was desirable that strict economy should be exercised with regard to the Force; considering, also, that only a limited portion of the Force could encamp every year, and that the proposal would involve a sudden and unexpected increase of charge, it was impossible to hold out any hope that an alteration could be made before next year.

MR. ALAN EGERTON said, that nothing appeared to have been done for the purpose of restoring to the Volunteers Wormwood Scrubbs as a shooting ground. It was very important that all Volunteers should become efficient in shooting in order to earn the capitation grant. At the same time, it was impossible for the working classes, who formed the great bulk of the London Volunteer regiments, to spend the time and money necessary for their going down to Ealing. The present arrangement meant that Volunteers must sacrifice half-a-day's wages in order to make themselves efficient; and he therefore trusted the hon. Gentleman the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Brand) would be able to give some assurance that Wormwood Scrubbs should be used for the purpose of Volunteer practice.

MR. BULWER said, he hoped that the allowances would be made this year to the men who actually went into camp. A promise to that effect would enable commanding officers to make the necessary arrangements as soon as the number of men was known. The expense would not be very great, and the concession need not be drawn into a precedent; at the same time, early notice could be given next year which would allow commanding officers to make arrangements for a certain number of men to go into camp on the Regulation allowance.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER remarked, that the establishment of the Volunteer Force in 1883-4 was 193,734, and that for the year 1884-5 it numbered 194,220—a very considerable increase, which showed that the Volunteers were desirous of making themselves efficient, which, of his own knowledge, they were perfectly able to accomplish. He hoped the noble Marquess would see his way this year to give the Volunteers the benefit of any alteration that could be made in the Regulations with regard to camping out; and he was sure they would be perfectly willing to submit to such further Regulations as the noble Marquess might bring forward.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would give the best consideration he could; but it was impossible for him to do what was asked of him—namely, to bring in a Supplementary Estimate. It was occasionally necessary, at the commencement of a year, to bring in Supplementary Estimates; but such Estimates were for unforeseen expenses. He could not see his way to bring in a Supplementary Estimate to cover the expense of Volunteers going into camp.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee sit again upon Wednesday."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that when the Vote for the Men was taken the Committee were promised faithfully that to-night, or the night the Estimates were brought forward again, hon. Members should have an ample opportunity of discussing the Vote; that was distinctly stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Vote was agreed to. They had not had the opportunity that was promised them; and therefore he begged to ask that Supply should be put down again upon a day that the Committee would have an opportunity of discussing the question of the present condition of the Army.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR reminded the right hon. Gentleman on the Government Bench that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War agreed in reference to one Vote—a Vote which had just been taken in Committee—that it should not be reported as early as the other Votes, but should be allowed to stand over until the War Office had made up their minds with regard to certain suggestions, emanating from Irish Members, as to the payment of chaplains for certain Militia regiments in Ireland. What he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) wanted to ascertain was, whether it was distinctly understood that at the next Report of Supply the Vote for Divine Service would not be included?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, the Report of the whole of the Votes must be put down pro forma; but he would arrange with the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, who had given such an undertaking as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) mentioned, that the Vote for Divine Service should be postponed. In reply to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), he had to say that the first Vote had been already reported; but there would be ample opportunity for discussing the question of the present condition of the Army upon the Reserve Vote, and that Vote could not long be postponed. He hoped that the introduction of that Vote would be considered by the hon. and gallant Baronet a fitting and convenient opportunity on which to bring on his Motion.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER pointed out to his hon. and gallant Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office (Sir Arthur Hayter) that the Committee understood from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they should have an opportunity of discussing the whole Army question on Vote 8, and on some day between Easter and Whitsuntide. He hoped that another day would be given before Whitsuntide for the consideration of the Army Estimates.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the Government promised that a day should be given for the Army Estimates, and another day for the Navy Estimates, before Whitsuntide. It was quite impossible to give a second day for the Army Estimates before Whitsuntide.

Motion agreed to.

HYDE PARK CORNER IMPROVEMENTS BILL.—[BILL 136.]

(Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Courtney.)

SECOND READING. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved that the Order be discharged. He proposed to take this course so that the Bill might be introduced in the other House. He had failed to induce hon. Gentlemen, who opposed the Bill, to remove their blocks; and as it was absolutely necessary that the Bill should pass on an early day, in order that it might be referred to a Select Committee, he begged to move that the Order be discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked if the Bill could be introduced in the House of Lords, inasmuch as it was a Money Bill?

MR. WARTON begged to move that the Order be not discharged.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR rose to Order. He desired to ask whether the Bill could be introduced in the House of Lords without infringing the Privileges of the Commons?

MR. SPEAKER: It is competent for the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) to move that the Order be discharged.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman had explained that his object in moving that the Order be discharged was that the Bill might be introduced in the other House. Could such a reason be of any weight at all unless they knew that the Bill could be introduced in the House of Lords?

MR. HICKS said, that, after the remarks which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, it might, perhaps, be well that the House should understand the reason why objection had been taken to proceeding with the Bill after half-past 12 o'clock at night. [Laughter.] He repeated, that, after the remarks which had fallen from the First Commissioner of Works, it was desirable the House should be acquainted with the objections which had been taken to passing the Bill in the early hours of the morning without any discussion; and he was not going to be debarred from narrating the facts by any interruption from Gentlemen on the Front Treasury Bench. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite talked both in and out of the House about Obstruction; but he hoped the country would understand that the Obstruction came from those Gentlemen themselves, by interrupting independent Members of the House. Now, the objection to the Bill was that Her Majesty's Government asked the House—

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked whether it was competent for the hon. Gentleman to discuss the Bill?

MR. SPEAKER: It is not competent for the hon. Gentleman to discuss the merits of the Bill, or the clauses of the Bill. He can only refer to the Question now before the House, which is that the Order be discharged.

MR. HICKS said, it would be in the recollection of the Speaker that the First Commissioner of Works used words implying censure upon those who had objected to the Bill being passed without discussion; and if he (Mr. Hicks) was in Order—

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I never implied any censure.

MR. HICKS: Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in your hands,

Sir Arthur Hayter

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is that the Order be discharged.

Question put, and agreed to.

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

REDISTRIBUTION OF SEATS BILL.

(Sir John Hay, Mr. James A. Campbell.)

[BILL 131.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN HAY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said he had no desire to detain the House at that hour (1.50) of the morning by making any statement in regard to the merits of the Bill. In the printing of the Bill a certain number of errors had been made, especially in regard to figures, and it was well the necessary Amendments should be printed on the Paper. This could not be done until the second reading had been agreed to. He hoped hon. Gentlemen would allow the second reading to be taken now.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Hay.)

MR. BUCHANAN said, he did not think the House ought to allow a Bill of this kind to pass the second reading; and, therefore, he begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The objections to the Bill were manifest. It would accentuate the difference between boroughs and counties to a degree that had never previously been suggested by any responsible politician, and to an extent that was absurd; and the House, he was sure, would not read a second time a Bill carrying out that principle in such a way.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Buchanan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at Two o'clock.

PETITION.

Petition of Charles Bradlaugh, M.P., praying that an Officer of the House may attend at the hearing of a cause commenced by the Attorney General, on behalf of Her Majesty, against the Petitioner, and produce the Journal of the House for the year 1882 (presented on Thursday last): Ordered as prayed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (THE LABOURERS ACT) (CARRICK-ON-SUIR) BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(NO. 54.) . SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that this was one of the first Bills that had been brought forward for the confirmation of Provisional Orders that had been made under the Act which was very properly intended to provide labourers' cottages in Ireland. That Act was passed rather hurriedly; two or three defects in it were pointed out at the time the measure was passing through Parliament; and it was even observed that, in the form in which it stood, it was totally unworkable. If it had not been totally unworkable, it had, at all events, caused a great deal of confusion, and might be the cause of a great deal more. The authorities who were intrusted with the administration of the Act were the Sanitary Authority—that was, the Board of Guardians—who had now constituted themselves, to a large extent, political debating societies; and, while not always keeping in view the advantages of those for whose benefit the Act was passed, disregarded the rights of anyone who was not in favour with them. In short, they mixed up politics with the matter. At the same time, the Sanitary Boards had large powers to choose sites and take possession of them under certain formalities. The Lord President had asked them to carefully watch the working of the Act; and he thought it right to urge on him that one Amendment, at least, should be introduced to provide that sites taken by compulsion should, at all events, have a frontage to some public road. At present, the sites which were selected were often a very considerable distance from any public road, and even in the centre of a man's farm, which certainly was not intended by the Act. It was very desirable indeed that the choice of sites should be carried out under some more responsible authority, so as to cause as little inconvenience as possible. The working of the Act, he believed, had caused great expense, and was the cause of great dissatisfaction to those with whose rights it interfered; and he thought that, at all events, in the respect he referred to, it ought to be worked so as to trouble those concerned as little as possible.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, he entirely endorsed all the allegations that had been made by his noble Friend in regard to the working of the Act. In Ireland a man had always a great objection to building labourers' cottages on his own land; but that objection did not apply to the building of cottages on the lands of his neighbours, and the only protection they had was the Boards of Guardians, which, as they had heard, had taken up a political stand. The result of this was that the Act had done far more mischief than it had conferred benefits. He hoped, however, that in future the authorities would take care that the benefits which it was intended that the Act should confer upon the labourers should not be neutralized by the action of the Boards of Guardians.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, that he did not like to express any opinion of his own at this moment on the working of the Act, which had, no doubt, been attended with very considerable difficulty; but he would take care to bring to the attention of the Irish Government, and especially of the Chief Secretary, the points raised by the noble Lords.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

PARLIAMENT—REPRESENTATION OF IRELAND.—RESOLUTION.

LORD WAVENEY had given Notice of his intention to move a Resolution—

"That all boroughs of not more than 1,000 registered voters at the time of passing any Bill for redistribution of seats in Parliament in Ireland shall be incorporated into the representation of the counties wherein they are situate by the addition of so many members to the county representation as these boroughs shall have aforesaid returned to Parliament, to be elected then and thenceforward on the county franchise;"

but before his Lordship rose,

THE EARL of REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, that he objected to the noble Lord proceeding with this Motion. On a former evening he had pointed out objections to the Resolution as being against the Standing Orders of the House. He asked their Lordships whether they were in a position to agree to such a Resolution as the one upon the Paper, which had reference to a redistribution of seats, and which particularly affected the other House of Parliament. There was another objection to the Resolution. He noticed that last night, or rather that morning at 2 o'clock, there was a Bill for the redistribution of seats before the other House, which was counted out upon it. Therefore, there was a Bill before the other House on the subject of this Resolution. He thought that if the noble Lord would consider the matter, he would hardly propose such a Resolution as that which now stood upon their Lordships' Paper in his name.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that when the Notice was laid upon the Table he was not aware that there was a Bill before the other House on the subject; but now the attention of their Lordships had been called to that fact he had to say that it would be clearly out of Order to proceed with the Motion.

LORD WAVENEY said, that the noble Earl at the Table (the Earl of Redesdale) had stated that his Resolution had reference to a redistribution of seats; but he would point out that there was a great distinction between a Redistribution Bill and what would be the result of his Resolution if it were agreed to in a Bill. He would, therefore, proceed to bring on his Resolution.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) rose to Order, and said the noble Lord stated that his Resolution had nothing to do with the redistribution of seats; but those were the very words of the Resolution, and the fact that this Resolution unquestionably dealt with a subject regarding which there was a Bill before the other House made it out of Order to bring on the Resolution in that House.

LORD WAVENEY pointed out that his Resolution had reference not to redistribution of seats, but to the incorporation of the seats existing in boroughs with those in the counties—it was a question of allocation, and not one of any particular redistribution. And unless any noble Lord had other objections to make he would proceed with his Resolution.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY rose to Order. He felt as strongly on this subject as the noble Earl the Leader of the House and the Chairman of Committees that the Resolution was out of Order and should not be proceeded with, and they were not so powerless as to allow the noble Lord to proceed in spite of the objections offered against his doing so; he would, therefore, move that the noble Lord be not now heard.

Moved, "That the Lord Waveney be not now heard."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On Question? agreed to.

LORD WAVENEY thereupon gave Notice that on an early day he would call attention to the numerical proportion of the boroughs of Ireland.

EGYPT—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I rise to inquire in what position the negotiations with regard to the proposed Conference on the financial affairs of Egypt now stand; and to move for a copy of the invitation to the Conference addressed by Her Majesty's Government to the various Powers, and I should have liked to have added to the Motion the words, "And the answers received from the different Powers." I have observed, from the ordinary channels of information, that an answer was made in "another place" to my right hon. Friend (Mr. Bourke) that it was wholly inconsistent with the practice of Parliament to lay these answers on the Table before they had been received. If that be so, and if that be the practice of Her Majesty's Government, I have nothing to say. At the same time, I think it right to call attention to one rather singular incident in these transactions, because I notice that on the 1st of May, when a Question on this subject was put to the Prime Minister, he was reported to have said that the proposal of Her Majesty's Government to hold a Conference had been accepted by the Powers; whereas on May 2nd, when he was asked whether he would produce these answers, he said—"We are not accustomed to produce the answers of Foreign Powers before they are received." There is a certain difference between these statements, and I do not know how to reconcile them. I am at a loss to understand whether it is that the Government object to produce these answers at all, or whether they object to produce them before they are received. If they have been received, as, according to the statement of the Prime Minister, they seem to have been, I trust there will be no objection to produce them; if they have not been received, I must leave the noble Earl to explain how the Prime Minister was able to state on the 2nd of May that the proposals had been accepted. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has on several occasions lately taken me to task for various things I have said, or have been supposed to have said. A few days ago he described me as a severe critic of Her Majesty's Government, and the remarks I made seem to have pressed rather hard. Last night, again, in answer to a very simple Question which I ventured to put, and which had no reference to Her Majesty's Government, he said that I claimed a monopoly of knowledge on a particular subject. I have no doubt it was inconvenient to Her Majesty's Government to be asked Questions as to the progress of this Conference. Of them it would be much more true to say that they had claimed a monopoly of knowledge to themselves, our knowledge having been extracted from the Papers to which I refer. But, at the same time, the remedy is in their own hands. If they would deal a little more frankly with us, and take Parliament a little more into their confidence in matters of this kind, Questions such as I am about to put would be less frequent, and the speeches concerning them would be more brief. I think, in the circumstances, we should fail in our duty if we hesitated to put Questions which the supreme urgency of the case seem to me to warrant. There are two questions which are at this moment directly before the public mind—one is the position of General Gordon, and the other is of this financial Conference. I do not wish to say a word with regard to General Gordon—that is a separate question. What I desire to call attention to is the position and progress of business with regard to this financial Conference. It is a most important question, and one which goes far beyond the hour, and it is most important that Parliament should have a clear understanding as to the bases of the Conference. In the morning papers yesterday there appeared a Memorandum which purported to be the invitation sent by Her Majesty's Government to the Powers. The text of the invitation was not given; but I think it is not too much to ask the Government to give Parliament, not only the Memorandum, but the text of the invitation in an authoritative form. And here I cannot but say that we owe a very great debt to the public Press, in that, but for them, we should have been absolutely in the dark as to the condition in which affairs were. I am not going to discuss the figures or statements in that Memorandum. It is sufficient for my purpose to say—if I gathered it rightly—that the Memorandum set forth that the present deficits, accumulated during the last three years, amount to the enormous sum of £8,000,000 sterling, and that there is a deficit during the current year of £500,000 more. These figures come to something not far short of bankruptcy; and it is on that ground, as I understand it, that the Conference is to meet. Upon the very threshold, so to speak, of that Conference, I must take the opportunity of saying that I feel the greatest doubt as to the expediency of calling the Conference together at all. It is meant, so far as we can understand it, to effect a change in the Law of Liquidation; but that law was not passed through the agency of any International Conference, but by an International Commission, and in the ordinary course of diplomatic communications. In regard to this the old legal maxim holds that the same power which ties the knot may also undo the knot. But there is a, perhaps, more serious objection than that to which I have referred. It is impossible not to question in one's own mind what the prospects of success are in summoning such a Conference. I cannot see how it is possible that the Powers there assembled will agree to a proposal without obtaining from Her Majesty's Government a security which I do not think it is in their power to give. What I mean is, supposing that Her Majesty's Government make a request for some concession on the ground of these enormous deficits—which, as I have said, amount almost to a state of bankruptcy—must not the answer be, what security is there that next year, or the following year, there will not be a recurrence of these deficits? What security can the Government give, what answer can they possibly make to such an objection? The only possible security would be a re-establishment of order, on which a general confidence would follow; but that security does not exist at the present time. That confidence has broken down and gone to pieces under the administration of Her Majesty's Government in Egypt, and it is impossible not to ask Her Majesty's Government how that security is to be provided. Then, further, how can any reasonable person suppose it possible that you could limit the debate in this proposed Conference to mere questions of finance? Finance means one of two things—retrenchment or taxation; and then comes the question—Retrenchment in what, or taxation of what? Retrenchment in what particular Department? Taxation on what particular class? Finance, in this instance, means opening up the whole administration of the Government of Egypt; and I am, therefore, totally at a loss to know how you can bring the Representatives of the various Powers to discuss the finance of the country without trespassing upon the question of general policy. Her Majesty's Government have already, by implication, admitted that nothing would be more dangerous, or more compromising to the interests of England in Egypt, than to discuss the whole question of policy and administration in an International Conference, and that, in fact, it might amount to opening a door which you can scarcely hope to close again. This very Memorandum to which I have referred, and which, I presume, I may quote, is an illustration of what I mean, because in one part of it it is stated that, although there has been an enormous deficit, the Khedive has spent £500,000 sterling for the recovery of the Soudan. This last point brings in the question of policy, in that the burden is shifted most unwisely—and, as I think, injudiciously—from the shoulders of Her Majesty's Government to those of the Khedive. As to the recovery of the Soudan, I will say nothing beyond expressing the opinion that a single word from Downing Street would have stopped the march of Colonel Hicks and all the subsequent disasters that followed it. It is said that the Government have secured the assent of all the Powers to the Conference, and I sincerely hope it is so, for nothing would give me greater satisfaction than to have that knowledge; but I must own that there are very few signs of that happy concurrence and concord. As far as the Foreign Press is concerned, I must say that it is almost entirely opposed to any proposal for Foreign Powers to take part in this Conference. Certainly the news that we have seen this morning that Russia has taken advantage of this occasion to annex Sarakhs, which has been hinted at before, does not improve the situation; and if the report be true it only shows the value of the sympathy and co-operation of Russia. We are now, in fact, reaping, in a great measure, the results of a very impulsive Prime Minister. We are reaping those results in the hostility—the patent, manifest hostility of the Porte, and possibly the coldness of Germany. There is a great deal more that might be said on this subject. I have simply stated, from my point of view, the very obvious reasons which have induced me to doubt greatly the political wisdom or the public expediency of the Conference at the present time. But if that Conference is to be held, it is very important to know what the terms and basis of it are. I see numberless difficulties, and what is much worse, a great many dangers ahead. There may be opinions and engagements to which we may be commited, and which will be dangerous hereafter. Again, I say that, under these circumstances, what we desire is to have light thrown upon this question. We have been too long in the dark, and it is very desirable that the Government should give us some general knowledge of the state of the case. I think it is extremely likely that the noble Earl opposite will tell me that I am premature in asking for this information, and that I am embarrassing the Government in asking for it. Well, I am really afraid there is no alternative. According to him, either I am too early or too late. The Conference at this moment has not met, and it is for that reason that I propose this Question. I know, if the Conference were sitting, the noble Earl would tell me it was contrary to precedent to express an opinion while negotiations were in progress. Therefore, I am on the horns of a dilemma. I must ask the Question now, or not at all. Under these circumstances, I press for the information, feeling that I am performing a public duty in doing so.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I own I was a little surprised when I saw the Notice of this Question on the Paper. I thought one of the objects of the noble Earl was to make a personal explanation, and to explain what he had said on two former occasions, on which he said I was entirely mistaken. I really do not think that I did make a mistake. The noble Earl's speech with reference to which he said I had made a mistake was as to the deportation of convicts by the French to Australia, which was brought forward on two occasions by my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Rosebery). What was the language on both these occasions of the noble Earl? He said that he really wished the Government would understand the importance of the question, and he assured us that the Australians were very much excited on the subject. He went on in this sort of way, and said that really he must press upon the Government that they ought to make diplomatic representations to France upon the subject. I appeal to your Lordships—is it likely we are ignorant of all these things? And when he gave us this lecture, was it entirely out of place for me to remonstrate against his assuming a monopoly of the knowledge that this was an important question? The noble Earl made very great fun of what he considers to be a difference of answer of mine from one given by Mr. Gladstone in "another place." Considering the hundreds, almost thousands, of Questions and answers, I cannot always undertake to give an explanation of an answer that was given; but I must say that, in this instance, the reply is a very obvious one—namely, that the two answers were perfectly compatible. I said here, and Mr. Gladstone stated in the other House, that answers had been received upon this Egyptian Conference Question of an affirmatory character. When asked to produce these answers, amongst the many reasons which may be stated, I think there is a very strong objection against doing so. But there is also this fact. The answers we had received were not written answers at all, but mere oral communications. That, I think, rather disposes of the alleged difference in the answers which have been given. Then the noble Earl goes on to refer to the objects of the Conference, and he says he cannot understand why we are to have a Conference. I am not going to argue the case with the noble Earl; but I may say this much—that when the Powers of Europe have an international right, and you wish to interfere with that international right, I do not think that the idea of consulting with them on the subject is perfectly monstrous. The noble Earl then went on to say that they must have information on the subject, and that they had suffered enormously from our reticence. I have a sort of recollection of a reticence on the part of the Government we succeeded. I think for nearly 18 months the public and the two Houses of Parliament were not aware of a great change of policy and all sorts of intentions with regard to Afghanistan, and yet the noble Earl objects to our keeping our own counsel even for a week or two. The noble Earl says he has a right to ask all these things. I deny it. We have heard lately of several new departures on the part of the Conservative Party with regard to policy. It appears to me that the noble Earl wants to bring about another great change of policy, which is this—to transfer to Parliament the negotiations with Foreign Powers. Now, it may be that the noble Earl only intends that the House of Lords should take the position which constitutionally the Senate of the United States has a right to take; but you may depend upon it that if we were to take away from the Crown the conduct of negotiations, there is another place that would not be slow in following our example. I must decline, and I cannot conceive anybody blaming me for declining, to enter into explanations with regard to negotiations which are at this moment actually going on.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I think the noble Earl shows undue susceptibility when he is indignant with us because we press upon him the importance of the serious questions which occupy the public mind at the present time. He should remember a little of the recent history of his own Government. It has been a history of long inaction and neglect, broken only by those spells of activity which have been brought about by the interference of Parliament. The policy of the Government has been bad enough; but it would have been twice or three times as bad as it has been if it had not been for the pressure which has been applied in this and the other House to induce the Government to attempt to cope with the great public dangers which their negligence has brought upon them. I think my noble Friend is quite justified in sounding a warning note with respect to this Conference. Whatever the rights of the Crown may be with respect to negotiations and the communication of its intentions to Parliament, we at least have the right to criticize, and it is a right we are bound to exercise when we think great public evils are impending. I confess that the reticence of the noble Earl fills me with some alarm. I am sure he is too good a tactician to adopt it if he could avoid it with safety to his own objects. I cannot believe that he would be so reserved if there were no other intention but to alter something of the Expenditure or something of the Revenue of the Viceroyalty of Egypt. If it were only an intention to correct something in the Law of Liquidation, to allow some Revenue to be applied to a purpose which had not previously been permitted, it would be so simple a matter, so free from any dangers, that I am sure the noble Earl would himself have come down at an earlier date and have told us something of the intentions which the Government entertained. There must be intentions with respect to this Conference of a far more wide-reaching character, involving far more delicate questions and far more dangerous issues. The Conference is beset with many difficulties. I do not know, when the noble Earl talks of the duty of consulting other Powers when you wish to modify an international right, that he intends that doctrine to be rigorously applied. Is he going to apply it in all its integrity to Turkey? Turkey is not only one of the Great Powers, and admitted to the Concert of Europe by the Treaty of Paris; but Turkey has a special claim to be heard in the disposal of Egyptian questions. It is especially necessary to appeal to Turkey upon the question of finance. If you intend to ask for outside authorization the first step you must take in order to smooth the path of your finance is to raise a loan; and raising a loan is positively prohibited by the Firman which makes the title of the present Khedive to his Throne. If you are to consult other Powers, as the noble Earl says, whenever you intend to interfere with matters on which they have international right, the first Power that should be consulted, and from whom consent should be obtained, is the Empire of Turkey. But that is not all. The Law of Liquidation does not impose the consent of the four or five Powers known as the Great Powers. It does not concern their interests alone. It is a law having for its object the protection of the individual interests of creditors belonging to various nationalities, and those nationalities are not only belonging to the Great Powers. There are Sweden, Spain, Greece, and other Powers. Is this Conference to contain them all? If it does not contain them all, how will its structure be conformable to the dogma which the noble Earl has just laid down, that when you interfere with the international rights of other Powers you are bound to consult them? My Lords, the evil which I dread, and which I believe many men in this country dread, when we heard of this Conference, is, that it will not be concerned with finance alone; that by hook or by crook the whole question of Egypt will be brought upon the Council Table, that the position which this country possesses in Egypt will be made dependent upon the assent and arbitrament of the Powers who sit around this Council Table, and that it will be under the cover of the European Concert that

Her Majesty's Government will extricate themselves, with little honour, from the embarrassments in which their policy has involved them. My Lords, if that is the object with which the Conference is summoned, or if that is the object which is contemplated, it is one of the most dangerous to the British interests that any Minister has ever devised, because it proposes nothing less than the sacrifice of that position which we have obtained in Egypt out of regard to British interests, and which, without sacrificing British interests, we cannot abandon. I am not going to speak of the past, or of the Dual Control. It was an arrangement which answered, I believe, admirably whilst it existed; and with reference to its death there is that difference of opinion which often occurs with respect to an individual's death. His friends think that his life might have been saved, and the friends of the doctor hold an opposite opinion. In my opinion, the Dual Control died by reason of the unskilful treatment with which it met; but I cannot expect noble Lords on the opposite Bench to agree with me. The point on which they will agree with me is that it is dead beyond recall. Well, what I want to insist upon is that the issue of this Conference, if it touches anything beyond finance, cannot be a revival of anything approaching to the Dual Control, or anything in which France should be our only partner. If anything touching the Government of Egypt comes out of this Council it will be a multiple control; and a more complete device for insuring permanent anarchy, for paralyzing the power of England in Egypt, and compromising all the interests she seeks to guard, it would be impossible to conceive. My Lords, there is no instance of International Government ever having produced anything but evil. I earnestly trust that, though the noble Earl will not tell us precisely what the aims of this Conference are, he will banish the possibility of such an issue from his plans and from his mind. At all events, I am convinced that any result of this Conference which shall leave the action of Her Majesty's Government in Egypt less free than it is now will be condemned by the people of this country. You cannot hand over the Government of Egypt to other hands than your own for the present. Having destroyed all that is strong and vigorous in Egyptian institutions, you cannot leave it to the anarchy you have brought upon it. You must work out for yourselves, by your own strength, the difficulties upon which you have entered, the problem you have yourselves by your conduct laid down; and I earnestly hope this Conference will not be made a screen for escaping from the responsibilities you have incurred.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The noble Lords who are in Opposition have a great advantage over us, because they know they can make speeches which, from the nature of the case, we cannot even attempt to answer. I rise merely for the purpose of saying that, while we feel bound not to reply, it is a new and peculiar mode of advancing the Public Business in the interests of the country for the noble Marquess, after he has been told it is impossible to give any information, to get up and make such a speech as he has just delivered. It is very easy for noble Lords opposite, after they have been told that it is for the public interest that Questions should not be answered, to get up and say—"Oh, just what we thought; you have some dark design." That, I repeat, is a very easy but not very admirable mode of procedure, or the most calculated to advance the Business of the House.

HOUSE OF LORDS—THE ELECTRIC LIGHT.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN asked Her Majesty's Government, Why the electric light, which has long since been successfully introduced into the House of Commons, has not been introduced into this House, and whether it is intended so to introduce it; and, if so, when? He had to complain that a Vote had been granted for the purpose of introducing the electric light into both Houses; but, while the House of Commons had taken care of themselves, the House of Lords was left with an illuminant which had almost gone out of fashion for public buildings.

LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, in reply to the noble Earl, I have to state that the First Commissioner of Works has the whole question of lighting in the Houses of Parliament with the electric light now under consideration. Plans and estimates are being made out, and it is intended, if possible, to light up with the electric light, not only the Library, Corridors, and Lobbies, as has been done in connection with the House of Commons, but also, in this case, to light up the interior of the House of Lords itself. The noble Earl has referred to the fact that last year a small Vote was taken to light up the Library. This was undoubtedly true; but when the First Commissioner came to go further into the matter, he found that, owing to the very short time your Lordships sit in the evening, it would be most uneconomical to light up only so small an area, and that it would be better to wait until it would be possible to light up all the Lobbies and the House itself as well as the Library.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD: Does the noble Lord mean that we must wait 12 months for the electric light?

LORD SUDELEY: I endeavoured to explain that there will be no difficulty when it is found possible to light up the whole area, and not only a limited section such as the Library.

MARRIAGES VALIDITY—PRETENDED CLERKS IN HOLY ORDERS.

QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Lord Chancellor, Whether the marriages solemnized by a man not in Holy Orders, who fraudulently obtained curacies in several dioceses and parishes during six years, are valid?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, the attention of the Attorney General was directed to the case; and he had very little doubt, if the Acts were at all as the noble Lord understood, that the law would be found not ineffectual to punish this description of fraud. With regard to the marriages which the person in question was said to have solemnized, he was happy to be able to state that, according to the best authority which he had been able to consult, there seemed no reason to suppose that those marriages, if contracted in good faith and in ignorance of the incompetence of this person, would not be held good. But even if there should be a doubt on the point, he had laid on their Lordships' Table a Bill of a retrospective as well as a prospective character, which he hoped would for ever set at rest all doubts with regard both to marriages solemnized in places which, for some formal reason, were supposed to have insufficient authority, and also marriages solemnized by persons incompetent by law to do so, but where the contracting parties acted in good faith.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS—DELAY IN DELIVERY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can explain why the Parliamentary Papers, "Egypt Nos. 12 and 13," which he placed on the Table of the House on the 28th April, extracts from which appeared in The Times and other newspapers on the 2nd of May, were not delivered to Peers until mid-day on the 3rd of May? He complained that similar delays were not uncommon; and he wished to know how it was that such documents appeared in the newspapers before they were in the hands of noble Lords?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was rather alarmed when he saw the Question; but he was somewhat reassured when the noble Earl asked it; and he felt that he could answer this Question, at any rate, without reticence, and without detriment to the Public Service. The fact was, the Papers were laid on the Table of the House on the 29th, not the 28th of April; and the printer reported that a full supply had been delivered to Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode with instructions to strike off a certain number of copies for the use of their Lordships, and some delay, owing to pressure of work, had occurred in doing so.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he thought that it was remarkable that the Papers dated the 1st of May had appeared in the newspapers without having been presented.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that it was impossible to prevent any member of the Press buying copies of the Papers and publishing them next morning; and he did not understand why this attack had been made upon him.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he thought that the answer of the noble Earl was hardly to the point, which was that important telegrams had appeared in the morning papers without having been presented to their Lordships' House.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD called attention to the fact that important public documents had appeared in the morning papers of that day which had not been distributed to Members of that House.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he could not make himself personally responsible for the delivery of every packet of Papers.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that it was constantly the case that Papers were distributed in the House of Commons and published next morning without having been delivered to their Lordships. He had no wish to make an attack on the noble Earl; but they did not know whom else to attack.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY reminded their Lordships that the House of Commons sat later, and that it would thus happen that Papers might be delivered there which could not be delivered to their Lordships.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that the grievance was a real one, and it had happened over and over again. He thought that the fault must lie with the office connected with the printing of the Papers.

QUESTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND)—THE RATE COLLECTOR OF THE BOYLE UNION.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been drawn to the fact that on the occasion of the election of John M'Williams to the rate-collectorship of the Cragkan Division of the Boyle Union, the rate of poundage was fixed at 8*d.* on a division by the vote of a majority of the Board before proceeding to the election, notwithstanding that the Board was apprised that one of the candidates offered solvent security for the collection of the rate at 4*d.*; how many ex-officio guardians and how many elected guardians voted for an eightpenny poundage, and how many ex-officio, as distinguished from elected guardians, voted for the reduced poundage; whether it was stated that the rates are already satisfactorily collected in another Division of the Union at 4*d.*; whether the persons who voted for the eightpenny rate were, with one or two exceptions, those who subsequently elected Mr. M'Williams; whether, in view of these circumstances, the Local Government Board will be requested to reconsider their sanction of the appointment; whether, with regard to the allegation that the Local Government Board had no information as to the procurement of Mr. Corry's resignation by M'Williams, the Local Government Board have received a communication from Mr. Mahon, stating that Mr. Corry's resignation is in M'Williams' handwriting; whether Mahon's protest was forwarded in the usual course by the Local Government Board to the Board of Guardians for their observations, and was suppressed by the clerk; whether the clerk admitted publicly that he had inserted 8*d.* as the poundage rate in the advertisement without the authority of the Board; and, whether he is the person whose neglect of duty caused the breakdown of the Labourers' Act in the Boyle Union, and who boasted at a meeting of the Board that he had not read the Act, and did not intend to do so?

MR. TREVELYAN: On the day of the election it was sought to reduce the poundage from 8*d.* to 4*d.*, and this proposal was negatived by a majority of 5, the voting being for, ex officio, 1, elected 22, total 23; against, ex officio, 21, elected 7, total 28. With respect to the security offered by the candidate who was prepared to collect for the lower rate, the clerk of the Union states that one of the parties named as his surety states that he would not sign a bond for him. It is true that some Guardians stated that in a neighbouring Division the rates were satisfactorily collected at 4*d.* But the clerk of the Union reports that this is not the case, as there is a very large arrear outstanding in that Division. The Guardians who voted for adhering to the poundage of 8*d.* were generally those who voted for Mr. M'Williams's appointment. These facts would not justify the Local Government Board in overruling the action of the Board of Guardians in regard to the election. After the Local Government Board had sanctioned the appointment of Mr. M'Williams, they received from Mr. Mahon a communication as stated in the Question, and they have informed Mr. Mahon that if he has any evidence to support his statement that Mr. M'Williams induced the former collector, Mr. Corry, to resign "for a consideration," the question of removing Mr. M'Williams from office will at once be considered. Mr. Mahon's letter was sent by the Local Government Board to the Guardians. It was not suppressed by the clerk, but was laid before the Guardians at their next meeting. The clerk has not replied to the inquiry in the last paragraph but one of the Question, but the poundage of 8*d.* has been allowed in the district for many years. The clerk of the Union denies that he ever made the statement attributed to him in the last paragraph of the Question; and the Local Government Board inform me that the alleged breakdown of the Labourers' Act in Boyle Union appears to have been caused by the Guardians' omission to make their scheme and give the necessary notices in due time.

DOMINION OF CANADA—THE CLIMATE OF MANITOBA.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will take means to have a statement furnished to the public regarding the climate of Manitoba?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: There is already an abundance of statements, both true and official, available to the public. I would refer the hon. Member to the "Colonization Circular," issued by the Colonial Office, price 6d.; secondly, to the Statistical Abstract for the Colonial Possessions issued by the Board of Trade, where, on page 154 of the last edition, he will find a table for each of the 12 months of the average readings of the thermometer in Manitoba. Thirdly, I would refer the hon. Member to the hand-book of information relating to the Dominion of Canada, which is published by the Canadian Government with the sanction of the Secretary of State. There are a map and photographs bound up with it, and it can be obtained from the High Commissioner of Canada or any of the Canadian agents in this country gratis.

INTESTATES' ESTATES BILL — CROWN'S NOMINEE ACCOUNT.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can inform the House what is the total amount of accumulations on the Crown's Nominee Account, which may be claimed, either by right according to Law, or by grace according to precedent, and to which the Statute of Limitations contained in the Intestates' Estates Bill will apply?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, he was not quite sure what the hon. Member meant by his Question. The Bill, if passed, would in due time apply to all estates that had been, however recently, brought within the administration of the Treasury. He supposed, however, the hon. Gentleman wished to know what was the total sum which at present could be claimed either by law or moral obligation, but which claim would be barred if the Bill became law. The total amount of accumulation a week ago was about £250,000, of which only a very small portion would possibly come within the scope of the Bill. He thought he would be safe in putting the maximum sum at £50,000. The object of the Bill was not to bring money into the Exchequer, but to close accounts which had been outstanding for some time, and to prevent the possibility of persons wasting their time and labour in making impossible claims.

LAW AND JUSTICE—DORMANT FUNDS IN CHANCERY.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the time assigned by Act of Parliament for the periodical publication of the list of dormant funds in Chancery is now long passed; and, if so, whether he will take such steps as may be necessary to prevent any further inconvenience arising to the suitors from the disregard of the Law by the Public Department which he represents in the House of Commons?

MR. COURTNEY: No time is fixed by statute for the publication of these lists; but a Chancery rule directs that they should be published as soon as may be after the 1st of September. As the list has to be made up to that date the work cannot be commenced until after it; and as it has to be compiled by the regular staff of the office from books constantly in use its preparation necessarily takes some time. By the new rules the date prescribed for its publication is March 1. Two causes have prevented this date being attained on the present occasion—first, the large changes in the personnel, duties, and organization of the Pay Office consequent on recent forms and organization; and, secondly, the introduction of a new and greatly improved form of Return, which will give more information to the public in a better form; but which, on its first introduction, entails a great deal of additional labour. The Return will be ready in about four weeks.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND)—THE RATE COLLECTOR OF THE BLACKROCK TOWNSHIP COMMISSIONERS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Elliott, the rate collector of the Blackrock Township Commissioners, is now rate collector of the Rathmines district of the South Dublin Union and secretary of the Drummond Institute; whether, at a recent sworn inquiry, ordered by the Local Government Board, it was proved that there were 121 persons on the Parliamentary register for the county of Dublin for the Rathmines polling district alone, as rated occupiers, whose names did not appear upon the rate books, and who were not objected to by the Union authorities at the last County Dublin Parliamentary Revision Courts; whether, at such sworn inquiry, Mr. Elliott, on cross-examination, stated on oath that in his district the larger portion of the rates for the year were collected before the 1st day of June 1883, and that he considered that his duty to make inquiries as to rated occupiers with a view to making objections on the Parliamentary Voters' Register ended when he received payment of the rates, and that in many instances landlords in the Rathmines district, owning a large number of houses, paid the rates thereon, and in such instances he had made no inquiries, and relied solely on such notifications of alterations in tenancies as these landlords had given him; whether Mr. Elliott has collected and misappropriated more than £2,000 of the Blackrock township rates, and has assigned substantially all his property as security therefor; whether a Committee of the Blackrock Commissioners make a daily audit of Mr. Elliott's collecting accounts; and, whether the Local Government Board intend taking any steps in reference to Mr. Elliott's conduct?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Elliott holds the appointments stated. The evidence given by the Clerk of the Union and Mr. Elliott at the sworn inquiry bear out the statements in the second and third paragraphs of the Question, and these officers have been censured by the Local Government Board. The Board have at present no information, beyond that contained in newspaper reports, as to the alleged misappropriation of the township rates; but the subject is engaging their careful attention. I am informed by the Secretary to the Township Commissioners that the entire matter is under the consideration of a Special Committee of the Board, who have all but closed their proceedings; but have not yet brought in their final Report.

BANKRUPTCY COURT (IRELAND)—UNCLAIMED DIVIDENDS—FUND ACCOUNT.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that, on the 1st of November in each year, a list of unpaid dividends is prepared and made out by the official assignee of the Irish Bankruptcy Court, showing the names of the different parties entitled to those dividends; and, if so, what valid objection there is to publishing that list in the Dublin papers, so that creditors may be made aware of the dividends due to them?

MR. COURTNEY: A list is annually prepared, showing the items transferred to the unclaimed dividend account in the previous year. The suggestion of the hon. Member will be duly considered when we are in a position to decide upon this Question.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked what became of the interest that accumulated upon this fund?

MR. COURTNEY: I am not in a position to answer that Question.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT LONDONDERRY—USE OF FIREARMS IN A PROCLAIMED DISTRICT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, seeing that young Waller had firearms in his possession on the occasion of the riots in Derry in November last, he will make inquiry as to whether Waller had an excise licence to carry arms, and, if not, why has he not been prosecuted for a violation of 33 and 34 Vic. c. 57; whether he had special licence to carry arms in a proclaimed district, and, if not, why he has not been prosecuted under the Crimes Act; and, to ask same questions regarding Taylor and Mr. Clanders, who were charged with firing revolvers at female factory hands?

MR. TREVELYAN: With regard to this Question, there are several persons concerned about whom Questions have been asked on both sides of this affair; and I would be rather glad if the hon. Member postponed his Question till next Monday, when I will give a complete answer.

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND).

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a number of appointments, temporary or otherwise, have been made, within the past five years, upon the Staff of the Board of Public Works in Ireland; whether any public notification of such appointments being about to be made was previously given; or whether any such appointments were subject to competitive examination; whether it is a fact that persons of little or no previous training or qualifications have been so appointed to act in matters of engineering, surveying, land improvement, drainage, buildings, loans, reporting, &c.; whether it is a fact that, while persons with little or no previous training, professional skill, or qualifications, have been so appointed, qualified men, some of whom had taken out their degrees and diploma of civil engineering in Trinity College, Dublin, and in the Queen's University, have been unable to obtain such employment under the said Board; and, whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return of all such persons appointed or employed on the Board of Works Staff within the past five years; showing whether temporary or permanent, the dates of appointment, and age then, their pay and allowances, the nature of their employment, and a description of their previously ascertained qualifications?

MR. COURTNEY: I understand the hon. Member to refer to the Engineers' and Surveyors' Department of the Board of Works. A considerable number of persons have in recent years been appointed to temporary offices in these branches of the Department without advertisement or examination, which are not required for such posts. The selection has been very carefully made by the Board out of a large number of applicants, and they see no reason to doubt that the best men were selected; certainly, none were appointed who were not qualified by training and experience. It is obviously impossible to answer specifically such general charges as those made by the hon. Member; but if he will bring any particular case before me privately I will make inquiries about it. There is no objection to lay the Return asked for on the Table; but at present I see no justification for incurring the expense of doing so.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. BUCHANAN asked the Lord Advocate, When he intends to take the Second Reading of the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): My hon. Friend will have observed that this Bill has been placed on the Paper on Government nights for the second reading; and we had hoped that the second reading might have been obtained. The Bill, however, has been blocked; but if the hon. Member who has blocked it will remove his block, I have no doubt the Bill might be read a second time after a short discussion. Our proposal is to ask that the Bill should be referred to a large Select Committee, and I do not think the clauses will occupy much time.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)— CAPTAIN BECKETT, R.M.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Captain Beckett, resident magistrate at Athlone, is a member of the military mess, and spends the greater part of his time at the military barracks, where persons having business with him, in his magisterial capacity, are continually obliged to wait upon him; whether, recently, after midnight, a party composed of Captain Beckett and three military officers sought admission into the house of a lady in Athlone, and, being refused admission, one of the party threw an empty champagne bottle through the fanlight over the hall door, and another threw a large paving stone through one of the drawing-room windows, inflicting damage also in the interior, and, when the servants appeared, the party ran away, one of the fugitives leaving an officer's laced cap behind him; if some members of the local police force witnessed part of the occurrence, and whether any police report has been made; and, what steps will be taken to elicit the truth, and to vindicate the Law?

MR. TREVELYAN: Through the kindness of the officers of the Royal Artillery at Athlone, Captain Beckett, R.M., is an honorary member of their mess. It is not the case that he spends the greater part of his time at the barracks, or that persons having business with him are continually obliged to wait upon him there. The statement that Captain Beckett was in any way concerned in the disturbance referred to in the second paragraph of the Question is wholly without foundation. He did not even hear of it until some days later. It is not the case that any of the local police were present. When they heard of the matter it was reported; but, as the owner of the injured property refused to take any action, the divisional magistrate thought it a case rather for the military authorities to deal with than one for further police interference. He accordingly reported it to the Colonel commanding the 45th Regiment, to which the officers concerned belonged, and it is now before him.

MR. SEXTON: I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that steps were taken to induce the parties concerned from making any statement, and that money was offered to the servants to procure their silence?

MR. TREVELYAN: I cannot say anything about that.

NAVY—H.M.S. "GARNET"—THE
"GRENADA PEOPLE" NEWSPAPER.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether certain statements contained in The Echo of the 2nd May have come to the notice of the Admiralty, these statements being to the effect that a midshipman named Dynley, of the ship Garnet, accompanied by some sailors, went to office of the The Grenada People newspaper, and informed the editor that he and his comrades had obtained the permission of the commanding officer, Captain Montague, to destroy the office and presses of the newspaper, and that they would do so that evening; that threats to the same effect were used by several of the officers and men of the Garnet to some of the people of St. George's; that Captain Montague afterwards wrote a letter to the editor of The People, that he was prepared to horse-whip him for criticising the conduct of the Governor of Barbadoes, Sir William Robinson, and that, on the night of the 11th February, Mr. Dynley and two of the crew of the Garnet took the sign board of The People office; whether the Admiralty has received any information of the matters stated; and, if the statements are correct, what steps are intended to be taken?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Admiralty have received a letter from the editor of the newspaper in question complaining of the conduct of certain naval officers; and the letter has been sent to the Commander-in-Chief of the station, who will report upon the facts.

MR. SMALL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of the Colonial Office has been drawn to a statement contained in

The Grenada People and copied into The Echo of the 2nd May, that Captain Montague of the ship Garnet declared that he had at St. Vincent asked permission from Sir William Robinson, Governor of Barbadoes, to let his crew destroy the office of The Grenada People, and that Sir William Robinson had replied that he could not officially order but would be very glad indeed if it could be done; and, whether the Colonial Office will make inquiry into this statement?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: On the 29th of March we received a letter from a Mr. Donovan, who, I gather, is either editor or proprietor of the newspaper in question, making certain statements and inclosing a copy of his letter addressed to the Admiralty. We wrote to him pointing out that, in accordance with well-known Colonial regulations, he should forward his statements through the Governor, in order that the Governor may make any remarks he may think right. Pending any further inquiry, I may say, in justice to Sir William Robinson, that neither of Mr. Donovan's letters make the statement contained in the Question as to Sir William Robinson's reply to the alleged request of Captain Montague.

"NISERO."

MR. STOREY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is proposed to grant any allowance to the families of the captive crew of the Nisero?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I regret that there are no funds at the disposal of the Foreign Office to meet cases of this kind.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
GENERAL GORDON.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether General Gordon's Mission to the Soudan originated in an unsolicited offer of service from himself, or was undertaken at the special request of Her Majesty's Government; whether any, and what, assistance has been given to him by either the British or Egyptian authorities to carry out "the effective measures" indicated in the Commission appointing him Governor General of the Soudan; and, whether, in the face of a victorious and rapidly-spreading Revolution, he was expected to effect the withdrawal of the beleaguered garrisons, and—

“Establish an organized Government in the different provinces of the Soudan, for the maintenance of order, and the cessation of all disasters and incitement to revolt,” by his own moral influence alone?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The whole circumstances connected with General Gordon's mission are to be found in the Papers laid before Parliament. I wish to make an explanation in regard to the Paper, Egypt No. 15, distributed yesterday evening. As I stated on the 2nd of May, that Paper contains the telegrams from General Gordon, which are referred to in Sir Evelyn Baring's telegrams, Nos. 19 and 24 in Egypt No. 13. Those telegrams were received at the Foreign Office on April 28, by post, in two covering despatches, which stand Nos. 1 and 3 in Egypt No. 15. It has been the practice of the Foreign Office, in regard to such despatches, to lay them, with the dates attached to the telegrams which they represent; and hence it is that these two despatches are marked “received by telegraph April 16,” and “April 18,” instead of April 28, which was the date, as I have stated, of the actual receipt of the despatches by post.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: The noble Lord says these telegrams were received only when they came under despatches by post. Were they not received at the dates marked upon them?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Member mistakes me. What I said was that the telegrams from Sir Evelyn Baring were received on the 16th and 18th April, but that the despatch transmitting the full text of the telegrams was only received on April 28. It is usual, as the House is aware, in Foreign Office Papers, to mark despatches containing telegrams with the date of the telegrams which they represent, and not with the actual date of the receipt of the telegrams themselves.

MR. BOURKE: Are we to understand that these telegrams, although they were not received in text as printed, were received telegraphically from Sir Evelyn Baring on the 16th and 18th of April?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No; that is not quite it. The telegrams from Sir Evelyn Baring contained a summary of the telegrams from General Gordon, and those are already before Parliament. We have presented the full text as soon as we possibly could.

MR. BOURKE: Substantially the telegraphic messages received on the 16th were the same as those received on the 28th?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I did not use the word “substantially.” I will ask the right hon. Member to form his own opinion.

MR. M'COAN: In reference to the second paragraph of my Question, I have carefully read the Papers, and have found no mention made that any assistance has been given to General Gordon to carry out the “effective measures” indicated in the communication appointing him Governor General of the Soudan. Am I to understand from the noble Lord that no assistance has been given? Nothing is disclosed in the Papers. I have also failed to discover anything in answer to the third Question, whether he would be expected to carry out those important measures involving a good deal of risk and some military action by the aid of moral influence alone?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Member is inviting me to enter into a premature debate on the Papers.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What reply Her Majesty's Government made to the telegram of General Gordon, dated April 11th, in which the following passages occur:—

“You state your intention of not sending any relief up here or to Berber, and you refuse me Zebehr. I consider myself free to act according to circumstances. I shall hold on here as long as I can, and if I can suppress the rebellion I shall do so. If I cannot I shall retire to the Equator, and leave you indelible disgrace of abandoning the garrisons of Sennaar, Kassala, Berber, and Dongola, with the certainty that you will eventually be forced to smash up the Mahdi under great difficulties if you would retain peace in Europe?”

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Member will find the reply on page 15 of “Egypt No. 13.”

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware upon what General Gordon based the statement in his Proclamation of February 27th, that “British troops are now on their way, and in a few days will reach Khartoum?”

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government are not informed on what authority General Gordon made this statement.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any endeavour is being made to inform the Mahdi of the readiness of the Egyptian Government to evacuate the Soudan, and of the decision of Her Majesty's Government to recognize the independence of that country?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I would ask the noble Lord whether it is contemplated to take any such steps?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have answered the Question on the Paper.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then, Sir, I beg to give Notice that I will ask the Question on Thursday.

BURIALS — NONCONFORMIST BURIAL AT NEWTON, LANCASHIRE — REFUSAL TO ADMIT CORPSE INTO THE CHURCH.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a proceeding reported in The Liverpool Daily Post, of April 28th, which took place on the occasion of the burial of a Nonconformist named Goldsworthy, when the Vicar of St. Peter's, Newton, refused to allow the body to be carried into the Church, but directed it to be taken to the grave, where it was interred with the usual grave-side service; whether he will state if the action of the Vicar in refusing to admit the body of Mr. Goldsworthy into the Church was legal; and, whether he will cause inquiries to be made into all the circumstances of the case?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I must apologize to the hon. Member for not answering the Question. These are ecclesiastical matters of which I am not in charge.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Might I ask to whom I should address this Question? Who is responsible?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Either this transaction was contrary to the law or it was not. If it was according to the law, I do not think that my hon. Friend can apply to anybody; if it was contrary to the law, he can apply to the Courts of Law.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 119.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 1st May.]

[FIRST NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title of Act) agreed to.

Extension of the Household and Lodger Franchise.

Clause 2 (Uniform household and lodger franchise).

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 9, at beginning, to insert the words "Subject to the provisions of this Act hereinafter contained," said, that, whatever might be the opinion of individual Members of the House as to the merits of the Bill, there could not be the slightest doubt as to one question—namely, that it was extremely well drafted. No one could have the slightest doubt as to the meaning of the authors of the Bill. If hon. Members had had the experience he had had of seeing Bills drafted by the hands which he was quite sure had drawn up the present Bill they would know that the whole spirit of the Bill was to be found in the first three or four lines of the 2nd clause. If those three or four lines were practically passed right hon. Gentlemen opposite knew that the whole scheme of the Bill would be, in reality, confirmed. The object he had in moving to insert at the beginning of the clause the words "Subject to the provisions of this Act hereinafter contained," was simply to guard against its being said that if the first few lines of this clause were passed without some such words, when they came later on to the several Amendments that were to be found on the Paper, they might be told they were inconsistent with the first three lines of the Bill they had already passed; and by that means they might be shut out from modifying in any way whatever the principle inserted in the first three lines of the Bill. He looked upon this as a matter of very considerable importance. He was quite sure the Prime Minister did not wish to pass any part of the measure without its having received a full and fair consideration at the hands of the House; and he had no doubt, if the words he suggested were inserted, they would gain a very great point when they came to the beginning of the third line of the Bill—namely, “that a uniform household and lodger franchise at elections shall be established in all counties and boroughs throughout the United Kingdom.” The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would then have carried the main principle he desired to establish. He (Sir R. Assheton Cross) could not conceive any objection to the words he now proposed. If those words were not inserted he was afraid this would happen—that they would have to debate the clause at very much greater length than would otherwise be the case. At all events, if the interpretation he put upon the clause was a reliable one, and this Amendment were not inserted, the Committee might be shut out from considering many of the Amendments which were subsequently intended to be moved, and they would have no further opportunity of discussing them. He had no wish to take up the time of the Committee in arguing this point further; and he hoped the Government would at once meet him by stating that they had no objection to the insertion of these words. If the Prime Minister rose to say that he had any serious objection to the Amendment, then he was afraid he should be only more and more confirmed in the belief that the right hon. Gentleman did not desire that the Amendments later on the Paper should be thoroughly discussed. He proposed now, at the commencement of the clause, to insert the words he had placed on the paper—“Subject to the provisions of this Act hereinafter contained.” If those words were inserted, they would, no doubt, be able to discuss modifications of the first three lines as they went on; but if they were not inserted, then he was afraid they would have to discuss those three lines at much greater length than would otherwise be the case.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 9, at beginning, to insert “Subject to the provisions of this Act hereinafter contained.”—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. GLADSTONE: As far as I can make out, I am not aware that the adoption of the clause as it stands would exclude subsequent Amendments from the discussion of the Committee; but with respect to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman I must say that it appears to me to be open to serious objection. The right hon. Gentleman says that if the House should enact that a uniform household and lodger franchise at elections shall be established in all counties and boroughs throughout the United Kingdom it will be virtually establishing what is the principle of the Bill. No doubt that is so, and that is the principle for which we have contended through all the preliminary discussions, and which we have now to deal with in Committee. We do not believe, and we do not admit, that there ought to be any derogation from that principle. To establish a uniform household and lodger franchise at elections in all counties and boroughs is the very object for which the Bill is introduced. If, therefore, I should agree to insert the words “subject to the provisions of this Act hereinafter contained” I should distinctly convey by implication that the Government intend to derogate from the principle of the Bill. If there are to be derogations from the principle of the Bill, let us know what they are. We are totally ignorant of any derogation or departure that ought to be made from that principle. We have never for a moment either concealed or thrown into the shade the main and broad proposition contained in the Bill that it is our intention to establish a uniform household and lodger franchise in the counties and boroughs. That is the head and front of the offending of the Bill in the eyes of many hon. Members opposite; and it is the pith, and virtue, and credit of the Bill as it is understood on this side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman will see that his Amendment is distinctly a departure from the principle of the Bill. If we are expected to make Amendments in the subsequent clauses of the Bill, that will be virtually and tacitly a distinct departure from what we have always professed as the principle of the Bill itself; and, consequently, I am not able to agree to the Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: In order to save time, I may say that I have not entered fully into the effect of the words of the clause; but the Prime Minister has said frankly what it is. No doubt the clause does propose further Amendments in household and lodger franchise. It goes on to say—

"After the passing of this Act every man possessed of a household qualification or a lodger qualification shall, if the qualifying premises be situate in a county in England or Scotland, be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at an election for such county; and if the qualifying premises be situate in a county or borough in Ireland be entitled to be registered as a voter, and to vote at an election for such county or borough."

So that unless there is some modification not simply of the qualification of the voter, but also of the time that qualification is to come into operation, those questions will practically be settled by the first three lines. That is the proposition I lay before the House. Undoubtedly, Amendments as to when the Bill is to come into operation are of vital importance; and I, for one, am very doubtful, indeed, whether they can be introduced into the Act, unless some such words as "subject to the provisions of this Act hereinafter contained" are inserted at the commencement of the clause.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF desired to say a word or two on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman; and he wished to do so because he had hitherto abstained from discussing the Bill, and he had no desire to be included in the body of hon. Members on the other side of the House, who seemed to be prohibited from discussing it altogether. He wished to state, in regard to the clause and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, that he, as representing a very large constituency, entertained no objection to the equalization of the county and borough franchise. He might say that he himself had no fear of it; and he did not see why hon. Gentlemen sitting on that side of the House, and representing county constituencies, should have any fear of it. The principles by which Party tactics were guided permeated all classes; and he could not help thinking that the manner in which the franchise was exercised in the large boroughs proved that to be the case. As a matter of fact, the agricultural labourers were in the main Conservative; and he would venture to illustrate his position. In the last Parliament he represented a borough which was largely composed of agricultural labourers—namely, Christchurch; and although his Successor, as a Conservative candidate, was not successful, and although the borough returned a Liberal, yet the Liberalism of the hon. Member was, in some respects, of a subversive character; and, politics apart, he thought the hon. Member was an ornament and acquisition to the House. He would take three boroughs which were, to a great extent, assimilated to counties; and he thought those three boroughs carried out his proposition—that the county franchise, reduced to the proportions of the borough franchise, contained all the elements of Party that were desirable. The three boroughs to which he referred were the Rape of Bramber, forming the borough of Shoreham, East Retford, and Cricklade. It would be found that Shoreham sent two strong Conservatives, one of whom was a gentleman belonging to an old family very much associated with Conservatism, and with the representation of that particular constituency. East Retford, on the other hand, was represented by two Liberals; and the other borough—Cricklade—returned one and one, a Conservative and a Liberal. Therefore, it was perfectly plain that these three constituencies were equally divided; and it might be assumed that if the borough franchise were introduced into the counties generally the representation of the country would be divided just as it was at the present moment. He must say, from the experience he had gained of the Parliamentary borough of Christchurch, that the landed interest had much more to fear from the tenant farmers than from the agricultural labourers. Agricultural labourers invariably followed their landlords rather than their masters; and it appeared to him that the agricultural interest would be as equally safe in the hands of the labourers as it was in the hands of the tenant farmers. Another allegation made against the agricultural labourers was that they were not sufficiently educated. He himself thought that education generally followed the franchise, and after the borough franchise was lowered in 1867 the extensive system of education which was now in force was made law. But there was another point, and it constituted the reason why he called on the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to consider with more favour the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross). There was a very justifiable fear on that side of the House that it was the intention of the Government, or, at any rate, of their advanced supporters, to force on a Dissolution upon the Franchise Bill without a scheme of distribution. The desire of hon. Gentlemen opposite was, he was told, to drive away the present county Members sitting on that side of the House; and they hoped to be able to give effect to that desire by a Dissolution on the present Franchise Bill. As he had said, he doubted whether that could be carried out; but a Dissolution on the present Franchise Bill would create such great anomalies that he thought the Government should pause before they declined further to give some assurance that the anticipations of that side of the House, as to the intentions of the Government to dissolve on the Franchise Bill without a Redistribution Bill, were unfounded. Supposing for a moment that the Government were to dissolve on the Franchise Bill alone they would be creating greater anomalies than those which at present existed. [Cries of "Order!"] He thought he was quite in Order. They would be creating in the next Parliament not a Legislative Assembly, but a Constituent Assembly. By establishing a House of Commons elected upon a diminution of household suffrage without redistribution, they would elect a House of Commons that would be unable to undertake any legislative measure until a Redistribution Bill had been passed; and then it would be necessary to have a second Dissolution before the Redistribution Act could be applied to the work of Parliament. Therefore, on the hypothesis of not having a Redistribution Bill they would elect a Constituent Assembly, and not a Legislative Assembly. A Constituent Assembly ought to represent all interests; and, speaking not for the counties alone, but for the urban districts also, they would suffer still more if this Bill were passed without a Redistribution Bill. He would not detain the House long by giving illustrations; but he would point out what great anomalies would exist among the urban constituencies if they passed the present Bill without a Redistribution Bill, and by so doing double the electorate in the counties. At the present moment there were 42 boroughs with a population of less than 7,000 people, 30 with less than 5,000, 48 with less than 2,000, and altogether 230,000 returned 176 Members. On the other hand, there were 178 urban communities which were entirely unrepresented with a population of more than double that which he had mentioned, and which would, under this Bill, have a constituency of more than 500,000. Then would it be wise to pass a measure, without a Redistribution Bill, which would enable 176 Members to sit for comparatively small constituencies, while 178 communities with double the number of electors contained in these small boroughs would be thrown into the counties? How was it possible, under these circumstances, to get a fair Redistribution Bill? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would help them out of the difficulty, and give them some assurance that if this Bill were passed both by the House of Commons and by the other branch of the Legislature it would not be allowed to come into force until some scheme of redistribution was established. It was for this reason that he supported the Amendment, which would delay the practical operation of the Bill until the House had an opportunity of considering the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey). The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was, no doubt, at the head of a very powerful Party; but he was also the head of the Government of the country, and should be bound to take into consideration any reasonable arguments, if they were even brought forward by his opponents. He believed there were many hon. Members on that side of the House who were not opposed to a diminution of the franchise in itself, but who considered that no Reform Bill should be passed even to carry out the wishes of the Liberal Party unless, at the same time that the franchise was lowered, there was a large redistribution of seats.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not wish to detain the Committee except to answer the appeal of the hon. Gentleman, who asks for an assurance that the present Bill, if passed into law, should not come into operation until a Redistribution Bill has also been passed. Now, it is certainly, in my opinion, a most unreasonable pledge to ask of the Government that the franchise should not come into operation until the enactment of a Redistribution Bill, because if such a compromise were made it is impossible to say what redistribution might be passed. It might be possible for persons to object to the Redistribution Bill, and by preventing it from being passed they might wreck the fortunes of the Franchise Bill also. I, therefore, think that this is a demand which ought not to be made upon Her Majesty's Government. Short of that I go entirely with the hon. Gentleman. The Government admit that it is desirable, and even in a certain sense urgent, that a Redistribution Bill should be passed. We have announced our full intention, as far as it depends upon us, that an effort shall be made to pass a proper Redistribution Bill before the Dissolution of the present Parliament shall arrive in the natural course of events. Well it seems to me that that is all that can be fairly asked of the Government. We go a great way to meet the hon. Gentleman; but I will not undertake to say that the whole labour of the House upon the Franchise Bill should be lost until there is further legislation in reference to the redistribution of seats, because I hold that the Franchise Bill itself is a good Bill, although perfection may not be obtained, or anything like perfection until a Redistribution Bill is passed. As to the precise moment when this Bill is to come into operation I never said anything that would tend to make that a sine quid non as to the provisions of the Bill. That is a matter which will naturally arise after the consideration of the first line of the clause.

MR. WARTON said, he supported the Amendment, from which the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) and the Prime Minister, in the observations they had made, had wandered. He would venture respectfully to suggest the great importance of the words proposed to be inserted. He felt fully the force of what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench—that these words were of the greatest consequence; and he trusted that earnest and persevering efforts would be made to have them inserted in the clause. He wanted the House to start fair in discussing the Bill in Committee. He thought nothing could be more unsatisfactory to the House than for hon. Members to be satisfied with an assurance given by the Government, and then to find that the Chairman of Ways and Means, in the conscientious discharge of his duties, was unable to give effect to that assurance. The way in which the House was treated not only in Committees of this kind, but upon the Estimates, was often productive of disappointment and difficulty. An assurance was given that a full opportunity would be afforded for discussing a particular matter afterwards; and then the Chairman, in the conscientious discharge of his duties, was compelled to take a proper view of an Amendment, and to rule out of Order a great number of points which, strictly speaking, were out of Order, but which the House had been led to believe, by an assurance given by some Minister in the course of the debate, would be discussed. He was not at all satisfied with what the Prime Minister had stated. The right hon. Gentleman told the Committee that he had looked over the Amendments. It was very kind of the right hon. Gentleman if he had done so; but the right hon. Gentleman was under the impression, having looked over them, that they could be discussed, in due course, without the insertion of the pre-fatory words moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross). But was the Prime Minister sure that the Committee would not be called upon to deal with Amendments besides those already on the Paper? If that were so, they might find themselves met, later on, by this argument—"I never foresaw these Amendments at all; I saw those which had been placed upon the Paper, and thought they might be discussed; but these raise entirely fresh matters." The consequence might be that, long before they get the Bill through Committee, one Member of the Government would rise up after another and tell hon. Members that it would not be in Order to discuss the questions they were anxious to raise. He contended that these words were necessary, because, without desiring to use harsh words, it seemed to him that it almost became an artifice to put in a Bill words that required consideration, and then to tell hon. Members afterwards—"You have passed those words. The whole spirit of the Bill is framed upon them, and all your arguments are inconsistent, and, therefore, out of Order."

Mr. Gladstone

The Chairman would be required to rule conscientiously that the Amendments were inconsistent, and that was the reason why he (Mr. Warton) wished to secure the insertion of these very proper precautionary words. He thought the clause had been drafted, so to speak, in a manner to deceive the House. The very phrase "uniform" was misleading in itself. The very construction of the clause was wrong, and they ought to have had household franchise in a clause separate altogether from any clause relating to lodger franchise. The effect of passing the very first line of the present clause would be that the Committee would be committed to the main principle of the Bill in consequence of passing two or three at the commencement of it without their importance being sufficiently impressed upon the Committee. He said this in a friendly spirit towards the Prime Minister. He confessed that he was not often animated by such a spirit; but he did say in a friendly spirit on this occasion that the right hon. Gentleman would save his own time and the time of the House if he would consent to the insertion of these words. It was his deliberate belief that such a course would very much tend to save the time of the House, and no one could doubt that the course proposed was a prudent one. If it were not assented to, the Committee would be compelled to dwell at very great length on every word of the clause, because every word in the clause would be then of the utmost importance; whereas if they were not to be absolutely binding they would be of less importance. Without they were to be taken as binding, it would be the duty of the Committee to discuss them with great completeness. He hoped the Prime Minister would, at the outset of the proceedings of the Committee, feel that it was always the best policy to treat his opponents with full consideration, and that it was not the best course to make vague promises which he could not keep, and to tell the House that future Amendments might be discussed, when the Chairman would be compelled to say that most of them were altogether irregular. He presumed that the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, in the discharge of his duties, would properly rule that several of the Amendments already upon the Paper were not in regular form, and, therefore, could not be discussed, and that, in point of fact, they were beyond the principles of the Bill. If that were done, hon. Members who had been misled by the Prime Minister could only get up and say that the right hon. Gentleman had promised to discuss them. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman had given the Committee a vague and general assurance that they might be discussed; but it was because he (Mr. Warton) had found from experience that such assurances generally betrayed those who accepted them, that he considered it would be better to insert words in the clause which would set the matter entirely at rest. Such a course would be far better than relying upon any promise whatever; and, therefore, he would say once more in the most friendly spirit that he thought it would be better for the Prime Minister to consent to the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that, so far from thinking the Prime Minister wrong in refusing to extend the power of putting down Amendments, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had not limited it still more. It appeared to him, from what had already transpired, that there was an intention on the other side of the House to make second reading speeches in order to obstruct the passing of the Bill. He had simply risen to state why he should vote against the Amendment, and against every Amendment on the Paper, except clerical ones on both sides. He was for the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill. Speaking as an advanced Radical, he was sorry that the Bill had not been made wider in its scope than it had been. He thought that many persons might have been given votes who had not been given them, and that others who were still left with more than one vote might have more than the one vote taken away. But the Prime Minister had never said that the Bill was perfection. The Prime Minister had simply submitted the Bill. At the last General Election the country distinctly endorsed the issue whether there should be an equalization of the county and borough franchise. That was the basis of the present Bill, and it was upon that basis they ought to vote. For his own part, he was ready to declare that he would not look into the merits or demerits of the Bill; but, in regard to the Amendments which had been put upon the

[First Night.]

Paper, he should vote against every single one of them. As far as the Bill was concerned, he put himself entirely in the hands of the Prime Minister, on the understanding, of course, that the right hon. Gentleman did not, either from good nature or any other cause, yield one iota to Gentlemen on the other side of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman did that, he would promise to vote with him, against every single Amendment, whether proposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, or by hon. Gentlemen on the Liberal side of the House.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the hon. Gentleman had promulgated some sentiments which, no doubt, would be approved by the Treasury Bench; but it would be very unfortunate and very unusual if hon. Members were to endorse the principle that no Amendments were to be allowed in any Government Bill, even although it might be a Franchise Bill. The reply he had expected on the part of the Government to the Amendment of his right hon. Friend was that they looked upon it simply as a qualifying Amendment, which would render it competent for hon. Members to bring forward subsequent Amendments, and give facilities for putting such Amendments in order, having regard to the context of the Bill. What they had a right to expect, and what the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister ought to have informed them, was that the Government would not raise the technical objection that for want of these qualifying words such Amendments could not be put from the Chair. Everyone knew that the words proposed to be introduced by his right hon. Friend were simply the common phrases of the draftsman of a Government Bill. It was seldom that a Bill was drawn without those qualifying words being introduced into it, and which they could not reasonably object to. There were, however, no such qualifying words on this occasion, because, as far as the Bill was drawn, it proposed and anticipated no qualifying paragraph or provision to interfere with the simple construction of the words of the clause. But the question was, whether the absence of these words was to be pleaded in bar of subsequent Amendments? If the Government would tell the House that they did not propose to take that technical objection, and would say that subsequent Amendments might be discussed without these words being inserted—that, in point of fact, hon. Members would not be precluded from urging that all the Amendments which appeared on the Paper, together with others which might be suggested, might with propriety be inserted in the Bill—if the Committee agreed to adopt them then, he thought hon. Members on that side of the House would be satisfied. He did not intend to follow his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) into the discussion which he had initiated, and which, probably, might more fitly be considered a question for second reading. The Prime Minister, however, had taken no objection to it himself, but had followed in the same strain. He would only say this—that his hon. Friend scarcely expressed, with accuracy, the position which many of the county Members took in regard to the Bill. Their point was that they would be voting for the Bill in the dark, unless they knew what steps would be taken hereafter to continue that distinction between the county and borough representation which in the most solemn manner the Prime Minister had announced his intention to perpetuate. They did not dispute the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to do so; but what they doubted was his power. They said that if the Bill was passed in the shape in which it now stood it might not be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to carry out that pledge. That was their fear and their anticipation. They had no fear that the extension of the suffrage in the counties would produce any mischief, provided the relations between the county and borough representation, and the separate existence of the areas now familiar to all of them, could be by some means or other preserved and maintained.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, that, with all respect to his right hon. Friend, he thought his observations were not well founded, and that the insertion of these words was not necessary in order to admit Amendments into the Bill, although they undoubtedly would prevent the introduction of Amendments which were not within its scope. Reference had been made to an Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey), and the whole of the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Ports-month had been directed to the question of redistribution. Now, whether the Amendment under consideration was adopted or not, the discussion of an Amendment such as that which stood in the name of the hon. Member for South Northumberland would not be precluded, for it amounted simply to this—that the Act should not come into operation as soon as it received the Royal Assent, but upon a given contingency. It was a very common thing in Acts of Parliament to fix the date when the Act should come into operation; and it was only another form of fixing the date to say, as the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Northumberland said, that the Bill should not come into operation before a certain event. It did not require the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite in order to admit such an Amendment as that; but, of course, it would not be competent to introduce any Amendment which, at the present moment, was beyond the scope of the Bill. He, therefore, opposed the Amendment, because he could see no advantage that could be derived from its insertion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition would excuse him, as one of the county Members whose constituents would be affected by the Bill, if he asked the Attorney General what this uniformity meant as to houses and as to lodgings, seeing that there was no uniformity already existing or established by law in the United Kingdom. Uniformity implied a standard, although there was no rental value attached as descriptive of the house or of the lodging. Was he to understand that the Irish standard of a lodging and of the Irish standard of a house was to be applied as a qualifying test to houses and to lodgings in the Metropolis and in England generally? He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would see that this was an important question. Until in an evil hour the late Mr. Disraeli, while still a Member of the House of Commons, advised the House to adopt household qualification without any rental standard, which meant the mere possession of a house without specifying what the house was to be in value, there had been an intelligible qualification. The lodging qualification was adopted in haste, in the absence of any adequate discussion upon an Amendment proposed by Mr. Kirkman Hodgson in 1867. The sudden adoption of household suffrage with no definition of the value of the house, together with the sudden adoption of the lodger franchise, with no proper definition of what was to constitute a proper and an adequate lodging, was the "leap in the dark" which was then taken. It gave to the Act a name, which it had never since lost; and when he saw the Committee about to take "another leap in the dark" in respect to uniformity of franchise between the counties and boroughs, he thought he was entitled to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he took the lowest standard of a house and the lowest standard of a lodging, which lowest standard existed in Ireland; and whether he proposed, under cover of the words contained in the clause, to extend the franchise under this lowest standard to the counties of England and Scotland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he ventured to hope that the Committee would be allowed to adhere to the clause as it stood. The matter stood in this way. The right hon. Gentleman opposite desired to insert the words "subject to the provisions of this Act hereinafter contained." But the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that without those words any Amendment could be moved upon the 1st clause unless it were absolutely to negative a clause which had already been passed. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman said he wished to have these words inserted because he wished to alter the words "after the passing of this Act." But the right hon. Gentleman had power already to move any Amendment upon those words, or to leave them out altogether if he desired.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that what he had said was that if the clause were passed with those words "after the passing of this Act" in it, it would shut out any Amendment as to the Act coming into operation at any other time; and he had mentioned as an instance the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that no consideration of that kind would arise on the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Northumberland. The Government could not accept the Amendment; and when the clause was agreed to, the only effect would be that it would prevent the consideration of succeeding Amendments that were contradictory to it. He thought the Government were entitled to know the character of the subsequent Amendments which arose out of this one, because, unless they did so, an Amendment upon the principle of the Bill might be moved such as might cause the measure to be given up. What the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) virtually asked was that the Government should not adhere to the clause after it was passed if subsequent Amendments were proposed in it. If the Committee did not insert these words the first two lines of the clause would run—

"A uniform household and lodger franchise at elections shall be established in all counties and boroughs throughout the United Kingdom."

He was ready to admit that if they passed those two lines they could not afterwards move anything that would be contradictory to them; but they did not intend to move anything that was to be contradictory to them—namely, that there was to be a uniform household and lodger franchise in all counties and boroughs throughout the United Kingdom. Hon. Members on the other side of the House did not object to that principle; but, as far as he could see, there was no Amendment on the Paper which could be moved now without the insertion of those words. The right hon. Gentleman, from his point of view, desired that there might be power hereafter to move Amendments that might be contrary to the principle contained in the first two lines of the clause. As he had pointed out, those who had supported the first two lines were entitled to know what Amendments were going to be moved before they gave any implied promise of the kind, because, if the Government assented to these words being placed in front of the clause, they would admit that they were necessary, and they would certainly leave a door open for Amendments of which nothing was at present known. They could not, without knowing what Amendments were intended to be moved, take any course which would imply an approval of subsequent Amendments contrary to the principle of the Bill. That was the whole reason why the Government could not accept these words.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to him to have entirely mistaken the nature of the case. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the Government did not wish to commit themselves now to the acceptance of any Amendments which would induce the belief that they intended to accept any subsequent Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman went on to say, almost in the same breath, that the Government would be leaving the door open to the subsequent acceptance of Amendments. Now, those two things were very different. He could perfectly well understand the Government declining to perform any act of any kind that would be held by the Committee to bind them to the subsequent acceptance of any Amendment, specific or otherwise; but the hon. and learned Gentleman went far beyond that when he asked the Committee to support him in practically closing the door against subsequent Amendments, without those Amendments having been fully considered by the Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman talked about any Amendment being now in Order which was not inconsistent with the principle of a uniform household and lodger franchise. He (Mr. J. Lowther) had himself an Amendment of the character referred to, which he had not yet put upon the Paper, because he did not wish to anticipate the action of the House prematurely in supposing that they would go as far in regard to the Bill as to reach the Committee stage at all. But, now the House had gone into Committee, he should, of course, in accordance with the understanding he had entered into with the House on the second reading, place on the Paper an Amendment, which he certainly thought was inconsistent with the principle of a uniform household and lodger franchise, in so far as he intended to propose that the representation should be apportioned to the voters in relative proportion to taxation, and that the old Constitutional doctrine, to which he had referred on the second reading—namely, that taxation and representation should proceed pari passu, should receive fair consideration. The hon. and learned Gentleman had put him on one side with great coolness, and told him that he must speak now or for ever after hold his peace. He was perfectly willing, if the Committee wished it, to give them even now some of the reasons for desiring them to adopt the course to which he had referred; but he thought that it would be far more in accordance with the general practice of the House, and also he thought more convenient to the Committee, if he were to defer the making of those observations until he had drafted his Amendment, or proposed a new clause, distinctly raising that issue. The Government apparently wished now to adopt the curious process suggested by the Attorney General of closing the door to any suggestions or Amendments, owing to the fear of the hon. and learned Gentleman that if they left it open they might allow a doubt to remain on any score. He wished to know if the Prime Minister deliberately accepted the statement that had been made, and whether he had finally made up his mind to close the door against any Amendments which did not happen to fit in with preconceived ideas, and which were to take effect in Clause 2? He would certainly accept the Prime Minister's statement in preference to the apparent qualification of it which his own Legal Adviser suggested he intended to make. What was the effect of the decision at which the Government had arrived? It was this. They were told that on Clause 2 they were to debate every conceivable Amendment or suggestion any hon. Member might desire to propound at any subsequent stage of their proceedings. Was that a course calculated to save time? Reference had been made to the important proposal of the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey); but they were told in substance by the Attorney General that the discussion upon that proposal must be raised on Clause 2, or not at all. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James): I never said so.] He (Mr. J. Lowther) was glad that he had misunderstood the hon. and learned Gentleman, because he thought it was an error which was generally shared by the Committee. He was glad that he had been mistaken, for the very candid complacency with which the Prime Minister had received his remarks had certainly led him to fear that there was some such idea in his mind. He was glad to find that if there had been it had been given up.

What was the objection to the words proposed by his right hon. Friend? His right hon. Friend simply proposed to carry out what it was now evident were the intentions of the Government. The Government apparently, after the disclaimer just interjected, did not desire to tie the hands of the Committee in order to prevent them from considering subsequent Amendments upon their merits. That being the case, he was at a loss to understand what objection there could be to the acceptance of these words. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) deprecated the making of vague speeches or second reading speeches, as he called them. Certainly, the speech of the hon. Member was not vague, although whether it might not more appropriately be delivered on the second reading was a matter he would not now go into. He would only say that he did not wish his own few remarks to be either vague, or to partake of the character of second reading speeches. He wished it to be understood that his point was simply this—that the Committee should be placed in a position by the Government to deal with any subsequent Amendment which might be ruled by the Chair to be legitimately in Order, and which might be put for the acceptance of the Committee. On the other hand, the Government wished to preclude the Committee from going into subjects which they had a perfect right to deal with. He hoped the Government would make it clear what the interpretation was which was placed upon the clause. From what the Prime Minister had stated, it might be inferred that, unless his right hon. Friend's words were accepted, it would be impossible to move Amendments if the clause were agreed to; but the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had given some reason to hope that he (Mr. J. Lowther) was mistaken.

MR. GLADSTONE: I really did think that the position was perfectly clear to all hon. Members who are acquainted with the character of the proceedings of the House in Committee. The Committee have not yet been permitted to consider what are to be the enactments of the clause. When the Committee are allowed to come to the words of the clause they will reject them, or will modify them, or will adopt them as they think fit; but what we are now dealing with is a preliminary Motion, which goes to provide that after we have considered them, after we have rejected, modified, or adopted them, there should be no result from our action at all; but that the clause should be still liable to be reversed on subsequent consideration. It is really a question whether a preliminary Motion of this kind is, by anticipation, to nullify—not to stereotype anything that has happened—but to nullify the work we are about to do. The right hon. Gentleman complains that the Government are endeavouring to shut the door. Whenever we adopt any proposal in Committee, we shut out something else; and the right hon. Gentleman asks us now to accompany our conclusion by saying that we may accept something else.

SIR JOHN HAY wished to put a question to the hon. and learned Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman, in the remarks he had made just now, had omitted the word "lodger." He had spoken of a uniform household suffrage as being necessary; but the word "lodger" had been omitted. The word was in the Bill itself, but there was no provision for a uniform lodger franchise; and he confessed he viewed with some dismay the effect which the proposal might produce in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would be aware that the provision for Scotland was different from what it was for Ireland and England; and it appeared to him (Sir John Hay) that to pass the clause as it stood now, and to extend to the Scotch counties a lodger franchise in the Scotch boroughs, would open the door to all the evils which had been so strongly repudiated in regard to fagot votes in Scotland. He would ask every Scotch Member if he did not agree with him [that if the present proposal really amounted to the extension of the lodger franchise in the Scotch boroughs to the counties all the evils of fagot voting would be again re-established in Scotland? He had noticed that the hon. and learned Attorney General had omitted, in the course of his remarks, the word "lodger." He had no doubt that it was by accident, but it was omitted in two or three instances; and instead of quoting the lodger clause the hon. and learned Gentleman only went as far as the household franchise. He was, therefore, desirous of ascertaining whether there was to be any change in the lodger franchise, or whether it was to be uniform both in regard to counties and boroughs. He awaited the answer with some interest.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that if he had omitted the word "lodger" the omission was altogether unintentional. The Prime Minister had mentioned it over and over again, and ample opportunities would be afforded for discussing the lodger question in connection with the point referred to by the right hon. Gentleman even if the words of this Amendment were not inserted in the clause.

MR. SALT said, he thought the Amendment which had been moved by his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire was necessary, having regard to the Bill itself. There was one point upon which he wished to ask for a definition. In Clause 7, upon page 3 of the Bill, a definition of the household and lodger qualification and other franchises, together with the application relating thereto, was given. Well, the definition of lodger and household qualification was taken from certain Acts relating to England, Scotland, and Ireland, which differed in each case. He did not know whether he was mistaken; but he wished to know whether it would not be necessary to insert some qualifying words in order to explain the word "uniform?" The Amendment of his right hon. Friend was merely a technical one, which would not take five minutes to discuss, seeing that its object was simply to make the Bill intelligible and complete. He certainly thought that the Amendment was necessary, unless the lodger franchise, in all parts of the United Kingdom, was made absolutely identical.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that even from the point raised by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) the insertion of these words was altogether unnecessary.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he had entertained the hope that the Government would have accepted the Amendment; and he could not help feeling a suspicion that there was some reason for refusing to accept it. It was idle for the Prime Minister to say that anything contained in the words of the Amendment would virtually anticipate concessions. The words themselves were nothing but pure matter of formality, and it would be perfectly easy to insert them and leave the franchise as it was. There could be no reason why this simple and harmless Amendment should not be accepted by the Government in order, at any rate, to prevent hereafter any doubt arising as to whether any particular Amendment would be in Order or not. Surely, the Prime Minister had got at his back sufficient strength and numbers to enable him to feel sure as to what he could do in regard to the Bill; and the least that could be expected of him was a generous action in order to prevent the possibility of any doubt arising whether an Amendment could be moved or not. The Amendment itself consisted of plain and simple words which were usually put in in the drafting of a Bill. If the Committee were to discuss the Bill with temper and in a spirit of conciliation, it was highly desirable that an Amendment so simple and harmless as this should be accepted by Her Majesty's Government.

MR. GREGORY said, he also supported the Amendment, and wished to point out that, as the Bill was at present drawn, the provisions of one clause were contradictory to those of another, and unless full opportunity were afforded for the insertion of subsequent Amendments there would be great doubt as to the position in which the counties would be placed.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, a statement had been made that the Bill, as far it went, made no provision for giving effect to a uniform lodger franchise. The Committee certainly expected an answer to that statement; and when they came to the words "lodger franchise" it would be a proper time for inserting any qualifying words to meet the case which had been mentioned by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wigtown (Sir John Hay). Inconveniences would immediately arise, because they would have passed words declaring that a uniform household and lodger franchise should be established, without establishing any machinery for enabling lodgers to come upon the Register. As he understood the Attorney General, some words might be inserted qualifying the uniformity of the lodger franchise. But, surely, that would be a most inconvenient and most indecorous course, because the clause would have to run somewhat in this way—"A uniform household and a quasi-uniform lodger franchise at elections shall be established in all counties and boroughs throughout the United Kingdom." Surely, it would be a far better course to adopt the words of the Amendment of his right hon. Friend, which were not unusual in Acts of Parliament. The present discussion would then cease, and the Committee would proceed to the consideration of the rest of the clause.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON wished to put a Question to the Chairman upon a point of Order. His hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had pointed out that the wording of Clause 6 was inconsistent with that of the present clause. The words of the present clause were—

"A uniform household and lodger franchise at elections shall be established in all counties throughout the United Kingdom."

Clause 6 modified that provision, and specified that the definition of household and lodger franchise should be in accordance with enactments upon those questions concerning the Three Kingdoms. He wished to ask the Chairman whether the 6th clause would be in Order, seeing that it materially modified the words and meaning of the clause now under discussion? Certainly, if Clause 6 were not out of Order, it would be competent for hon. Members to move Amendments modifying the provisions of Clause 2.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) wished to say, on the point of Order, that Clause 6 had no reference whatever to uniformity of franchise, but simply enacted that—

"A man shall not by virtue of this Act be entitled to be registered as a voter or to vote at any election for a county in respect of the occupation of any dwelling-house, lodgings, land, or tenement, situate in a borough."

As there was nothing in a county which enabled a man to vote for a borough, so, also, it was provided that no voter should vote for a county in respect of occupation of property in a borough.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had intended to refer to Clause 7, and not to Clause 6.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD asked the Chairman if he adopted the definition of uniformity implied by the Attorney General, because the whole discussion would turn upon what was uniform within the meaning of the clause?

THE CHAIRMAN: With regard to the hypothetical case put to me by the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), I can only say that the question would be one for the Committee to decide, and not for the Chair.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had only put it in reference to the power of moving Amendments.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not a point of Order, but a matter for the Committee itself to decide. It is not a point of Order at all.

MR. WARTON said, he was anxious to know what the Committee were really doing? The insertion of the words moved by the right hon. Gentleman was a matter of the highest importance. The Bill had been drafted in a clumsy manner, and the Government were now pursuing a course which could only result in the packing together of ideas that ought to be kept perfectly distinct. In his opinion, there ought to be a separate clause for household franchise and another for lodger franchise. It could not be imagined that both household and lodger franchise were uniform. There seemed to him to be an anxiety to draft the Bill so that it would upset the real meaning of the English language and make things absolutely unintelligible. Every hon. Member knew that household and lodger franchise were not uniform, but were based on different considerations and different qualifications. There appeared to be a wish on the part of the Government to deceive the Committee as to their object, and to introduce words into the clause without any proper consideration of their meaning, using their mechanical majority to enforce anything and everything. It was very clumsy drafting indeed to introduce the word "uniform" into the clause at all, because there was no such thing in existence as uniform household and lodger franchise. The household and lodger franchise were not uniform, and were not intended to be uniform. What was intended was that there should be some uniformity between household franchise in boroughs and counties and between lodger franchise in boroughs and counties; but to speak of a uniform household and lodger franchise was perfectly ridiculous, and the Judges hereafter would be very much puzzled to know what was meant by the expression "uniform household and lodger franchise." The difficulty resulted entirely from a bad habit of bringing proposals together in concentrated language, and in comparing things that ought to be kept perfectly distinct. It was very easy to see that the Committee were starting on this long and protracted inquiry with a disposition on the part of the Government to drive the Bill through, by means of their mechanical majority, at a pace which Members on that side of the House would not stand. He was glad to see the Lord Advocate in his place, and he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would be prepared to answer the Question which had been put by the right hon. and gallant Member for Wigton (Sir John Hay).

MR. GORST said, he did not agree with the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) that there was any great danger of the Bill being driven through the House at an improper speed, seeing that they had already been engaged for an hour in discussing an Amendment which the Attorney General told them was of no practical importance or necessity whatever. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport would be aware that they had been discussing an Amendment which was not yet before them, and which he had no doubt they would discuss when the proper time arrived. He quite agreed with and endorsed the opinion which had been given by the Attorney General and the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) that the Amendment was of no practical importance or necessity. The clauses of an Act of Parliament were always to be read with reference to one another, and whatever was passed subsequently would be taken into consideration by the Judges, who would interpret the Act by reading the whole of its provisions together. If the Committee were satisfied that these words were not necessary, was it worth while to put the House to the trouble of dividing upon them? If, however, there was a desire to take the sense of the Committee upon these words, why not go to a Division at once, and then, when they had decided the not very important question now before them, they would be able with greater advantage to enter upon the more important subjects which were involved in subsequent Amendments? That would be a more business-like mode of proceeding. He desired that the Bill should be properly considered, but in a business-like fashion. They had now discussed the present Amendment for a long time, and he wished them to settle it at once.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he had not intended to address the Committee on this Amendment; indeed, he thought they were about to divide when his noble Friend rose to put a Question to the Chair. But he could not allow the remark, that the matter was confessedly of little importance, to pass without contradiction. It was not confessedly of little importance. But the question was, whether, by allowing the language of the Bill to remain as it then stood, discussion upon some points might not afterwards be burked? It might be that some hon. Members thought that the only principle affirmed by the Bill was that there should be an extension of the franchise. If the clause were drawn in the ordinary form, and not, as it appeared to him, with settled care to prevent discussion hereafter, it would not have been necessary to raise this question; but it was because it had not been so drawn that an attempt was made to obtain a ruling from the Chair. There appeared reason to apprehend that Amendments might be ruled out of Order, not because they were inconsistent with the principle of the Bill—the Prime Minister knew that—but because they were inconsistent with the word “uniform,” whatever it might mean. Some hon. Members, while willing that the lodger franchise should be extended to the counties, believed that it would be necessary to adopt machinery proper to that particular franchise; but they feared that the moment the word “uniform” became part of the clause it would render any modification impossible. But for the ruling of the Chair, it might have been argued that, inasmuch as the word “uniform” had been passed, no Amendment that interfered with the supposed uniformity was admissible. Had it been clear from the first that the Committee would be allowed to discuss Amendments interfering with the uniformity of the subject, then he agreed that the Amendment of his right hon. Friend might have been unnecessary; but it was because they thought it was otherwise the Amendment had been proposed.

MR. CUBITT said, he inferred, from the remarks made just now by the Prime Minister to his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) to the effect that the lodger franchise was the very essence of the Bill, that he could not hope for the right hon. Gentleman's support to the Amendment he was about to move, which was to leave out from the first line of Clause 2 the word “uniform.” But, whatever the Government might consider to be the essence of the Bill, he believed the Prime Minister would concede that the House, in consenting to its second reading, did not go any further than this—that they agreed to establish a household franchise in counties similar to that existing in boroughs. Therefore, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would deem it a fair subject for consideration whether that household franchise in counties and boroughs should be necessarily absolutely uniform. Before the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832 there was an absolute and positive separation between the county and the borough franchises; the county franchise being simply an owner's franchise, and the borough franchise being simply an occupation franchise, the qualification in both cases having been originally very low. But the Act of 1832, with regard to boroughs, established a £10 occupation franchise; but with regard to the county franchise a much more serious step was taken. The Government included in it another qualification, which he might call a sort of hybrid modification between the freeholder and occupier; they proposed to include copyholders and leaseholders in the county franchise. The Chandos Clause provided that tenants at £50 a-year should be included in the county franchise. From the moment the occupation franchise was extended to counties—from that day there had been constant proposals to lower the franchise. From £50, which was the franchise of the Act of 1832, they had gone to the present franchise fixed by the Act of 1867 at a £12 rating, and now we are asked to have arrived at a franchise of £10. It is interesting to think how far we are in matters of this kind.

change had taken place since his Friend and former Colleague (Mr. Briscoe) was returned to that House. That Gentleman had described to him the manner in which his first election was conducted. He said that all the freeholders of the county of Surrey went down to vote at Guildford; that they went there in postchaises; that two only could travel in a chaise, and that they drank only port. The cost of all that came out of his hon. Friend's pocket; and the story of his election would show how rapidly they had since travelled, and though they had levelled many mountains and filled up many chasms, he feared they might now reach an arid plain on which there was neither water nor shade. If the Bill passed in its present form, the question must soon arise whether they had not reached such a degree of uniformity between the county and the borough franchise as would make it impossible to maintain the distinction that was left? It seemed to him that the lodger and service franchise had been unnecessarily introduced into the counties for the purpose of keeping up this uniformity. The experiment of the lodger franchise had, as he believed he could show, been from one point of view a complete failure. Was it, then, necessary to take these two franchises into the counties? And if they were introduced, could they put a stop to freeholders in boroughs voting for the county? But these questions imported a difficulty already alluded to. They must not look at this Bill alone as about to pass into law; they must remember that there was a larger Bill behind it. However, he asked, what was to be the position of freeholders in boroughs under the Bill? As the Committee would know, certain places in the Kingdom were called counties of cities, in some of which—not in all—freeholders had the right of voting for the county. They were Lichfield, Bristol, Exeter, Norwich, Nottingham, Haverfordwest, and Berwick-on-Tweed. East Stafford, with a population of 138,439, and an electorate of 11,728, included four boroughs—Lichfield, Tamworth, Walsall, and Wednesbury—in respect of which, and putting aside for one moment how many of these would be disfranchised by the Redistribution Bill, there would be this anomaly, that the freemen of three of the boroughs would continue to vote for the county, while the freeholders of Lichfield would vote for the city. Again, under the Bill, Bristol and West Gloucester would have an identical franchise, the only difference between the constituencies being that a certain number of freemen would continue to vote for the city and none for the county. He believed the Committee would see that the distinction between the county and borough franchises could not be maintained if the Bill became law. Bearing in mind what the Prime Minister had just told them was the essence of the Bill, some would say this was a step towards the establishment of electoral districts. ["Hear, hear!"] An hon. Gentleman below the Gangway cheered that statement; but he could assure him that this was not the opinion of the Prime Minister nor of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, as would appear from what they had stated in that House. The right hon. Gentleman, when he introduced the Bill, said—

"I am not personally at all favourable to what is called the system of electoral districts, or to the adoption of any pure population scale. I cannot pretend to have the fear and horror which some people have with regard to the consequences of electoral districts. My objection is a very simple and would be a practical one. In the first place, electoral districts would involve a great deal of unnecessary displacement and disturbance of traditions, which, I think, you ought to respect. But my second objection is—and I regard it as a very important one—that I do not believe that public opinion at all requires it, and I doubt whether it would warrant it. Next, I should say that in a sound measure of redistribution the distinction between town and country, known to electoral law as borough and shire, ought to be maintained. Although our franchise is nearly identical, that is not the question. The question is, whether there is not in pursuits and associations, and in social circumstances, a difference between town and country, between borough and shire, which it is expedient, becoming, and useful to maintain?"—(3 Hansard, [285] 129.)

Such was the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman when he introduced the Bill; and it likewise received the assent of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, who, on the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, expressed himself thus—

"Speaking for myself, I may say that if I believed this Franchise Bill was introduced merely to prepare the way for a reconstruction which would involve the destruction of the separate political existence of all but the largest cities and counties, and the division of political power between the inhabitants of the great cities and the rural populations scattered over areas of great extent—if I believed this, and that an attempt was to be made to introduce some uniform system, such as that of equal electoral districts, then I should not be prepared to support this Bill."

Now, comparing these statements of the Prime Minister and the noble Marquess with what he had endeavoured to show—namely, the almost complete identity of franchise contained in the Bill—it seemed to him that they were coming to electoral districts of wide area and sparse population in counties, and of small area and dense population in boroughs. Then they had this, that the amount of representation would vary as the distance from the seat of Government. He thought this was a fair description of the proposal of the Bill, and that the distinction between the county and borough in future would have no other existence than in their old historic names. He came now to the question as to whether it was necessary to include a lodger franchise in the Bill in order to get uniformity. He believed he should be able to show that the lodger franchise, as he had already stated, would be a failure. But, first of all, a word or two as to the Party bearing of the matter. As far as he knew, nothing had been proved definitely as to the Party character of the lodger franchise; but, wherever it had been exercised, it had probably gone to increase the majority rather than to alter the opinion of the constituency.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY rose to Order. He asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was in Order in the observations he was then making with respect to the lodger franchise?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he was not prepared to rule that the right hon. Gentleman was out of Order.

MR. CUBITT: The lodger franchise came before the House originally as one of those fancy franchises, many of which, the Prime Minister in his speech said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had killed with a phrase; but it had been so favoured, that the right hon. Gentleman included it as an occupation franchise under the new borough franchise. It was proposed, in 1859, by Mr. Disraeli, and it had been proposed in various Reform Bills brought before the House and generally received with favour; the discussions which took place upon it were not as to whether the lodger franchise should be allowed, but as to the restrictions to be placed upon it, and as to how the claims under it were to be made. Mr. Disraeli, on the second reading of Lord John Russell's Reform Bill of 1860, spoke with favour of the lodger franchise, which was not included in it. In the same year, Sir George Lewis said—

"The persons in lodging-houses who would obtain the franchise would belong mostly to the working classes—persons flitting about from one place to another, and less fitted, in many respects, for the exercise of the franchise than householders subject to residence and paying rates."—[3 Hansard, [157] 2180.]

So the question of the lodger franchise went on, until Mr. Disraeli introduced it, in 1867, with the words—"There is no doubt a wish on both sides to establish this franchise." In that year, the lodger franchise was established without any debate as to principle, but simply upon debated Amendments. He (Mr. Cubitt) asked the Committee to consider what the result of that franchise had been, and he thought it would rather startle some hon. Members to hear that in the whole of the borough constituencies of England, which contained more than 1,500,000 electors, there were only 29,918 lodgers on the Register. In Scotland, according to the Return of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold), there were 323 lodgers; 173 in Glasgow, out of 63,716 electors; and 50 in Edinburgh, where there was an electorate of 28,931. In Ireland, there were 1,213 lodgers, 1,082 of whom were in Dublin, where there were 13,580 electors. Returning to the lodger franchise in England, he found what he believed would create surprise—that was to say, that of the 21,918 lodgers on the Register, nearly 16,000, or three-fourths of the entire number, were in the Metropolitan districts; and in looking through the Returns relating to the other great towns he found that the number of lodgers on the Register was almost ridiculous, as would be seen by the following table:—

|---------------|-----|----------|--------|-----------|
| Liverpool .. | 379 | Lodgers, | 63,436 | Electors. |
| Manchester .. | 116 | " | 52,831 | " |
| Leeds .. | 120 | " | 50,676 | " |
| Birmingham .. | 72 | " | 63,221 | " |

In the other towns, with the exception of Devonport, where there were 430

[First Night.]

lodgers and an electorate of 5,421, the number of lodgers did not reach 200. The largest number of lodgers on the Register in the Metropolitan area were in Westminster, and he thought he could give a good reason why the franchise had been chiefly exercised there. In 1865 there took place a great Party conflict in the City of Westminster, and it was the duty of the political associations to put as many lodgers on the Register as possible. The lodger franchise was, in short, an agent's franchise, and it was almost impossible for a lodger to get on the Register without the assistance of a political agent. The Prime Minister, on the 12th of March, 1866, in introducing his Reform Bill, said—

"Now, I can give no information, and I believe that the right hon. Gentleman was unable to give any in 1859, as to the number of persons who would, perhaps, be enfranchised under the title of lodgers; but this I may say, that, in the first place, my firm belief is that it will be a small one; and, in the second place, my firm belief likewise is that this what I now speak of is a middle class rather than a lower class enfranchisement. The operation of claiming, and of claiming too, year by year, is one that must be very burdensome to working men; whereas young men, such as clerks and men of business, familiar with the use of pen and ink, if educated and intelligent persons, and desirous of obtaining the franchise, will estimate the trouble far more lightly. We calculate, therefore, on a certain amount of middle class enfranchisement by the provision I have described; but I should be misleading the House were I to pretend to entertain the opinion that any large number of the working class, or any very large number even of the middle class, will come upon the Register by virtue of that which we term a lodger franchise."—(3 Hansard, [182] 47-8.)

That was the opinion of the Prime Minister in 1866, and an examination of the Return of the hon. Member for Salford would show that, to a certain extent, it was a correct opinion. He repeated that the lodger franchise was an agent's franchise. It had been fenced round with many restrictions, which made the exercise of it exceedingly difficult. There were extant no less than five forms of claim in connection with it—namely, a new lodger form of claim and declaration; an old lodger form of claim and declaration; a form for new and old lodger as joint tenants; and a form for successive occupation. Those forms required the signature of the claimant and the signature of a witness, which in itself had been a great incentive to forgery, and a good deal had gone on in connection with the lodger franchise, which had at last been the cause of Parliamentary interference. The Committee would remember the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act of 1870 which was brought in by Mr. Martin, the then Member for Cambridge, and supported by the right hon. Gentleman the present Head of the Local Government Board. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee; and hence arose the difficulty that very little record remained of what was said at the time—the debates on the clauses of the Bill were not reported. However, the Act dealt with the lodger franchise, and it contained a penal clause with regard to lodgers which it was important the Committee should bear in mind, as throwing considerable light on the working of this franchise. The clause inflicted fine and imprisonment for not exceeding one year for making false claims. Now, Parliament had always been unwilling to enact franchise penalties without grave consideration; and therefore it would be clear to the Committee, from this clause having found its way into the Statute Book, that the lodger franchise was open to some grave drawbacks. Were it not so, the provision in the Act he was quoting would not have been passed; although he might add that since that event took place the evils in connection with lodger franchise claims had not been cured. The registration, as a matter of fact, came on at a time of the year when nearly all the Members of that House were taking their holidays, and thus the reports of what occurred in the Registration Courts did not come before them. If they did, hon. Members would see that the time of the Revising Barristers was taken up with the settlement of fraudulent lodger claims. One or two cases had also been before the Police Courts, and a conviction had taken place at the Central Criminal Court. And yet such a point had been reached that they were asked to look upon the lodger franchise as a model franchise. Again, they had heard a great deal of the redistribution of seats which was to follow the passing of this Bill; but they had not heard much about the third Bill which the Prime Minister announced, and it was that Bill to which he now desired to direct the attention of the Committee. In his introduction of the present measure the

"Sir," said the right hon. Gentleman, "as to registration, all I will say is this—that our Bill is framed with the intention of preparing a state of things in which the whole occupation franchise, which, I believe, will be about five-sixths of the franchise, shall be a self-acting franchise, and the labour, anxiety, and expense connected with proof of title, which is, after all, according to our view, an affair of the public and the State rather than of the individual, will, I trust, be got rid of. But, at the same time, our Bill is not a complete Bill in that vital respect, and we look to the introduction of another Bill for the purpose; with this we shall be prepared immediately when the House has supplied us with the basis on which it wishes us to proceed."—(3 Hansard, [285] 124.)

Now, he would ask the Prime Minister, or the Attorney General, how it was proposed to make the lodger and service franchise a self-acting franchise? If no answer could be returned to that question, he thought they were entitled to ask why the Bill in its present form had been placed on the Table? He had consulted many agents and Gentlemen in that House upon the subject, and they had failed to tell him how this franchise could be made self-acting. He would refer to Clause 9 of the Bill, to which attention had been called on the second reading, and which, in his opinion, was of importance inasmuch as it showed, so to speak, which way the wind was blowing. The clause was, in part, as follows:—

"In Scotland, Section fifteen of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, shall apply to counties as well as burghs, and in the application thereof the word 'tenant' shall include any inhabitant occupier within the meaning of this Act, and it shall be the duty of every person rated in respect of any lands and heritages which comprise any dwelling-house when applied to by the assessor to give an accurate written list of the names and designations of all men other than himself, being inhabitant occupiers of any dwelling-house forming part of such lands and heritages, and if he fail to do so he shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and the proviso in Section two of the Act for the Valuations of Lands and Heritages in Scotland, passed in the Session of the seventeenth and eighteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, Chapter ninety-one, shall be repealed."

And the clause subsequently provided, with regard to England and Ireland, that—

or rateable as aforesaid, makes default in furnishing the list so required to be furnished by him, such overseer or person shall on summary conviction be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

Now, if it were necessary to introduce the new penalties provided in that clause, he thought it not unfair to say that under the so-called self-acting Registration Bill there would be many summonses before the Police Magistrates, and that, instead of subscriptions to Registration Societies, there would be penalties for misdemeanours. He would make no apology for having detained the Committee at length upon this important question, because he considered it necessary that it should be discussed fully before the Bill passed into law. In conclusion, he would ask Her Majesty's Government how they could arrive at uniformity of franchise in boroughs and counties without making absolute the identity between them, and whether they did not propose to introduce the lodger and service franchises into counties for the simple purpose of enabling them to establish electoral districts?

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, leave out "uniform."—(Mr. Cubitt.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman is quite correct in stating that this question is one of considerable importance, and that I have described it as the essence of the Bill. I appreciate, then, the importance of the Amendment, the adoption of which would alter the Bill in its very essence. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that because the Amendment is important it was necessary to handle it at very considerable length. ["Oh!"] That is what he himself said. But I do believe, although the Amendment is important, that the considerations connected with it are of a simple character. I decline to go into the question of the 9th clause of the Bill, for it is a most inconvenient method of dealing with a Bill to discuss any clause other than that with which the Amendment may deal. I think the right hon. Gentleman has stated his case very fairly, and he has not at all disguised the feeling in his mind that an error was committed when the occupation franchise was introduced in 1832, and which was found to work in such a way that a large extension of that franchise was made in 1867. Having done so much, we have a large number of persons who are not included in the occupation franchise of the counties. Yet we have included them in the boroughs, and have had experience of their capacity to exercise the franchise with benefit to the country. The question now is, whether, having admitted the principle of the occupation franchise, having subsequently extended it, having reached a point at which a gross anomaly exists, and there being no suspicion of unfitness attaching to the parties, we can stop there? We think not. There is, I think, a great mistake pervading the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman. I agree with him in desiring to maintain the distinction between shire and borough in our representative system; but I think he is wrong in supposing that that distinction rests mainly upon distinctions of franchise. He puts this question at the close of his speech—"Will you, after establishing a uniform occupation franchise in boroughs and towns, be able to maintain any distinction between the franchise in counties and the franchise in boroughs?" In the first place, I see no reason why that distinction should not be maintained. Looking at the spirit of this country and of this Parliament, it appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman is scarcely justified in his remarks as to the rapidity with which changes of this kind go forward. I regard the period of 20 years that has passed as one of probation, and I say, on the contrary, that these changes were adopted very deliberately and after full experience. But I do not see any reason to believe that a uniform occupation franchise would destroy the distinction between counties and boroughs, which rests upon the property qualification in counties. But, even if you did so, still, I say, you would not destroy of necessity the distinction between borough and shire, because it does not rest so much on what disqualifies a man as on the man himself. It is in the difference of pursuits and habits of life, the different conditions on which property is held, the differences between class and class, upon which, in my opinion, the distinction rests, more than upon any artificial conditions created by the Legislature, and I know not why these should not be for a long time, or permanently, maintained as the distinction between counties and boroughs in our representative system. We are dealing with two classes of people whom we are going to enfranchise. We are dealing with the artisans now scattered over the counties who form the bulk of our borough constituencies, and with whose exercise of their power you are satisfied. We have also, as has been observed by the hon. Member for Portsmouth to-day, had quite sufficient test and specimen of the action of the peasantry under the present Parliamentary franchise to know that we are perfectly safe in their emancipation. And I must say there are questions connected with the condition of the rural labouring population, such as have recently been discussed by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), with regard to which I may say that if it be not a blot, yet it is a defect, in our representative system that those persons have not a larger influence than they have in this House for the representation of their peculiar interests. The lodgers in the Metropolis and in other great towns are mainly of the labouring class. In the counties they will consist in a much larger proportion of persons not belonging to the labouring class, but to a class whose feelings are much more associated with the Party opposite in political principles than they are with the feelings of those who sit on these Benches; and, therefore, it is rather hard that objection to the extension of the lodger franchise should come from Gentlemen opposite. This matter lies really at the root of the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman had shown there was some modification of uniformity which it is desirable to introduce there would have been something to argue about. But he has not attempted to do anything of the kind. He has met us with objections of the most vague and general kind—objections which go against the occupation franchise in counties root and branch. His speech, if he will allow me to say so, was a speech against the fundamental provisions of the Bill; and, certainly, I do not think that any of those who have voted for the Bill in its previous stages will be inclined to admit the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. DAWSON said, he wished to point out that the lodger franchise was of great importance in Ireland, where the artizans chiefly resided in lodgings. It was desirable, if the lodger franchise were extended over the whole of Ireland, that the provisions with regard to it should be the same as in England. In England the lodger franchise could be obtained by written application; whereas, in Ireland, personal application was required, which had prevented many persons desirous of exercising the franchise being placed on the Register. There would be considerable disappointment in Ireland unless that assimilation took place, and he trusted that the Prime Minister would see that the obstruction he had mentioned was removed.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to suppose that under this Bill there would be instituted uniformity of franchise, and it was with some regret that he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) heard the same term used by the Attorney General. He thought that some error might be avoided if during those discussions they did not speak of uniformity of franchise, because the Bill proposed nothing of the sort. When this Bill passed there would be four different franchises in the boroughs and seven in the counties, and he thought that state of things ought to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman. Although he was strongly in favour of uniformity of franchise, after the appeal of the Prime Minister he did not intend to propose any Amendment of that character. The reference of the right hon. Gentleman to the lodger franchise, taken in connection with his remarks on registration, pointed out that the remedy for the failure of the lodger franchise was to be found in an alteration in the Law of Registration. He hoped these words would be retained by the Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the present consideration of this measure showed how completely the Committee were inconvenienced by the absence of any statement by the Government as to the mode in which they intended to proceed in regard to redistribution. His right hon. Friend objected to this uniformity in counties, and regarded that as a necessary step to electoral districts; but the Prime Minister differed from that altogether, and the right hon. Gentleman made an essential distinction between shire and borough. But that essential difference existed, according to the right hon. Gentleman, in the very nature of the men who dwelt in shire and borough. In the counties there were men brought up under different conditions, and who constituted a separate body from the borough electors. That might be true if they could find a county which was essentially rural; but the right hon. Gentleman had said that a great number of places would under the operation of this Bill become virtually urban districts, and they knew it would be so. It, therefore, came to this—that the right hon. Gentlemen said he wished to maintain this distinction between county and borough, and that the only mode of preserving that distinction was by preserving a distinction between the character of the constituencies of the counties and boroughs. With respect to the question of the lodger franchise, the Prime Minister had assured them that it would not be the working classes who would come in, in the counties, under the lodger franchise. But the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) said he sincerely trusted that the lodger franchise would be extended to the counties in Ireland, because that would bring upon the Register a great number of artizans and labourers in Ireland. Then they had an hon. Gentleman opposite, one of the foremost supporters of the extension of this measure to Ireland, assigning opposite reasons to arrive at the same conclusion. The Prime Minister took no note of the important point submitted by his right hon. Friend, who asked how were the lodgers under this Bill to be brought on the Register? To that question the right hon. Gentleman gave no answer, or, at best, it was a negative answer—namely, that the point was to be considered under Clause 9. Clause 9 was a clause of penalties, and it was material that the Committee should not in a hasty manner assent to something in Clause 2 which might result in the imposition of serious penalties under Clause 9. Therefore, from that point of view alone, he thought his right hon. Friend had done well to call attention now to the very important question of how the lodgers were to be brought upon the Register in the counties; and he was sorry he had not received any explanation on the part of the Government.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the answer was that that question did not properly arise under this clause, and the Government would be perfectly ready to deal with it when it arose. But he might state now that the county lodgers would be put on the Register in the same way as in boroughs. The number of lodgers in counties was very small.

MR. DAWSON asked whether lodgers in Ireland would come on the Register in the same way as lodgers in England?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE replied, that that would be arranged afterwards.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it appeared from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that very few lodgers would come in for the franchise, because they would come on the Register in the same way in counties as in boroughs; but his right hon. Friend had shown that in respect to the generality of boroughs very few lodgers had hitherto come on the Register.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the Government had not at all explained the necessity of the word "uniform." According to the Prime Minister it was not part of the scheme that the franchise in the county and borough should be uniform. There were different classes of franchise existing; but why was it necessary that the Committee should pledge themselves, before they had considered how the lodger franchise and the other franchises were to work in the counties to which they had not yet been applied, by the word "uniform" to identity between county and borough? That seemed to him to be taking an unnecessary step in the direction of electoral districts, which it was said the Government did not propose to advocate, and with respect to which they felt great difficulty, because they heard such different views from different Gentlemen, and because the Bill before them did not disclose the whole scheme. They wanted to know why this word "uniform" was put in, in order that they might feel sure that it meant something?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that in respect to the household franchise and the lodger franchise, the Government did intend to make the Bill uniform. Therefore, it was a question of enactment, and as they proceeded they should enact what they meant.

MR. SALT said, there was a point which he wished to raise distinctly now, and which he should be sorry to leave unnoticed. This word "uniform" was to a very great extent the essence of the Bill itself, and no doubt it was extremely captivating to many hon. Members. It was an idea put forward with much plausibility, and not without reason, that as a householder in one constituency had a vote, a householder in another constituency should also have a vote; and that was the simple meaning of the Bill as it stood. With regard to what the Committee were now discussing, the words under consideration were not uniform franchise in a general sense, but uniform household franchise. The point he wished to raise, and which had not been raised in the present discussion, was this—and it was a point of principle which he thought should not be lost sight of—this Bill was brought forward as a very complete Bill to do one thing—namely to establish uniform household franchise, and that had frequently been said to be the cause of the popularity and the strong support which the Bill had received; but, if that was so, why during the last 50 years in which Reforms Bills had been discussed, had there never been a uniform lodger franchise proposed? He thought there was a reason for this. He asked himself the reason why all the statesmen who had brought forward Bills on the responsibility of the Government on former occasions, had for years maintained a marked difference between the household franchise in the boroughs and in the counties? For this reason. It was because they wanted to create a variety of constituencies and a variety of representation. The effect of this Bill was not merely to create a uniform franchise throughout the country, but to create a uniform household franchise without bringing forward any means by which the variety of constituencies and of representation might be maintained. He believed that to be a matter of the greatest importance. To illustrate what he meant he would take some other franchise than the household or the lodger franchise. They might have taken a uniform household franchise of £25; but everybody would have said, very truly, that would be absurd and monstrous; but it was just as absurd and monstrous to create a uniform franchise in one way as in another. That seemed to him to be the fault of the Bill, not that it did not do what it professed to do, but that it did it without replacing a system which had always been supported by statesmen who had dealt with the question of the franchise. Then they were told that the variety of constituents would be retained by the variety of inhabitants living in the country and in the towns; but as the Bill at present stood a large number of the inhabitants in the counties would be swamped by town constituencies. As soon as they came to mere household franchise they not only created uniformity, but they also destroyed one of the main things upon which it was now said they were to depend for a variety of representation. His main difficulty about this Bill was that it did not replace that essential diversity between the household franchise in the counties and in the boroughs. Then they were also told, with considerable truth, that the individual in the county had as legal a claim to the franchise as the individual in the town. What they had to consider was how they could get a better representation returned to the House of Commons.

MR. GORST said, the Amendment was, no doubt, one of great importance; but he wished if possible to elicit a little more information with regard to it. The Prime Minister had said truly that this word "uniform" was necessary, because uniformity was the essence of the Bill. It was perfectly clear that the Government proposed a uniform franchise in counties and in boroughs. Uniformity applied to the household and the lodger claim, only it did not touch any other franchise. The Government proposed, then, that the household and lodger franchise should be uniform in counties and boroughs—that was, that all the incidents of the household franchise in the counties should apply to the boroughs, and all the incidents of the franchise in the boroughs should apply to the counties. He quite understood that; but then the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have some alternative scheme which at present he did not understand. The right hon. Gentleman and those who supported him appeared to dissent from the idea of uniformity in the county and the borough; but then they did not state what the alternative scheme was which they would propose. He had listened carefully to the speeches in support of the Amendment; but he had not been able to arrive at an understanding of what was proposed by it. Until he heard some clearer definition of what the Amendment was to lead to, he should be inclined to prefer the more simple plan of the Government. This Amendment went to the vitality of the Bill, and those who were not prepared to accept the simple scheme of the Government ought at least to state what they meant to do.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he did not know what the proposal of his hon. Friends might be; but his proposition was to get rid of the Bill altogether, for a more objectionable Bill it had never been his misfortune to see. This was the first time he had addressed the House upon this Bill; but he had addressed the House on several other Reform Bills, which were all as unpopular as this was. The Prime Minister had told them that this Amendment went to the root and principle of the measure, and he supported the Bill upon the idea that it was necessary to extend the operation of the existing franchise. He should like to ask the Prime Minister how long that had been his idea, and how it was that it was only now that he had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to bring in such a Bill, and how it was that he allowed the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) to come down last year with a proposal—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the right hon. Member that the question before the Committee is the retention of the word "uniform."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, last year the proposal of the hon. Member for Salford was for uniformity of suffrage; but the House was counted out, as there were not 40 Members present. He thought it was quite germane to the subject to ask the Prime Minister why he was so indifferent last year, and yet this year he made this Bill the principal measure of the Session? At a meeting held not long ago, the Attorney General said there was such a thing as a policy of incidence, and that led to this Bill being made the principal measure of the Session; and he would adopt the language of the hon. and learned Gentleman. With regard to this question of unifor-munity, having had some experience in this House, he would venture to say that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for War were the last men in this House who should propose any such policy, because, during past years, they had been entirely opposed to such a policy. The Prime Minister had stated the other day that when he was a Member of the Peelite Party, that Party was a pure and high-minded Party. He was very sorry that the right hon. Gentleman should have left that Party—

MR. DAWSON rose to Order, and asked whether uniformity of franchise, or uniformity of conduct on the part of the Prime Minister, was the question before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is wandering from the question.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that if the hon. Gentleman thought that those who supported uniformity were not pure and high-minded, he was entitled to hold that opinion; but his point was, that when the Prime Minister was a Member of the Peelite Party he was opposed to uniformity of franchise. He had a seat in this House in 1859, and then a Bill was brought in by the Conservative Party proposing uniformity of franchise; but the present Prime Minister opposed it, and he not only spoke against it, but he turned the Government out upon it. So did all the Members of the old Whig Party and the Members of the Peelite Party. Lord Cardwell, who represented the Peelite Party on that occasion, said the proposal would lead to electoral districts. So it was held by Lord Russell and Lord Palmerston. The present Prime Minister voted against the Bill; and now, without giving any reasons whatever, he had leapt from one side to the other, and introduced this measure. Passing from that point, his principal desire was to state his objections to the introduction of the word "uniform" in this clause. His first point was that it must necessarily lead to electoral districts. The moment there was uniformity of franchise on one side, how could they say they would not give electoral districts? He had higher authority than the Government for that view. In a speech delivered in this House upon a Bill for establishing uniformity of suffrage, Lord Russell, that celebrated Member of the Liberal Party, said—

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

"The principle of the Bill is only an argument and a step to further change. It will clearly lead to electoral districts, for you have taken away that which is the greatest impediment to the country in regard to electoral districts—the difference between county and borough. I believe the principle of the Bill will lead to such discontent that the only remedy for the evil you have inflicted and the mischief you have done will be to resort to electoral districts, which I consider a total suppression of the existing representative system."

The proposal of Lord John Russell, when Leader of the House, was not one of uniformity, but diversity, of suffrage. Nor was that the principle proposed in the unfortunate Bill known as the "leap in the dark," which was carried in 1867, and which he had opposed as strongly as any measure he had ever opposed. On the contrary, it was kept back as a species of reserve to be sprung upon the House in a time of political exigency. In regard to equal electoral districts, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, in a speech he had delivered some years ago, stated to his present constituents the reasons why he refused to give his vote to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The Attorney General said if this franchise were conceded—that was, uniformity of suffrage—numerical representation was the certain consequence. The distinction between county and borough must be removed, and equal electoral districts must follow. He would like to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman, if he still adhered to that opinion, and if he believed that uniformity of suffrage must lead to equal electoral districts, why did he not go below the Gangway and endeavour to induce the Government to adopt that view? The hon. and learned Gentleman had declared that he was quite willing to surrender the representation of the borough of Taunton whenever he was called upon to do so by the necessities of the case and for the sake of patriotism. It would appear that he had already done so, because it would be seen from the newspapers that the hon. and learned Gentleman was a candidate for another constituency. His (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck's) objection to the Bill was that it must lead to universal suffrage. He recollected a speech delivered some years ago by an authority, whom the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would respect, on this very question of uniformity of suffrage—namely, the late

Mr. Sidney Herbert. In opposing the principle of that measure very strongly, Mr. Sidney Herbert said that it was only the question of the turn of the screw. Whenever they got one point of the screw turned on they found they had to go to a lower point. The Prime Minister founded the principle of uniformity, not only in his opening speech, but in the speech which he had made a short time ago, on the question of the fitness of the capable citizen to exercise the franchise. The right hon. Gentleman said that if the capable citizen was fit to exercise the franchise in one district he was fit to exercise it in another. He should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman where the definition of capable citizenship was to begin and where it was to end? Was it to be what was called a household?—for many of them knew that many of these voters were not householders at all, but merely occupants of a single room, which, under certain conditions, gave them a vote. Why were such persons to be entitled to a vote, and other persons who were far more entitled to be excluded? Why were domestic servants disallowed a vote? They were going to bring in a service franchise in regard to the occupation of tenements in a certain way. Why were domestic servants to be excluded? Were they not flesh and blood, and quite as capable of exercising the franchise as the agricultural labourer, who, they were told, was in such a deplorable condition? Then, again, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman, why exclude the soldiers in our Army, who served the country well; or our gallant sailors? It came at once to this—the question of capability founded itself on such a state of absurdity that it was impossible to arrive at any logical principle in regard to it. In his opinion, electoral districts must follow universal suffrage, a state of things which was no doubt desired by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, because he saw that on a recent occasion, when haranguing a Radical Club at Chelsea, the right hon. Gentleman said that he not only advocated universal suffrage, but equal electoral districts. They all knew that those opinions were supported by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and by a large number of hon. Members opposite, including the hon. Member for Northampton

(Mr. Labouchere), who had said as much that day, and by a considerable number of Members who sat below the Gangway on that side of the House. There was no finality and no standpoint whatever. By adopting this measure they would at once be landed, as Lord John Russell told them, in a sea of troubles, and it would be impossible to bring them into a safe harbour. It was upon logical grounds that he supported the Amendment of his right hon. Friend, and he trusted that it would receive such support from hon. Members as would fully justify him in having it brought forward.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, it did not seem to him to be an expedient course to take a Division on this question, because it really was the whole Bill over again. Now, nobody was more opposed than he was to household suffrage either in counties or boroughs. He thought the Bill of 1867 was about as mischievous a Bill as was ever passed in that House; but, at the same time, it had become the law of the land, and he did not wonder that an attempt was now made to extend its provisions to the counties. The present measure was to follow out the real bond fide intention of that Bill, which was to make a raid upon the seats of the county Members, and, to use slang phraseology, was intended to “square” the borough Members who sat on the other side of the House in order to enable them to go back to their constituents unchanged. It was a sort of Kilmainham Compact, that would leave the seats of hon. Members opposite untouched at least for another Parliament, if they would help the Government in carrying death and destruction into the ranks of the county Members. He was not surprised that that should be the principle of the Bill, because the strength of the Liberal Party had always been with the Members who represented the boroughs; and if there was one thing that hon. Members shrank from more than another it was political annihilation. They knew very well that there were many Members sitting in that House, who, if their own special seats were taken away from them, would never sit again for any other constituency as long as they lived. Therefore, if the Government proceeded on the principle they were adopting in regard to this Bill, and promised a uniformity of representation without a redistribution of seats the hon. Members to whom he referred might be able to go down to their constituents for a year, or two years, on exactly the same constituency as now, and it was a boon for which they were ready to sacrifice everything else. That was the whole object of the Bill. The object of the Bill was to make an attack upon the seats of the county Members who sat on the Conservative side of the House. It virtually said—"You have already got two seats out of three;" and if there was another General Election this year, as he hoped there would be, instead of having two out of three, they would have three out of four. They would virtually keep the borough seats as they were, and prevent the winning back of a great many seats which were lost by the Conservatives in 1880. That being the object of the Bill, how could they carry it out except by retaining the word "uniform?" The whole Bill would be destroyed if that word were left out. After the Division which had taken place upon the second reading, and the important Division which had taken place as to the reconstruction and distribution of the suffrage, he thought it would be an unwise proceeding to waste the time of the House by dividing upon this particular word. They all knew the object of the Bill, which was to secure the borough Members in their seats and to get rid of the county Gentlemen who sat on the Conservative side of the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I think there is a great deal in what has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Knarborough (Mr. T. Collins) as to the real object of the Bill. There can be no doubt that there is great force in those observations, and also in the remarks which have been made by other hon. Members, that a uniform household and lodger franchise is the point which has been pressed upon us by the Government, and which may be regarded as the principle of the Bill. Therefore, to discuss that point now would be to invite a repetition of the decision which the House has already pronounced. But, for all that, I think the discussion raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Cubitt) has been a very desirable discussion in drawing attention to certain important points relating to the question. I wish to ask, however, why it is necessary for the Government to commit themselves to this word "uniform" at the very outset? Why do you not leave any possibility of making different arrangements, if they should be necessary, for those classes of voters who would require somewhat different terms in the case of counties and in the case of boroughs? My right hon. Friend has pointed out with great force that the question arises in a great measure upon the lodger franchise. If you are going to enfranchise all the lodgers in the country, you will find that the difficulties which already beset you in connection with the voting of the lodger in the towns will be extensively multiplied and increased. I wish to know if we are to hold ourselves precluded by the introduction of the word "uniform" in the fore-front of the Bill from considering and discussing modifications which may be necessary with a view to the introduction of the lodger franchise in the counties? My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) asks what can be proposed against it? What my right hon. Friend says is that we are promised a self-acting register, and it would be very desirable that there should be a self-acting register if we can see the plans of the Government beforehand; but, in the absence of those plans, it would be difficult to come to a decision in regard to the position of the lodger in the county. That is one of the points in regard to the Government scheme which makes it difficult for us to decide upon it. We do not wish to commit ourselves upon one or two matters of an important character, which hereafter we may find to be governed by other considerations. I would not advise my right hon. Friend to go to a Division. What seems to me to be the feeling generally entertained is that he should reserve what he has to suggest in regard to the lodger franchise until a later period—that he should rest satisfied with the good service he has done in entering his protest and in raising this discussion, and that we should accept these words with the understanding that the question may be fairly raised again in regard to household and lodger franchise, notwithstanding that we may have committed ourselves by assenting to the word "uniform." It seems that the word "uniform" has been put in in order to do away with the semblance of a distinction between the counties and boroughs

—perhaps unnecessarily put in—and, therefore, leading to the conclusion that my right hon. Friend has done good service by the course he has taken in calling attention to the matter; but, as I have already said, I would not advise him to go to a Division.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I am anxious that there should be no misunderstanding. The Government intend by the Bill that as far as household and lodger franchise are concerned to establish uniformity in reference to both the boroughs and counties; but they have not the slightest desire to shut out any fair Amendment which can be moved in accordance with the Rules of the House. I hope there will be no misunderstanding as to the intention of the Government not to deviate in the slightest degree from the meaning which they attach to these words.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) would excuse him, as one of the county Members who were to be affected by the Bill, if he asked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General what his uniformity meant? Was it houses, or was it lodgings, with regard to which uniformity was to extend according to law throughout the United Kingdom? At the present moment uniformity implied a standard, although there was no rental value attached either to the house or to the lodging. Was it intended that, in future, the standard should be taken at the lowest—for instance, the Irish standard of lodgings and the Irish standard of houses? Was that standard to be applied as the qualifying test to houses and lodgings in the Metropolis and in every other part of England? Until, in a fatal hour, Mr. Disraeli, when he was a Member of the House of Commons, advised the extension of the household standard, which merely meant the possession of a house without specifying what the house was to be, matters were well understood. The lodger standard seemed to have been adopted in haste, and there was no adequate discussion upon it. It was adopted upon an Amendment proposed by Mr. Hodgkinson, in 1867; and the sudden adoption of household suffrage with no definition of the value of the house, together with the sudden adoption of the lodger franchise with no definition of what properly constituted adequate lodgings, constituted the “leap in the dark” which was taken in 1867. It gave the Act of 1867 a name which it had never lost. And now, when he saw the Committee about to take another leap in the dark in respect to the counties in which the majority of the people lived who would be affected by the present Bill, he thought he was entitled to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General whether he took the lowest standard of a house and the lowest standard of a lodging, which lowest standard existed in Ireland, and whether he proposed, under the cover of the words which appeared in the clause, to extend that lowest franchise to the counties of England and Scotland?

MR. WARTON said, he did not know whether he would be in Order in referring to a statement made by the President of the Local Government Board in answer to the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson). It would be in the recollection of the Committee that the hon. Member asked the right hon. Gentleman a question as to registration—Whether it was not the case, that while the voter in Great Britain would not exercise his vote until he was registered, in Ireland the voter would do so as soon as he was entitled to be registered? From the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman he did not think he could have read the clause they were now considering, because it certainly made a curious distinction between the votes to be obtained under the clause and now. It seemed to him to be one of the numerous traps which were provided for hon. Members in the clause, because they were told that whereas in Great Britain the right to vote was to be obtained, the vote was not to be exercised until the voter was registered. The words were “when registered to vote at an election for such county;” whereas, in regard to Ireland, the words “when registered” were not used; but, instead of them there were the words “shall be entitled to be registered as a voter.” He presumed that it was, in point of fact, a certain price paid to hon. Members below the Gangway, that the Irish voters should be able to exercise their votes before the rest of the electors could exercise theirs. Under the clause a voter in Ireland would exercise the vote when he was entitled to exercise it; whereas, in England, he could only exercise it when registered.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. Member had been discussing words which came later on in the clause.

MR. WARTON: Quite true.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would be quite ready to explain the meaning of the words when the Committee reached them; but he would only say now that the hon. Member had misunderstood their purport. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had also misinterpreted the meaning of the clause, because he assumed that the franchise in Ireland would be of a different description from that in England, which was not the fact.

MR. NEWDEGATE begged the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. He had assumed that it was the same franchise, but applied to a different class of tenements.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the Lord Advocate had not answered his question with reference to the Scotch lodger franchise, and he wished to point out that the words in the 2nd clause were different from the expression which had been used by the Attorney General. The 2nd clause established a uniform household and lodger franchise throughout the United Kingdom, and provided that it should be identical in character in the counties and boroughs of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. If that was clearly the meaning of the Government he was prepared to accept it; but it was scarcely the meaning of the words inserted in the first line of the clause, from which it appeared quite evident that there was a difference at present existing between the lodger franchise of Scotland, England, and Wales. There were, in fact, three kinds of lodger franchise and one of household franchise in the Three Kingdoms, and, as there was a difference now, they could not be uniform, unless they were going to be made uniform in all the Three Kingdoms, in accordance with the words set forth in the clause. He should like to have an explanation from the Attorney General, if it was intended to make the franchise uniform throughout the United Kingdom? He was prepared to assent to the proposal, but he did not understand the first part of the clause to establish that condition.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he did not quite understand what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to suggest in regard to the Scotch franchise.

SIR JOHN HAY asked if there was not a difference between the franchise established by the Act of 1868 and that established by the Act of 1867?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the Act of 1867 was very similar to that of 1868. In the case of lodgers there was the rental provision of £10; and he did not know in what respect it was suggested that there was any difference.

MR. DAWSON said, the lodger franchise was settled on a fixed money value, and in Ireland the franchise was based upon a £10 rent in regard to lodgers, and a £4 rent in regard to householders. With regard to the charge of want of uniformity raised by hon. Members, they might put their minds at rest. There was only one kind of uniformity he had discovered in these debates, and that was the uniformity of raising endless discussions and taking no Division upon them. The suffrage was not uniform at the present moment, but, under this Bill, it would be made uniform.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had no intention of continuing the discussion, which had apparently satisfied the Committee as to the decision it ought to arrive at, or rather as to the prevailing disposition of forces in respect of the franchise. He wished, however, to draw attention to another point of more importance, which he thought the Government, would admit was fully deserving of the consideration of the Committee. He asked the Committee to bear with him for a few moments while he laid it before them. As he gathered from a statement made a short time ago by the Prime Minister, that was the last opportunity he would have of bringing it before the Committee. The point to which he desired to draw the attention of the Committee was how far the adoption of the words "uniform franchise" would preclude the subsequent adoption by the Committee of Amendments which had for their object the giving of greater electoral weight to the various voters in accordance with the stake which they had in the country. One point he wished to dwell upon briefly was how far it would be practicable, without going outside the scope and intentions of this Bill, to incorporate, for the purposes of this section, a portion of the statute commonly known as Sturges Bourne's Act. That Act was the 58 Geo. III., c. 69, and it clearly laid down the manner in which the votes could be apportioned to the stake the voter might have in the community. He had been told before—and he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had made himself responsible for the assertion—that this was an old musty, fusty statute, that it was passed in the year 1818, and the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to consider that that fact alone pointed it out for the condemnation of Parliament. He would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that, although the statute had been the law of the land for a considerable number of years, no serious attempt had ever been made to repeal it, or to infringe upon its principle. Of course, he was not referring at that moment to those provisions of the statute which enabled votes to be given by proxy, and by other machinery, which he might have asked the Committee to incorporate in the present Bill; but he was referring rather to Section 3 of the Act of 58 George III., c. 69, which enabled every voter, or rather, to use the words of the Act—

Without troubling the Committee in any detail with the merits of the clause, he would point out that, although a plurality of votes might be accorded to every voter, yet it was provided that no person should have more than six votes. Some people might say that that was a very reactionary provision, and that it ran counter to the modern doctrine of the equality of every voter in the eye of the law, and that it was a provision which could hardly seriously be made to Parliament. He asked the Committee for a moment to consider what their object was in dealing with the question of the franchise. He knew there were those who were of opinion that the great object was that one political Party should have a preponderance of the votes of the electors. He would not weary the Committee by arguing with any such persons. He would rather assume that the object of Parliament was to secure some just and equitable method of arriving at the real wishes of the population of the country, due regard being had to the stake in the community which each voter possessed. He knew that some of his Friends on that side of the House said—“We entirely agree with you. It is quite right; but we do not believe that such a provision could ever be passed.” Now, he contended that that was timid language, which he personally could not endorse. He thought if any Member of the House entertained a strong conviction on any particular point it was his duty to bring that point before the Committee, and not to scamp his task. He was aware that there were those who said that votes should not be accorded to property at all—that every man had an inherent right to a vote, and that the amount of property he possessed had nothing to do with the matter. But he would remind the Committee that that was not the language used by Her Majesty's Government. The Prime Minister, in introducing the Bill, laid stress on his own opinion that regard should be had to property vested in the inhabitants of a constituency as well as to the numerical strength of the constituency. Throughout all the discussions which had taken place upon the various Reform Bills it had always been contended that representation should be accorded to a constituency not solely on the ground of a certain number of houses being situate in it, or on the number of persons entitled to record their votes, but that property should also be included as a consideration. He desired to know on what principle the Government proposed to consider the allocation of electoral weight with respect to property? Did they intend to adopt the principle held in the Southern States of America in former days, when a certain number of votes was accorded to each State in respect of its local population, but the local population were not allowed to record their votes? He understood the Prime Minister to contend that it was quite right that regard should be had to the property situate in a constituency, but that the owners of that property should have no share in the disposal of the votes. The right hon. Gentleman was establishing a doctrine that one set of persons was to pay the piper while another set were to call the tune. That in plain language, was the object of the Bill. He did not now wish to enter into the question which was generally known as the representation of minorities. He held strong views which he had not hesitated to utter in that House during the last 17 years. He hoped that subject would come before the House under abler hands than his own, and that the Committee would have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it. He would say this in passing—that he could not see any more equitable manner of representing the interests of property, and it might be of minorities, than by the adoption of salutary provisions, which were not novel or crotchetty inventions of his own, but which, for a number of years, had formed part of the law of the land, and had been found to work with justice to all persons concerned. He had constantly expressed his opinion against the various Reform Bills which had been introduced. He had not hesitated to denounce what had been termed the “leap in the dark” in 1867; and one of the grounds on which he denounced it was that it failed to make adequate provision for the fair balance of power, which he contended ought to be preserved between the conflicting claims and interests of all classes and sections of the community. On the second reading of the Reform Bill of 1867 he had ventured to make some remarks strongly condemnatory of the provision known under the name of the dual vote. Why had he denounced the dual vote? He had denounced it because he regarded it as an imposture and a sham. It did not go anything like far enough. It was all very well as far as it went; but it was altogether a meagre instalment of what was required to meet the exigencies of the case. The dual vote was a very different thing from the system of voting which he now ventured to urge upon the Committee. The dual vote allowed an elector to be placed on the register not only in the capacity of a freeholder or of an occupier, but, in addition, it gave him a separate vote as a taxpayer, or as the holder of Government Stock. That, he thought, was a very puny provision. He had not hesitated to condemn it at the time, and he had never regretted the attitude he took with regard to that or any other provision of the Bill of 1867. All he proposed now was that the voter should be entitled to vote in accordance with his stake in the country, provided always that the number of votes possessed by an individual did not exceed the number at present provided by the law in regard to the election of Poor Law Guardians—namely, six votes. He suggested that a voter should be entitled to a plurality of votes, not exceeding six altogether, in proportion to the taxation he contributed to the State. There would be one great advantage in the adoption of that principle. It would enable the House at large cordially to adopt the principle of household suffrage both in the town and in the country, a principle which, as it was provided in the present Bill, they would only be induced to accept with the greatest reluctance. He confessed that he himself had never been able to see any charm in a difference of suffrage between town and country. His idea had always been that every elector should have a fair share of electoral power accorded to him, whether he happened to live in a county or in a borough. He had been charged with opposing the adoption of household suffrage, and he should continue to oppose any scheme which did not make adequate provision for the maintenance of that fair balance of power between all classes and sections of the community which he considered to be necessary. There were several methods of obtaining that end. It might be possible to say that nobody should have a vote at all—that only a privileged few should possess the electoral franchise; or they might say that all persons should possess the electoral franchise, but that there should be a different weight accorded to different voters in the ordinary scale. That was what he thought would be most equitable under all the circumstances of the case. He hoped the Government would not shelter themselves under the plea that this would be going back from the great principles already established. He ventured to say, on the other hand, that if the subject was to be fairly considered by Parliament, apart from the prejudice of mere political opinions, he was at a loss to understand on what grounds it could be seriously contended that this was an objectionable principle to adopt in future. The Prime Minister might, perhaps, say that it might be the establishing of inequality. The right hon. Gentleman presumed to say that the other night in very decided terms; but, in his (Mr. J. Lowther's) judgment, the people of England were by no means enamoured of uniformity. The last thing the working classes of this country entertained an idea of was the establishment, on a dull level of mediocrity, of uniform laws. It had been the boast of Englishmen that the highest prizes of life were open to every man, and that, notwithstanding the condition of life in which a man was born, he might, by application, and industry, and ability in that sphere of life, raise himself above the scale in which he was born. He would now conclude his observations by expressing a hope that the Committee would fully and fairly consider the subject; and he was sure it was one which ought to receive full attention at the hands of each of the Parties in the State.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman began by addressing a question to the Government—namely, whether, in our opinion, it would be competent to him, if we passed this clause as it stands, at a subsequent date to move an Amendment for the introduction of what I may call plural voting in a rough way? I am quite prepared to answer that question at once. I have not the least doubt that it would be competent to him to do so, because the word "uniform" manifestly refers to uniformity between counties and boroughs, and does not, I apprehend, contain any limitation of the franchise, provided it applies to the counties and boroughs alike. But while I say that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to make that proposal at a future date, I venture to add a respectful hope that if, and when he does make it, he will bear in mind that he has already made his speech, and that it will be unnecessary for him again to entertain us with those most interesting references to his personal history, and to the gallant manner in which, on all occasions, he has maintained his principles, and which will be indelibly recorded on our memories.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire had asked the simple question, "What is a house?" What was meant by a house? What was the meaning of uniformity if every house to which it applied was different? That would destroy all uniformity. Some neighbours of his lived in an old railway carriage. Would they be considered householders? There were a great many people who lived in tents. Would those Ishmaels be considered householders? Others lived in caravans. Would they be householders? The point was clearly of great importance, especially with regard to Ireland, because in that country, notwithstanding the remedial legislation of the present Government, the majority of the people lived in mere hovels. Was a house that was unfit for human habitation to be considered one which would give the franchise to the occupants? If a house had no chimney, was such a place to be considered a house? That was a question which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had asked, and he hoped the Attorney General would have the courtesy to answer it.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he observed that there was a difference between the Scotch and the English Acts as to lodgers. In the Scotch Act it was provided that the lodgings must be a part of one and the same dwelling house; but that was not so in this Bill. He did not know whether there was any dispute about that; but the question was whether, under the term "uniform franchise," these two conditions of lodger franchise, which were re-enacted in the Bill, could, in strictness, be described as uniform?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): That really is the sense.

MR. CUBITT said, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment; but the question had not been answered as to the way in which the self-acting register was to be prepared for the lodger franchise. The Prime Minister had stated that the Bill had been prepared by the Government; but the Attorney General had not answered that question.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WARTON said, he proposed to add the word "franchise" after the word "household," in order to prevent confusion of ideas with regard to the nature of the uniformity. [MR. GLADSTONE: Agreed.] He did not like too ready an acquiescence until they knew exactly what they were about; and he did not wish to take advantage of the Prime Minister's acquiescence too quickly, but to treat him more generously than the right hon. Gentleman generally treated hon. Members on this side. He was not sure whether the Prime Minister saw the consequence of what he now proposed. His object in moving this Amendment was to move another Amendment shortly, to which, perhaps, the Prime Minister would not so readily accede; and that was after the word "and" to insert "a uniform," so that the whole would be a uniform household franchise and a uniform lodger franchise. That he thought would be clearer than the present mixture of household and lodger franchise. Although the Prime Minister acceded so readily to this Amendment, he must point out that in so doing they would cut away the ground from the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton), whose Amendment was misplaced. Therefore the Prime Minister might again be in error in acceding too readily to this proposition. But at present it would be sufficient to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, after "household," to insert "franchise."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the word 'franchise' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON proposed to add after "lodger" the words "and freehold." The Committee had heard so much about uniformity, and the Government had stuck to it with such tenacity, that he hoped they would now assist him in making the Bill more uniform and more complete. Everyone who had listened to the speeches by which the Bill had been introduced had, he believed, been satisfied of one thing—namely, that the basis and foundation of the Bill was the assimilation of the county and borough franchises; and everyone outside the House believed that this Bill would really do what the Prime Minister had said it would do—namely, assimilate the two franchises. In fact, it would do nothing of the kind. It left anomalies as great and as grievous as they were before; and as some of these anomalies, and this one especially, could be easily removed, he hoped the Government would be willing to accept his Amendment, for it carried out the spirit of their own Bill. Precisely the same argument could be adduced for the claim of the borough freeholder to be registered on the borough list as had been adduced for the lodger or occupier who resided outside the old borough lines to be registered on the county list. Let them consider the present state of things. An occupier of a tenement outside the borough limit which gave him a vote for the county, and owning a freehold within the borough limit, was disqualified from voting for the borough; whereas, if it had been just the other way—if he had occupied a small tenement within the borough boundaries, and had a freehold outside the borough, he would have been able to vote for both county and borough. The principle of the Bill, as had often been stated by the Prime Minister, was that every capable man who had a qualifying possession within a constituency should have a vote; but he made no provision for the qualifying freehold, which gave a vote within the county, to give a vote within the borough. Under this Bill, the occupier of land in a county, who had a freehold in a borough, and who, therefore, had an interest in the borough, was a capable citizen of that borough; but if he did not reside upon his freehold he was disfranchised. This Bill retained old anomalies and disfranchising conditions. The principle he proposed to introduce into the Bill existed in Ireland, where the freeholder in a borough, though non-resident, voted in the borough. The borough freeholders were generally urban voters—people belonging to the borough, and had little to do with the county. Therefore, it was proper that they should vote in the borough. Besides, it was a case of give and take. The occupier in the county, who had a freehold in the borough, would be introduced into the borough as a voter. Each constituency, whether county or borough, would be self-centred; every capable citizen with the qualifying condition would vote for every place where he had a qualification. There would be no disfranchisement in this at all. On the contrary, it would make the franchise uniform, and give equal rights inside and outside the boroughs; and, therefore, it seemed to him to be a principle which should be supported on every ground, but especially upon the ground upon which this Bill was brought before the attention of the House—namely, the assimilation of the county and borough franchise.

Mr. Warton

Question proposed, "That the word 'freehold' be here inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this Amendment was a very important one; but the Government could not agree to it. By accepting it they would disfranchise a great number of voters, because, if they gave a freehold vote in the borough, the principal persons who would be entitled to vote would be resident householders. Dealing with them first, they now had a vote for the county if they had a freehold qualification in a borough; but this proposal would deprive them of that vote. It would disfranchise the whole of them. If a freehold gave a vote for the borough, it could not give a vote for the county; and, therefore, what the hon. Member proposed as a sufficient qualification for the borough would prevent the owner of it voting for the county. If a man had two such qualifications he could not choose between the two; therefore, they must determine, in the sense placed before the Committee, whether they would allow the vote to be a qualification for the borough or county. If they gave the borough vote for the freehold situated in a borough it must cease to be a county qualification; and so they would disfranchise every county voter who had a freehold qualification within a borough. Then, that equally applied to the non-residents, because if a person resided elsewhere, if he had a voting qualification for the borough, they could not say that he was to have a vote for the county simply because he was non-resident. The result of this Amendment must be this—no freeholder in a borough could have a county qualification; and there were in England and Wales 112,000 county voters, whose freehold qualifications being situated in boroughs, who would be disqualified. The Government were not prepared to disfranchise even those 112,000.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, non-residents would vote under his Amendment, just as they do now, only they would vote for the borough instead of for the county.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked whether the hon.

Member was going to give non-residents votes for boroughs under this clause?

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Certainly. They have votes now for the county.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could imagine nothing more likely to create "fagot" votes than to give the 40s. non-resident freeholder a vote in the borough.

MR. ECROYD said, there were in his district a great number of working men who had become the owners of small houses, and who were deeply interested in the point under consideration. He entirely agreed that it would be a mistake to give to non-residents a vote for the borough; and, therefore, in a later Amendment which stood in his name he had introduced the words—

"Subject always, in the case of boroughs, to such conditions as to residence within, or within a certain distance thereof, as are now by statute or shall be under the provisions of this Act prescribed."

There were only two courses which could be taken with any justice in dealing with this Bill. Either a man who was both an owner and an occupier in a borough might be stripped of his ownership, or, on the other hand, a man who was both an owner and an occupier outside the borough, might have a property vote conferred upon him in addition to the vote he enjoyed; and he believed that if hon. Members would, for a moment, consider what would be the position of many of the best class of working people if this Act were passed, they would see that it was one which could not be tolerated by the country. Suppose two brothers were joint owners of a freehold situated in a village three or four miles from a town, one of them living in the village adjoining the freehold, and the other in the borough three or four miles away. One of them would be unable to vote, whilst the other would be entitled to vote in right of this property. Could anything more monstrous be imagined? He would take, as another instance, the case of a man living in a borough who was the owner of a freehold house within the borough, which he let. Under this Bill he would have a vote in the borough as an occupier, and one in the county as an owner; whilst his brother, living, say, a mile outside the borough, and owning a similar or a more valuable property, would have only one vote. Of these two men, whose circumstances were precisely similar, one would thus be endowed with twice as large a share of political power as the other. That was an injustice so monstrous that in his county division it would create something approaching a political insurrection. He had not spoken to one workman who did not firmly believe that, though he might live outside a borough, this Bill would give him both an ownership and an occupying vote, and thus place him in a position in all respects equal to that of his neighbour inside the borough. The confusion which would follow from any other course would make it impossible to work out the measure; and the consequence would be that before very long there would be a great agitation against the ownership vote being left to the people resident in boroughs. That might or might not be a result contemplated by the authors of this Bill; but a settlement which would deal out equal justice between these two classes of people was one which could not be long delayed. This proposition was, therefore, one of the most important points to be considered in this Bill, because they were now at a place where two ways parted, and the decision they should arrive at would probably determine the future course the country would take—whether they should have one vote for one man, and abolish the second or ownership vote now enjoyed by inhabitants of boroughs, or whether they should proceed towards the equal enfranchisement of owners outside boroughs, and the continuance in both boroughs and counties of that political distinction between those who were and those who were not owners of rateable property which had been one of the greatest and best moral influences operating upon the working classes. He believed it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of this decision; and he hoped it would not force upon the cream of the working class the idea that they were to be reduced to the level of the most worthless and improvident amongst their neighbours. He could not conceive anything more calculated to uproot the good work of inducing these men from their youth to save money and become owners of property than to destroy this distinction; and he earnestly appealed to the Committee to pause before coming to a conclusion which would have that effect.

Mr. Eeroyd.

Mr. GORST said, he thought the hon. Member for Preston would have convinced the Attorney General that this Amendment was not to be disposed of in the summary manner he had imagined. It was impossible, at this time of the day, to do adequate justice to an Amendment of this importance; and he hoped the Government would consent now to report Progress, in order that this matter might be properly discussed at the next Sitting. The Attorney General had objected to this proposition on the ground that it was a disfranchising proposition; and when he found that it was an enfranchising proposal he found fault with it for that reason. He thought it was desirable to report Progress, and at the next Sitting they could consider more fully this Amendment, which he hoped the hon. Member would press to a Division. He moved that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Gorst.)

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he was sorry that Progress had been moved now; but it was not worth while considering the matter, and he should consent.

Mr. WARTON asked when the right hon. Gentleman intended to put this Bill down again for Committee, as it was necessary that hon. Members should have time to consider what Amendments they would put on the Paper?

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he would put the Bill down for Friday morning; but he was not quite certain whether it could then be taken.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday, at Two of the clock.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.—RESOLUTION.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. BROADHURST, in rising to move—

"That, in view of the painful and unnecessary hardships inflicted upon large numbers of people in this Country by the Law prohibiting Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, it is the opinion of this House that a measure of relief is urgently called for."

said, he felt that in making the Motion some explanation was due to the House of the manner in which he became associated with it. It had for some time past been very ably dealt with by the hon. and learned Member the Recorder of the City of London (Sir Thomas Chambers); but after some length of time and after the continual pressure of friends, and especially of his constituents, he at last consented to take charge of the question. To show the House the interest his constituents took in it, he would that state last winter a requisition in its favour was sent to him signed by 25,000 of them, of whom more than 10,000 were women above 18 years of age, and representing not only the working classes of the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent, but also the middle classes, besides many Town Councillors, Aldermen, and members of Local Boards. Another reason for his connection with the subject was to be found in the Petition which he had the honour of presenting to the House yesterday, signed by 115 delegates representing the trades of the country at the last annual Trades Union Congress. There were really 170 signatures; but some 55 failed to sign the proper paper. In the hurry of their week's work they failed to get near the Petition, and they signed letters instead, expressing regret that their names were not attached to the original document. But for this circumstance the original Petition would have contained 170 signatures of the leading working men of the United Kingdom, representing altogether something like 500,000 of the people of this country. At the outset of his speech he wished to state that he did not profess to represent every working man's opinion in the country. He never did profess to. There were a great many opinions in the country he would be very sorry to represent; and he would be glad to transfer them to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, or anywhere else, who chose to espouse their views. As Representative of Stoke-upon-Trent, he had endeavoured to represent the constituency as a whole, and not any one class. His own opinion as to the importance of the subject was that, with the exception of the Franchise Bill, then before the House, there was a more general consensus of opinion upon this than upon any other. So far as signatures to Petitions were concerned, his experience showed that the possibility of obtaining them was only limited by a person's time and opportunities; and, indeed, he had never met a person who declined to sign one in favour of the proposed alteration. ["Oh!"] He did not say that no such person existed; but, whereas 2,000,000 people had petitioned in favour of the Bill, not one-tenth of that number had petitioned against it. Three hundred and fifty Town Councils had at different times sent Petitions in favour of the amendment of the law. One hundred and thirty Boards of Guardians in the country had petitioned in its favour. The Town Council of Edinburgh had petitioned 11 times, and the Convention of Rural Boroughs had petitioned 11 times. He mentioned signatures of Town Councillors and members of Local Boards especially because they might be taken to represent the highest and best form of Conservative feeling in the country. By this he meant Conservative, not in a political point of view, but Conservative in its best and highest sense; and he would say this especially with regard to Boards of Guardians, than whom there were no representative Bodies in the country more capable of giving expression to what was desirable on a subject of this kind. Coming to another form of organization, the Liberal Associations of the country, no less than 225 of these Associations had passed resolutions in favour of these views. He thought that it was known to most people that His Holiness the Pope and the greater number of the leading Catholic clergy, as well as the more prominent laity of the Catholic Church, were in favour of this alteration in the law. The general interest in the subject was very great. As regarded Scotland, in the City of Glasgow 42,000 people had signed Petitions for the change in a short time last year, and over 300 Scotch ministers had expressed themselves in its favour, while the leading organs of the Scotch Press were also favourable to it. In England itself, as apart from any other portion of the United Kingdom, he thought it was safe to say that public opinion, if not unanimous, at least came nearer to being so than it had done upon any great question that had engaged public attention for many years past. Many also of those who sat on the other side of the House were in favour of it; so that this Motion was no outrage upon Conservatism. What had been the result of the attempt to create a feeling adverse to this proposal? The most supreme efforts had been put forth to elicit opinions in opposition to it; but they had met with most signal failure, and had by no means repaid the labour and expenditure employed. He had been told that the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Cambridge University had called upon the clergy of the Church of England to come to his assistance and place notices upon their church doors in opposition to this measure, calling upon the people to use their best efforts against it. What had been the result? After months of labour about 12,000 signatures had been obtained, many of them under questionable circumstances. A very remarkable Circular had also been issued on the subject marked "Confidential," and addressed to Members of Parliament, from a special meeting of C. E. W. M. S., which he was told meant the Church of England Working Men's Society. It said that he (Mr. Broadhurst) could not be accepted as representing the working classes on this question, and it requested Members to vote against the Motion. It was especially requested that there might be no mention of the Church of England Working Men's Society, or of any Church Society. It was signed on behalf of the Society by S. Powell, Secretary, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, W.C. He had given these particulars because that was rather an out-of-the-way place for an institution of that kind. The Bishop of Lichfield, of whom he wished to speak with great respect, had made a great effort to stir up the people in defence of the law as it at present existed; but after going through the whole of his district he had succeeded in getting something like 8,000 signatures, or less than one-third of the number of signatures in favour of this Motion, obtained within the boundaries of his own constituency, and of grown men and women. It had been stated that this was not a working man's question at all, but that it was simply for the convenience of a very few rich people. He was sorry to hear such prejudice expressed on the Conservative side of the House against justice being done to people who were rich. His own Liberalism knew of no distinction between rich and poor in matters of justice. It would be a bad day for the country when Parliament legislated for the convenience of either rich or poor; the ground of its action should be justice, and not consideration for any class of people. He was not prepared to admit that this was a rich man's question only. Undoubtedly, rich people had the good sense to make these marriages in the interest of their own happiness and that of the bereaved children; but such marriages were far more numerous among the working classes than among the upper or the middle classes; and that was some justification for the position he occupied. The difference between rich and poor in these matters was very great. The rich man's resources enabled him, if he was a widower, to obtain proper treatment for his children; and, as a rule, if he married again, the opinion of his class prevented his second wife from ill-using her step-children. These advantages the poor man did not possess. He, perhaps, had to leave his home before dawn, and all day his children were in the hands of the step-mother, and infancy was often a barrier to their communication with others. No one was more likely to be a second mother to the children than the sister of her who bore them; she often became so during the long illness of the mother; and to wrench her from the children was often to them as a second death. Not only in the interest of the children themselves, but in the interest of humanity, the House should not stand for one moment between the Resolution and the hopes of these poor people, but should concede their reasonable and just demands with as little delay as possible. Hundreds and thousands of these marriages were already contracted, and thousands more would be contracted if the law was amended. He sincerely hoped that the House would pass his Motion. Society did not condemn these marriages, whilst every sensible person in the country—he did not use the word "sensible" in an offensive sense—approved of them,

Mr. Broadhurst

Parliament ought to be abreast of the opinion of the country, and the expression of a decisive judgment on the part of this House would probably have great weight with the other House, and induce it to yield to the claims of common sense, justice, and humanity. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution which stood in his name.

MR. HENEAGE, in seconding the Motion, said, he regarded the prohibition of these marriages as most unjust and inexpedient. The law was contrary to Divine law and to natural law. There was nothing in the Old Testament or the New Testament against these marriages. Within the last few weeks unanimous testimony had been given by Professors of Greek and of Hebrew as to the interpretation of the controverted passages in favour of these marriages, which, indeed, had always been approved by Jews and by Mahomedans. The Roman Catholics did not say that these marriages were against the Divine law, but simply that they were against the moral law, which could be dispensed with at the pleasure of the Pope. The Protestants, whether Churchmen or Non-conformists, desired this amendment of the law. The marriages were legal in the other English-speaking nations of the globe. Cardinal Newman wrote that if he looked upon this question as one affecting the rich he should, perhaps, think the marriages inexpedient; but in the interests of the poor he thought they were expedient. ["Read on!"] The Cardinal spoke further of the danger of relaxing the sanctity of marriage; but that had nothing whatever to do with the subject before the House. If these marriages were expedient they ought not to be prohibited because of the inexpediency of any other marriages which nobody contemplated. We had two laws in two different parts of the Empire; and a marriage in Canada might be repudiated here without any redress for the woman; although the law of Canada had received the assent of the Queen. Looking at the question from a social point of view, he maintained that the objection founded on alleged intimacy and relationship was all nonsense. There was closer relationship between first cousins, particularly where two brothers had married two sisters; and, as a rule, they would be well known to each other. In the case of a husband and his wife's sister, they might not even know each other until they attended the wife's funeral. This was not a question for the small social circle of London; it was a question for the nation at large, and for the English-speaking people of the Colonies. It had been stated that if they altered the present law, and allowed marriage with the deceased's wife sister, the number of divorce cases would be increased. He did not know whether that would be so or not, but he would point out that two wrongs did not make a right; and if that House had passed a Divorce Law, which was against the teachings of the Bible, that was no reason why they should try and keep another law in force which was also opposed to the language of the Bible. The present law upon this subject was, in his opinion, a disgrace to a civilized country, and ought to be abolished. He seconded the Motion of the hon. Member for Stoke.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in view of the painful and unnecessary hardships inflicted upon large numbers of people in this Country by the Law prohibiting Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, it is the opinion of this House that a measure of relief is urgently called for."—(Mr. Broadhurst.)

COLONEL MAKINS in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the Laws relating to Marriages within the prohibited degrees."

said, he did not think that any apology was needed for bringing this subject before the House. The question had exercised the public mind ever since the passing of the Lyndhurst Act half a century ago; and he quite admitted that any hon. Member was at liberty to take it up. The hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) had stated that a large number of Petitions had been presented in favour of the Bill. That was perfectly true; but he would remind the House that a very large number had been presented against the Bill, and it should be remembered that it was always easier for those who were attacking an existing law to get up Petitions than those who were supporting it. It was not correct to say that there was a general feeling in favour of the measure. No resolution had been passed by any meeting of representative clergy or by any well-known sect in this country in favour of legalizing marriage with the deceased wife's sister. He was sorry the hon. Member for Stoke had stated that Liberal Associations approved of the Motion; because hitherto the question of the Marriage Laws had not been regarded as a Party question. It was a mistake for the hon. Member to drag in those Associations in support of the measure. The hon. Member claimed to speak on behalf of working men, but showed that upon this subject he had no right whatever to represent those working men who belonged to the Church of England. He was prepared to state that most of the working men who were members of the Church of England were utterly opposed to the measure. The hon. Member had further claimed to speak not only in the name of the working man, but of the Pope. He did not know what authority he had to speak for the Pope; but this he did know—that a very large number of Roman Catholics were utterly opposed to the measure. Then the hon. Member for Stoke claimed that the measure for legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister was a measure of justice to the people as a whole; but he forgot that gross injustice would be done to those who did not desire it if it passed into law. If they altered the law, the sister of the deceased wife would not have that protection which she now enjoyed, and the opposite to that which the supporters of the Motion desired would be effected. The hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) was fully persuaded that the Divine Law was in favour of the Bill. Seeing, however, that all Christian Bodies ever since the institution of Christianity and other bodies before the institution of Christianity maintained the present law upon the subject, he failed to see how the hon. Member came to the conclusion that the Divine Law was in his favour. The Roman law was against such marriages. They were not known in the days of the early fathers. St. Basil said—"Such marriages are not known among us." It was said that it was not intended to extend the proposal. But the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr.

Colonel Makins

Thomasson) desired to extend it by inserting the words "and with a deceased husband's brother;" and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) desired to extend it to "the relations" of the deceased husband or wife, thus opening the door as wide as he possibly could. Hitherto the matter had been in the hands of private Members, and he did not see much prospect of their being relieved of it; but the question was of so much importance that if legislation was undertaken at all it ought to be undertaken in connection with the whole Marriage Law and by a responsible Government, whom he did not see just now on the Bench opposite. Both the Proposer and Seconder of the Motion had ignored the canons altogether. If they were to remove the prohibition against those marriages they would place the clergy in a most awkward position. Taking the 99th and the 26th canons together, no clergyman would be allowed to marry those persons or to admit them to the Holy Communion. The table of prohibitive degrees as it stood was perfectly logical, simple, and intelligible. It dealt with 20 cases of affinity and 10 of relationship by birth; and if they took one of the degrees of affinity what was to become of the others? The principal persons in favour of the proposal were the paid officials of the Society, those who had contracted those unions or who hoped to contract them, and the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) and the school to which he belonged. In that hon. Member's hands the Motion would have found a more congenial home. The hon. Member had referred to the Colonies. But it should be recollected that in the Colonies there was no State Church, there was no Canon Law, and they were not under the same difficulties in dealing with the question as we were. The members of the Liberation Society were also supporters of the proposal, for they saw in it a great weapon against the Church. On the other hand, the religious communities were opposed to it—the synods and conferences of the Church and the diocesan conferences. The Scotch Assembly had passed very strong resolutions against it, and the Scotch Episcopal Church had issued a pastoral letter condemning it in the strongest manner. The hon. Member for Stoke said he represented the working men; but he did not say much about the working women or the women at all.

MR. BROADHURST said, he had distinctly stated in his opening remarks that a requisition asking him to take charge of the matter had been signed by 10,000 women over 18 years of age in his own constituency.

COLONEL MAKINS said, he was speaking of women generally, and he had no hesitation in saying that the proposal was utterly repugnant to their views. He had received letters from women of all classes, especially those of the lower middle class, telling him that the effect of the passing of the measure would be to drive them from the homes in which they now lived very much to the benefit of the children of their late sister. What did the proposal come to? To the selfish gratification of a few against the interests of the many; but they would never be able to transform legal concubinage into holy matrimony. Then there was another very serious question involved, and that was the condonation of the past breaking of the law. What the hon. Gentleman proposed was the secularization of marriage. He would legalize that union, but he could not convert it into holy matrimony. He should be sorry to see the state of things existing in the United States of America introduced into this country. He supported the present law, because it maintained domestic happiness and domestic purity. Whatever Forms of the House were at his disposal he would use to delay and defeat the Bill. He did not enter into the Scriptural argument, for that had been already fully stated, and it was not so well suited to that House. This, after all, was in some sense a legal question; and all the Lord Chancellors in recent times — Lords Hatherley, St. Leonards, Cairns, and Selborne, together with the present Lord Chief Justice of England, were opposed to this Bill. He ought, perhaps, to make an exception in favour of that great ecclesiastical lawyer, Lord Westbury, and Lord Bramwell was also in favour of the Bill. The Bishops and clergy of the Church of England and all diocesan synods and conferences had condemned this Bill, and this showed that opinion was not all on one side. This was a matter of great social importance, and one which, if dealt with at all, ought to be dealt with by the Government, and not by a private Member. The Government required evidence on the subject, and therefore it was that he proposed that a Royal Commission should be appointed. He concluded by moving his Amendment.

COLONEL MILNE-HOME, in seconding the Amendment, said, the subject brought forward by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) was one fraught with the deepest possible interest to those whose position and circumstances it chiefly concerned; but it went further, because any alteration in the Marriage Law affected family life, and what affected family life affected the whole community. He at once admitted, so far as his own individual opinion was concerned, that nowhere, either in the Levitical or the Biblical law, were they told that this prohibition was to hold good. At the same time, if they were to follow out the very letter of the Scriptural law, almost anyone might be a Mormonite except a Bishop or a Presbyterian. The law of the Bible was certainly made for the nations of the day; but the principle of the Bible was handed down for us to act up to according to the lights of our generation, and according to the progress of civilization and Christianity. He thought we were following out that principle as laid down in the Bible, and more particularly the New Testament, by restricting ourselves in the way the law restricted us now. A very large majority of the Church of England considered that marriage with a deceased wife's sister was religiously wrong. The Roman Catholics, he understood, were divided in opinion. The Presbyterians in Scotland and elsewhere were chiefly in favour of retaining this prohibition. But whether the majority of all classes of religious sects were in favour or not, this was a Christian country; and we were bound in common charity to respect the opinions of our religious brethren. We should, therefore, err, if we erred at all, on the right side, by keeping the law as it was—unless there was tremendous reason shown for the change. He submitted that they had had no such reason put before them to-night. Having conceded the theological point, he would take his stand only upon the social ground. He considered that for all classes in the community it was better to keep the law as it now was; and in this view he was supported by not a few of the clergy, though there were clergymen of the Church of England who did not take the extreme view of this question which was laid down by his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Makins). They must take into consideration in this question the wage-earning as well as the wage-paying classes; and when he saw the name of the hon. Member for Stoke down as the champion of this movement he felt considerable qualms of conscience as to what course he was to take. He had invariably voted against any change in this direction; and the only thing that would induce him to alter his views was the persuasion that such a change in the law would be really a benefit to the working class. It seemed to him that those who were in a different position to them were bound to give up something for their benefit. Widowers in all classes were to be pitied, but chiefly those among the working classes, because when the wife was taken the housekeeper was taken also, and that meant terrible inconvenience in the home. That was more noticeable, perhaps, in the community in which he lived than in any other, as married soldiers had no end of privileges and allowances; but when the wife died all those allowances and privileges went. The soldier, who was a widower, had immediately to become a member of his company's mess; and, in addition, to pay someone to look after his children. But the question arose, would the Resolution, or a Bill like it, if carried, be a remedy for all this? He thought that the sisters-in-law of men in the position of working men were generally either married themselves or were in service or otherwise employed, and were not at liberty to come and take charge of a household. One great argument against the hon. Member for Stoke was that the sisters-in-law were not available. The real remedy was to take steps to improve the dwellings of these people. ["Question!"] That was the question; the reason of all these discomforts of the working classes was that they were so badly housed; and it was an insult to the pure-minded among them to come to the House and ask for a Bill which they themselves did not want. He had endeavoured to find a Return of the number of these illicit marriages; and the only one he could find showed that in a cycle of 12 years the number of what he might call rich marriages was 1,608, against 40 poor ones. That seemed to show either that the poorer classes preferred to remain as they were, or that they were not in a position to break the law. It also showed the sad fact that the richer classes did not scruple to break the law. The recent alteration in the law in Canada had been mentioned, and some hon. Members had seemed to consider it a very great argument; but it seemed to him no argument to say that because her children go wrong the mother country should do likewise. It had been said that it would be very awkward for persons so married coming home to this country from Canada, in that they would have no status as married persons. But Lord Cairns had said in the other House that the domicile of Canada legalized the marriage all over the world. If, however, people domiciled in Great Britain crossed to Canada, and took advantage of the law there, they must not be surprised if the law of their domicile took effect when they returned. As to foreign countries, these unions were permitted in France, Germany, and Russia, but only by a dispensation from the Church. That seemed to imply that the parties had done something wrong, as a dispensation was simply a pardon for an offence which was considered morally wrong. It was well known that in those countries divorce was rife than it was in England. Whether that fact arose from the different conditions of the marriage law it was not for him to say; but it was for hon. Gentlemen who came and asked for the removal of the restriction to prove that family life in those countries, in America, and in the Colonies, was purer, and holier, and happier than it was in England. He believed that in America there was a growing dislike to such marriages. He thought that in what he had said he had shown that there was no desire on the part of the working classes for any change in the law. The hon. Member for Stoke would, in his opinion, defeat his own object if a law were passed founded on this Resolution. At present the sister-in-law could enter the widower's household, and help him in its management, and she was undoubtedly the right person to do so. If a Bill were passed founded upon this Resolution, the sister-in-law would, in the pithy words of the Archbishop of Canterbury, have to "pack up her traps and begone." Then the children ought to be considered. If the marriages in question were allowed new families would spring up, and the children by the first marriage might be left out in the cold. He was amazed at the support which the proposal had received in certain quarters. If the people who were in favour of it would only compare the state of society in foreign countries where the prohibition was not acted upon—in the United States and in our Colonies—with the state of society at home they would soon change their views. Many persons forgot that if the restriction on marriage with a deceased wife's sister were done away with, it would be impossible to stop there. What would there be to prevent a man from claiming to marry his mother-in-law, his brother's widow, or his step-daughter? The restriction, according to so learned an authority as Lord Cairns, dated from the earliest times of Christianity. Surely he could rely upon the Conservatives lining the Benches on his side of the House to vote for its retention. This was a moribund Parliament. Large numbers of people were soon to be admitted to the franchise for the first time. Would it not be well to wait and see what the new electorate would say on this subject? Some day, perhaps, we should have female suffrage. By all means let the House wait for that day before attempting to alter the present law, for he felt certain that the women would vote for the retention of the marriage law of England in its present integrity.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the Laws relating to Marriages within the prohibited degrees,"—

(Colonel Makins.)

—instead thereof.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: Sir, I suppose it is not expected that we should discuss in detail the Amendment which my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Makins) has proposed. It is an evasive and dilatory Amendment, asking the House to decline to pass an opinion on the main subject of discussion, and an Amendment which I think my hon. and gallant Friend would be the very last man to put forward as a substantive Motion for its acceptance. I do not think there is anyone in the House who would be more reluctant than he to throw open the whole question of the prohibited degrees in the Marriage Law. I turn at once from that large subject to the single question contained in the Resolution; and, with the indulgence of the House, I will give a few reasons why I intend to vote in support of this Resolution. It has been practically conceded that, so far as the maintenance of that restriction finds its authority in an appeal to Scriptural rules, there is no ground for the restriction. ["No, no!"] It is of no use to contradict me by "No, no!" It is practically conceded by the Mover of the Amendment, and it is conceded in terms by the hon. and gallant Member for Berwick (Colonel Milne-Home). I think there is no more remarkable evidence of the slavery into which the intellect is sometimes brought by the will and the sentiment than the fact that there are people to be found in this country, honest and intelligent people, who contend that these marriages are forbidden by Holy Scripture. There is no difficulty with regard to the argument. The prohibition is generally supposed to be found in a single verse of Leviticus. As to that verse, there is no material discrepancy or dispute respecting translation, and there is no ambiguity in its phrases. If it be interpreted by those rules which all men, with one accord, would apply to the construction of any other authority in any other verse, it clearly gives, not a prohibition, but a permission to these marriages. It is one of the universal canons of interpretation that a particular prohibition implies a general permission. Therefore, as the verse in question says that a marriage is not to be contracted during the lifetime of the sister, it follows that such a marriage is permissible when that life is at an end. ["Hear, hear!"] But my hon. Friends around me rather rely upon the interpretation of another text to be found in the Old Testament, and to be found twice in the New Testament—a text in metaphorical language, which speaks of the twain being one flesh. It is scarcely possible, with due reverence and propriety, to discuss and point out the consequences of such a construction as is put upon that text; and I will content myself with this answer—which I confess appears to me overwhelming—that to say that that text was meant to convey a prohibition of a marriage of this kind is to be guilty of the grossest disrespect and irreverence to the writer of the Sacred Book in which it was found; it is to contend that a prohibition is intended to be conveyed to the world by the text, but that the inspired writer so ill set down the command it was his duty to give to the world that for 2,000 years the people to whom that command was supposed to be addressed unanimously misunderstood it, and disobeyed it. It is impossible to find in the Old or New Testament any further authority than these. But we have been told that if we cannot appeal to Scripture to support this prohibition we shall find it in the social condition of life, and in the mischiefs that would follow from the permitting of these marriages. It is, I think, a little too much forgotten that the existence of this prohibition is the cause of very serious social mischiefs. If my hon. and gallant Friend behind me quotes a Return stating that 1,600 marriages of this class have occurred within a certain time among wealthy persons, while only 40 marriages of the same kind have taken place among the poorer class, I want to know what is the explanation of that discrepancy? Is it to be supposed that in this class, where the reasons for such a union are far stronger than they are in the class to which hon. Members of the House belong—is it to be supposed that there, where circumstances press more strongly in support of such a marriage, the alliance is not made? The explanation is, I fear, a different one. The wealthy man can take the second wife away and marry her abroad. He brings her back to this country, as one knows in the circle of one's own acquaintances, with undiminished respect and acceptance. [Cheers, and "No, no!"]

I do not believe there is a Member of this House who does not know within the circle of his own acquaintances at least two or three instances in which such marriages have taken place. At all events, the rich man can do that, and the poor man cannot go abroad and solemnize the marriage; and I believe the result is too often not that the union does not take place, but that the union takes place unhallowed by any ceremony of marriage whatever. There are these mischiefs now; but it is said that there will be serious social mischiefs if this alteration in the law be made. It seems to me, I confess, that my hon. and gallant Friends who are putting this argument forward are giving a most strange and grotesque representation of the social and domestic life of the English people. The ideal state of things seems to be this—that the wife throughout the married life is anxious and suspicious in regard to anyone who comes into the circle of the home life, in the fear, not that the affection of the husband may presently go out and result in unfaithfulness, but that, at some future time, when the wife herself has gone, he may contract a second marriage with that person. The idea seems to be that the English wife is so keenly jealous and suspicious, and has so little confidence in her husband's love, that she cannot reconcile herself to the presence of her own sister in the home, but for the consolation she finds in the fact that in 1835, almost by an accident, this prohibition was put upon the Statute Book. I say, almost by an accident, for in Committee of the House in 1835 the only Division that took place on the subject was a Division in which the majority was against the prohibition of these marriages; but those who were putting forward the Act of Parliament of 1835 pleaded that it might be allowed to pass in that year, and suggested that an amending Act permitting these marriages should be brought in in the following year. It seems to me that the view which has been taken is an entire misapprehension of the condition of the domestic life among us. We should be in pitiful case indeed if that condition of anxiety, jealousy, and suspicion which has been pictured was the real condition of the English home—

"In love, if love be love, if love be ours, Faith and unfaith can ne'er be equal powers;
Unfaith in aught is want of faith in all."

I do not believe that the wife, at the time when her health and capacity exist for managing her children, and when she is able to render all the satisfaction to her husband as when he took her for his wife—I do not believe there is this constant suspicion and anxiety on her part that in some future time, after she is dead, he will marry another. But there is a time when feeling becomes deeper. There comes to many women a time when they know of their sentence to go from the husband they love and the family they have taken care of, and when there is an interval between the season of active joyous interests in life, and the time when the final parting is made; and I do not believe that the tone of feeling of women at that time is jealousy or suspicion of the sister who may take her place. Women are not so selfish as men are. I do not believe that a woman could do the cruel and wicked act that men are every day committing, when they, by the terms of their wills, endeavour to prevent the wife from ever being happy again in married life. I believe that to the woman it would be a consolation, and not a vexation and a sorrow, to think that the children whom she loves, and is leaving behind her, should find their most proper protector, and the husband should find his best companion and helpmate in her own sister, who would bring back to them the memory of her who had gone. With regard to this matter, I would like to say a few words on the reference that has been made to the canons of the Church, and on the observations made by my hon. and gallant Friend as to the retrospective effect of the Bill to be introduced. Assuming that Parliament passes an Act to abolish this prohibition, it will be on this ground only—that the prohibition ought never to have existed; and if we make a declaration that the prohibition ought never to have existed and ought to be removed, it would be a monstrous thing to leave the stain of illegitimacy upon hundreds of thousands of persons with regard to the marriage of whose parents we admit that that marriage is not forbidden by the law of God, and ought not to be forbidden by the law of man. It is said that such marriages are forbidden by the canons of the Church; and, no doubt, one of the canons ecclesiastical does contain a prohibition in a very peculiar form. It declares that these marriages are forbidden by the Word of God; and it declares that, as I believe, without the smallest foundation. The canons are a series of orders issued by the authority of the Crown, with the concurrence and advice of the Convocations of Canterbury and York, and they are not binding by law upon the laity of England at all. They are constantly and habitually disregarded by the Bishops and clergy themselves. The 99th canon, which has been referred to, comes in the middle of a number of others which are simply concerned with the procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts; and the only reason why those canons has been allowed till this day to exist, and remain in what I suppose I must call the Rule of the Church of England, is that the clergy have habitually disobeyed the Royal Order which was made when those canons were promulgated—namely, that each clergyman should read them once a-year at the afternoon service, one-half of them on one day, and the other half on the next. If the clergy obeyed that Royal Order I undertake to say that those canons ecclesiastical would not remain in existence for 12 months. There is only one other point on which I will ask the House to allow me to say a word or two, and it is that which touches the part of the question which is the most serious and the most important. Sitting here, and seeing the Prime Minister in his place, I have been reminded of the remarkable letter the right hon. Gentleman wrote in the year 1863 to the late Bishop Wilberforce, and which was printed in one volume of the life of that Bishop lately published, in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke at some length to that illustrious Prelate of the position which the Church of England ought to take with reference to matters which affect Nonconformists in this country, and I have always thought that in that letter the right hon. Gentleman gave counsel so wise to members of the Church of England that the letter, if it stood alone, would justify the confidence which has been habitually and consistently placed in him by very large bodies of Churchmen. Sir, I am very anxious indeed with regard to the relation of this Motion to the position and character of the Church of England. I am a Churchman—a Churchman bound to the Church by ties of allegiance a great deal deeper and a great deal stronger than those which attach me to any political Party. The Church is a great institution—one of the greatest institutions we have in this country. It is higher in authority than Parliaments or Thrones; it will survive them all; and I think with great anxiety of the future of the Church and its relations to the State. I believe that disestablishment would be a national disaster, and that disendowment would be a national crime; but there is one event possible which would be far worse for the nation and for the Church than disestablishment, however complete, and disendowment, however rapacious—and that is that the Church should be degraded into a Department of the State, and placed under the control of the House of Commons and under the supervision of an Erastian Home Secretary. But I confess that I think that is the direction in which those who are now professing to lead Churchmen in this matter are unknowingly but most steadily going when they assert a claim to make the law of the Church—because they call it the law of the Church—the law of the land, and when they claim that those who do not belong to the Church itself shall yield obedience to that law simply because it is the law of the Church, and because in theory every man in the nation is a member of the Church. They forget that the natural and necessary corollary and consequence of that claim on their part is that the people over whose reluctant conscience they are attempting to place that yoke are entitled to turn round, and will turn round, and say—“You insist on the theory that we are members of the Church; and, because you insist that we are bound by its law, we in our own Parliament will regulate the rules, the ritual, and the doctrine of the Church itself;” and thus, in attempting to stretch the authority of its own rules over the people at large, the Church will have succeeded in reducing itself to a position which I think will be most disastrous to it and to the State as well. Now, I have not made these observations upon this matter without a feeling of very strong personal responsibility. There has been no personal interest or personal influence pressing me in the direction in which I am going. On the other hand, I have been warned by those whom I count among my best friends, and who are perfectly capable, if they choose, of giving effect to that warning, that the penalty of the course I am taking may be a penalty very serious to my political future. [“Oh, oh!”] Well, I can only say that that is the warning which has been given to me, and hon. Gentlemen opposite may not be so well able to judge as those who sit on the Opposition side of the House as to what the force of that warning may be; but a matter of that kind is a matter with which I have nothing whatever to do. Whatever may happen as to that, I have striven to study this question, and to come to a clear and conscientious conviction and result upon it; and I have come to a definite and clear determination that I must give my vote in support of the Motion. I shall give that vote most clearly and confidently, believing that I am doing nothing that will, in the least degree, derogate from the authority of any Divine law, or from the reverence due to it; that I shall be assisting the social purity and domestic happiness of the people; and, still more, that I shall be rendering true and loyal service to the Church which I desire most faithfully to serve, and whose work and whose influence are, in my belief, the most precious of our national possessions.

MR. THOMASSON was understood to support the Resolution, and to argue in favour of a Motion which he had put upon the Paper, and which, by the Rules of the House, he was precluded from moving, to the effect that in the opinion of the House a marriage with a deceased husband's brother should be rendered legal.

MR. C. PHIPPS said, he sincerely trusted that before this debate came to an end some hon. Member of his own profession would get up and answer the arguments which had been put to the House by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke). For himself, it would be impossible for him to look at this question as one of merely legal argument. He could not help thinking that it was far more a social question than a legal one, and that it was a matter affecting the welfare of the whole community. In common with many—in fact, in common with every Member of the House—he had listened with very great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst). He had listened with interest to that speech, because he willingly admitted that the hon. Member of all others was the exponent of the wants and wishes of the working classes; but on this question the House had to consider not only the interests and the desires of those who laboured by their hands, but also of those who laboured by their brains. The hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) asked for justice on behalf of those who worked from dark in the morning until after sunset; but he (Mr. C. Phipps) would ask the House to take into consideration not only those, but also that very numerous class, who, although perhaps they did not leave their houses at quite such an early period in the morning, were still practically removed from their children the whole of the day. The hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), so far as he could make out, supported the view he took by the opinions of Professors of Greek and Hebrew; but the question had been before so many learned men, not only Professors of Greek and Hebrew, but also Professors of the English language, that it was quite unnecessary for him (Mr. C. Phipps) to say a word about the archæological view. Again, as to the Scriptural view, he could very well leave that to the care of the theologians. It appeared to him that the question before them was rather what was to become of their sisters-in-law; or, if hon. Members did not like that way of expressing it, he would put it in this way—the question was what was to become of the women with whom, for many years, they had probably been accustomed to live on the same terms of intimacy as they had with their sisters? The hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) said that, in many cases, the relations between the husband and sister-in-law were of a most strained description, and that, in many cases, the husband was absolutely ignorant of his sister-in-law.

Well, he quite admitted that that occasionally might be the case; but, so far as England was concerned, he submitted with all due deference to the House that the contrary was generally the rule. It appeared to him that when death might have removed the wife, no one was so likely to take proper care of her children, and to have a knowledge of them and affection for them, than the sister; and if this Resolution were carried, and if on the top of the Resolution a Bill embracing its principle were passed, they would practically remove the very woman who would be most likely to take proper care of the children. For one case where such a Bill would bring any relief, it appeared to him that there would be 99 in which it would inflict a positive hardship; because he could not imagine that there were any number of men who would willingly submit their sisters-in-law to the taunts and inuendoes and whispered asides which would take place through their living in the house after the death of their wives. They had been told that this change in the law had been asked for by the people at large, and that he entirely denied. There was another question which agitated a great number of people, and that was the question of Sunday Closing. For a good many years he (Mr. C. Phipps) had followed the fortunes of Sunday Closing; and he should just like, in order to show that a measure legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister was not asked for by the public generally, to compare the Petitions received in favour of that proposal with those received in support of the Bill for Sunday Closing. He would take the last Report on Petitions. In that he found that those against any change in the law as to marriage with a deceased wife's sister numbered 179, containing the total number of 11,641 signatures; the number of Petitions in favour of the Bill being five, containing signatures of those connected with the movement in favour of the proposed change in the law. When, however, he came to look at the number of Petitions in favour of Sunday Closing, he found that no less than 5,084 had been presented, containing a total number of 429,177 signatures. That, to his mind, effectually disposed of the question as to whether any change in the law was earnestly required. He was bound to say himself that the signatures upon Petitions he viewed with a great deal of distrust; but he certainly believed that the number of Petitions was something of a criterion, and he had often heard it stated, both in the House and elsewhere, that the proper gauge of public feeling was the agitation in the way of Petitions, and the signatures which were attached to them. It had been said that one reason why they should alter the law was in consequence of the number of irregular marriages—or he would not call them irregular marriages, but irregular unions—which were constantly taking place in their midst. He very much regretted that, through an accident, he was unable to give some very interesting figures which he had recently come across; but he remembered this with regard to them, that the number of people who had married their deceased wife's sister was extremely small as compared with those living with other people outside the pale of the law. Well, there was another point which struck him very forcibly. If these marriages were very much desired by the people at large, certainly they would have seen and heard a great deal more about the question in the House of Commons than they had. The question, he believed, was first brought before the House in the year 1841, in which year the introduction of a Bill was refused. In the Parliament of 1847 a Bill on the subject was twice read a second time; in the Parliament of 1853 it was once read a second time; and on the next occasion it was brought forward it was rejected on the second reading. In the Parliament of 1857 it was twice read a second time; in the Parliament of 1859 it was twice rejected; in the Parliament of 1866 it was rejected once; and in the Parliament of 1868 the second reading was carried four times. There was, however, one remarkable fact about the Parliament of 1868, and that was that the majority commenced with 100 and dwindled down to 36. In the Parliament of 1874 the subject was negatived on the second reading; and here they were in the year 1884 of the Parliament of 1880, and this was the first time the matter had been brought before the House. Something had been said about America. America had been brought into the question, and allusion had been made to the Law of Divorce, and the estimable manner people lived together in that country. There was one thing that he did not think they had properly taken into consideration, and that was the very extreme facility with which the people living in America were able to obtain divorces. Directly the parties became tired of each other, or directly one person got tired of the other, there was no occasion to wait, as they had to do in England, for freedom by death, but a divorce was obtained. If they made the alteration in the law which they were to-night asked to make—an alteration on behalf of the deceased wife's sister—he wanted to know where on earth they were going to stop? It appeared to him that there was no half-way house in this matter. If an alteration were made they must pass on ad infinitum. He could not help believing that the people who supported this proposal had really not thoroughly thought the thing out; they had not placed themselves in the position of the widower, or in the position of the wife or the wife's sister. A good deal had been said about the male population; but very little attention had been paid to the female population in this controversy. As to the agricultural population, he in common, no doubt, with many other Members of the House, mixed a great deal amongst people connected with agriculture. He regretted that he was not in a position to speak with authority with regard to the few ales in the big towns; but this he could say, without the slightest hesitation, that the proposed change was not asked for in respect of the female agricultural population. Ever since he had had the honour of a seat in this House, he had always endeavoured to discuss the questions of the day—that was to say, not only agricultural questions, but all kinds of social questions—with his constituents and other people. He had brought this question on over and over again; but he never heard on one single occasion any call for the change. He opposed the Motion of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) because he believed it would be attended with untold misery to the helpless wives, and untold sorrow probably to their sisters. He opposed it because it was an agitation promoted in the interest of the few. If it were an agitation brought before them by what they could believe the majority, he granted that, to a certain extent, the ground would be cut from under the feet of those who opposed the alteration in the law; but the agitators were in a minority, although, unfortunately, that minority was a wealthy one. The agitation was a paid one; and he had no hesitation in saying that the people—he had almost said sinners, but those people to whom the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) referred as bidding defiance to the law—were, in the great majority of cases, wealthy persons. Why did these people bid defiance to the law? Why, because they were wealthy and able to do it. He opposed the present proposal, because, as he had said, it had not been properly thought out, and because he believed that the more it was studied the more it would be repudiated by the nation as a whole.

EARL PERCY said, that hon. Members who opposed this Motion had been met with the taunt that they had no theological argument to bring forward in support of their opinions. Well, to bring forward theological arguments on the floor of the House in favour of their view was a disagreeable task; but sooner than it should be said that there was no theological argument in favour of the view he and his Friends entertained, he was prepared, with the permission of the House, to say a few words on that point. He was met at the outset by a very great difficulty—namely, that the views on theology entertained by hon. Gentlemen opposite were of such a peculiar nature. The hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had taken occasion, in the course of his argument, to declare that the proper interpreters of the Old Testament were the Jews and Mahommedans, for the reason that upon the Old Testament those people founded their systems of religious belief. But he (Earl Percy) would have thought that the Christian religion was, at least, equally based on the Old Testament as the religion of the Jews or the Mahommedans. He would state this—and he regretted anyone should be found in the House, calling himself a Christian, who could seek to controvert it—that to the Christians was given a light by which to interpret Holy Scripture—both the New and the Old Testaments—which had not been given and he believed it a very bad sign when hon. Gentlemen got up and declared—

MR. HENEAGE said, the noble Earl (Earl Percy) had not quoted him correctly. What he had said was, that the Professors who had given their opinions were backed up by practices of the Jews and Mahommedans, who based their religion on the Old Testament.

EARL PERCY said, if that was the hon. Member's statement, he had, he thought, also said that he believed the Jews and Mahommedans were the best judges of what the Old Testament meant, because their religions were based upon that. He (Earl Percy) disputed that altogether, and maintained that Christians were the best judges. Then the hon. Gentleman had said that Roman Catholics were not against these marriages. He (Earl Percy) was prepared to say this, that the Roman Catholics had always declared such marriages to be invalid and to be illegal by the law of the Church; and if they would ask Cardinal Manning, they would find he would make a similar statement. It was perfectly true that dispensations had been given to enable a man to marry his deceased wife's sister; but dispensations had also been given for men to marry their nieces; and would hon. Gentlemen say that marriage with a niece was right in ordinary cases? The truth of the matter, so far as his point was concerned, was that Roman Catholics held that the Pope had power to dispense in certain cases with that which was the ordinary rule and law of the Church, and that it was the ordinary rule and law of the Church that these marriages should not take place. He did think, therefore, that those Gentlemen who taunted the opponents of the proposed change in the law for not bringing theology in support of their view should have informed themselves upon these very elementary points before they made the charge. The hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), in his speech, continually spoke of Protestants and Nonconformists, as though drawing a distinction between them, and probably his Nonconformist Friends would hardly thank him for thinking there was any difference between the two—for thinking that Nonconformists were not members of the Protestant religion. That, however, was simply a question of a phrase, and he (Earl Percy) now came to another part of the argument. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke), in his very eloquent speech, had referred to a text, and had chosen to interpret that in a particular sense. He had told them that they were not to use words except in their precise and literal meaning; and because the prohibition was not mentioned in the text they were to suppose that no prohibition existed—that, in fact, they were not to argue by analogy in this case, but were to hold what was not expressly allowed as forbidden. The hon. Gentleman quoted from other texts in the New Testament, which he objected to being taken in their literal meaning, saying that they could not mean what they said, that man and wife were one flesh, but that they must be taken in their general sense. Well, whether that was a fair mode of dealing with Bible criticism, he (Earl Percy) would not stop to inquire; but he would say that Biblical criticism was not based on any texts. He was well aware that they could prove anything from a text, and his view was that the theological argument was not based on any text of Scripture, but upon the general principle that ran through the whole of Holy Writ from the first chapter of Genesis to the last chapter of Revelation. That principle was that man and wife were one flesh, that the relations of the husband were the relations of the wife, and that the relations of the wife were the relations of the husband—that the relations of the husband were near of kin of the wife, and the relations of the wife were near of kin of the husband. Throughout the whole of Scripture this class of union was the type and figure of the higher and more sacred union, and a breach of this union, whether it were by the ordinary course of immorality, or whether by these illicit and forbidden communications, were symbolic and typical of greater crime. That was the principle that ran through the whole of the Bible, and that he held to be by far the strongest argument which could be offered against the Resolution—far stronger than any social argument could be—that so far from saying that they dare not support their view by theological arguments, he declared that, in his opinion, those were the only arguments that were worth discussing at all. The view which he entertained was the view not entertained by many hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he was afraid was not shared by some of those who were as willing and as ready as any of his Friends could be to take for their own personal guidance the law of the Church. They thought that in legislating for a great country, where many individuals were not of the same faith as those who sat on the Opposition side of the House, they should not subject them to laws that they felt binding on their own conscience. He should like to read to the House a passage from the speech of one for whose opinion the House had the greatest respect, and of whom it could not be said at any time, as had been said by the hon. Member for Stoke of many hon. Members who were opposed to him were remarkable for—namely, that he was wanting in common sense. The speaker to whom he referred said—

“But are we, who have realized the results of Christianity, to go back from Christianity to conscience? This, which is sometimes called the light of conscience, sometimes the light of nature, and which in no two countries or ages has ever been alike, has been of gradual growth and training from the infancy of mankind until it has reached the highest level on which Christianity is placed; and if we are to go back from that level, I ask where are we to stop? And I say that while I have a superior I should not be content to adopt an inferior standard. The law of the land, not in an arbitrary manner, but on principles based on Divine revelation, has adopted our present prohibitions in marriage; and I oppose the present measure because I see that it is part of a system which I do not say is intended to be so, but which in its working is certain to be, most pernicious to those results which the Christian religion has wrought out for mankind.”

MR. BROADHURST said, the noble Earl (Earl Percy) was mistaken in declaring that he had charged hon. Members who differed from him that they were wanting in common sense.

EARL PERCY apologized if he had misrepresented the hon. Member (Mr. Broadhurst) on that matter; but, however that was, the words he had read were the words of the present Prime Minister. He would make no apology to the House for quoting one more passage from the right hon. Gentleman. He had said—

“The best social result of Christianity is the perfect equality of man and woman as to the facility of contracting marriage. This Bill meddles for the first time with that equality. The hon. Member proposes to authorize the marriage of a man with a deceased wife's sister, and, therefore, with his wife's niece; he legislates for the man, but he does not propose, on the other hand, that the aunt may marry her husband's nephew. Is this a small change? When was woman first elevated to an equality with her stronger companion? Never till the Gospel came into the world. It was the slow but certain, and, I thank God, hitherto unshaken, result of Christianity, not considered as a system of dogmas, but as one of social influence, to establish a perfect equality between man and woman, as far as the marriage tie is concerned. The hon. Member now proposes to change this fundamental law and principle, and I have a right to ask him how far he intends to proceed, and whether he intends to have one marriage code for men and another for women?"

The right hon. Gentleman further said—

"When we are told that it is a matter of doubt, it appears to me to be so only in the sense that everything is a matter of doubt to those who may have an interest in disputing it, or who may desire to do so. Any man has a right to say, 'It is a matter of doubt because I doubt, and as I doubt it I am entitled to call it doubtful matter.' Even the great principles of Christianity embodied in the Common Law are principles which may be called in question by the licentiousness of individual minds. Private opinion may question the authority of the universal voice of Christendom on this matter; but it questions it exactly on the same grounds that it may question the whole results that Christianity has brought to mankind—that everything that Christianity has elevated out of the region of private opinion, and made part of the common property and intelligence of mankind."

It was not usual to quote at such length in this House; but he thought that when they found a passage so forcible and eloquently expressed, tending to support the view which they entertained—a passage from the speech of the Prime Minister—when they thought, alas! of a new light which in these latter days had dazzled the right hon. Gentleman's eyes, those who supported the right hon. Gentleman would excuse him (Earl Percy) for having brought an extract forward.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the Motion asked them to record their disapproval of the existing law. One hon. Member had told them that that law had been on the Statute Book for centuries, and another had told them that it had been in force for the last 50 years. Therefore, he thought it worth the while of the House for a moment or two to consider not only when the existing Act was passed, but the circumstances under which it was passed, and why it was passed. With all deference to the hon. Members opposite who expressed an opposite opinion, prior to 1835 marriages of the kind they had been discussing were only voidable in this country after a suit was instituted in the lifetime of both of the parties; and if no proceeding was taken during the lifetime of both the husband and wife they were perfectly valid, and the children were legitimate. In 1835, however, a certain noble House in this country, to which he would not further allude, found their succession to the Peerage very seriously compromised by the existence of the law as it then stood, and Lord Lyndhurst brought in a Bill solely—when it was brought in—for the purpose of dealing with the question of these marriages so far as proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court were concerned. He brought in a Bill to provide simply that any proceeding for invalidating these marriages should be instituted within two years after the marriage of the parties, or six months after the passing of the Act. There was no attempt in the Bill, as brought in, to deal with the marriages in the future; but two very distinguished Prelates of the English Church—the then Bishop of London and the then Bishop of Exeter—in Committee of the House of Lords raised the question as to the prohibition of future marriages; and if he were allowed to use such an expression in connection with those distinguished individuals, and that branch of the Legislature, practically a bargain was struck between Lord Lyndhurst and the Episcopal Bench, they sanctioning and condoning such marriages in the past, and he being prepared, at their instance, to insert a clause, making such marriages null and void in the future. That was a singular contract, so far as the Ecclesiastical Law was concerned, because, if these marriages were incestuous, it was beyond the power of the Legislature to make them valid. When the Bill came down to the House of Commons, the then Member for Bridport proposed that the clause prohibiting these marriages in the future should be struck out, and accordingly, by a majority of 12 in Committee, the clause was struck out. Therefore, at that stage of the proceedings in the House of Commons, the House declined to declare these marriages null and void in the future. Sir William Follett, who had charge of the Bill, on Report moved the reinsertion of the clause; and he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had it from those who were Members at the time, that a strong appeal was made to hon. Members by those interested in these marriages, on the ground that it was necessary to avoid prejudicing the other portions of the Bill in the House of Lords. They were appealed to, to allow the Bill to pass in a form in which it would secure the assent of the House of Lords, a distinct pledge being given to them that, in another year, a fresh Bill would be introduced to deal with future marriages. Under these circumstances, the House of Commons, by a majority of 58 votes, restored the clause. He thought that when the history of that legislation was told, it did not appear very creditable to those who had to do with it. It did not stand on very high moral grounds, and did not seem to him at all calculated to enhance the purity and sanctity of marriage. But a succession to a Peerage was secured, a noble Duke was made legitimate, and, as a compensation for that, an injury was inflicted upon a large section of the people of the country. As far as that Act ratified the past it was a distinct violation of the Canon Law, if the Legislature of that day thought the Canon Law binding. Then, the next stage of the history of this controversy—and he was going to allude to it because an hon. Member opposite had endeavoured to impress upon them that this question had never been thought out, and that it was inexperienced men who, in 1884, had discovered that these marriages were regular and proper—was the Royal Commission of 1847. There having been a good deal of dissatisfaction, and some of the clergy then in charge of parishes in large towns having themselves discovered the evil results of the Act to which the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth had alluded, and having called the attention of those in power to the evil that this legislation was producing, a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the Law of Marriage. And he should like to call the attention of the House to the names of the Commissioners, for he believed that when he had stated them hon. Members would agree that such men were perfectly capable of thinking out the question, if anyone was. They had had allusion to-night to the present Bishop of Lichfield; but it was another Bishop of Lichfield who was appointed on this Commission—the Bishop of 30 or 40 years ago, who was not only one of the ripest scholars, but one of the ablest and most impartial men who ever adorned the Episcopal Bench. He referred to Dr. Lonsdale, who was at the head of the Commission. Associated with this Prelate was a distinguished Member of the Conservative Party, a man known as a lawyer and a statesman—Mr. James Stuart-Wortley; Dr. Lushington, the eminent ecclesiastical lawyer; Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams; and the Lord Advocate. The Report which these distinguished men, after receiving an immense amount of evidence, presented, was a conclusive proof that the question had been fully thought out in 1847. One of the first questions to which the Commissioners addressed themselves was the point the noble Earl opposite (Earl Percy) had dealt with with so much force, and which he rebuked the supporters of the Resolution with being ignorant upon—namely, the law of the Roman Catholic Church. The Commissioners found that in the Roman Catholic Church these marriages were prohibited as a matter of discipline; but the prohibition might be, and was, dispensed with by the Pope. The noble Earl would admit that Cardinal Wiseman was acquainted, at all events, with the elementary principles of the law of the Roman Catholic Church. He (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would give two or three questions and answers from the evidence of Cardinal Wiseman. He was asked—

“Q.—Taking the question first with reference to the Scripture, is such a marriage held by your Church as prohibited?”

“A.—Certainly not; it is considered a matter of ecclesiastical regulation.

“Q.—When you say that such a marriage is ‘unlawful,’ do you mean unlawful by the law of the Church?”

“A.—Yes.

“Q.—And when you think proper to dispense with such unlawfulness, you think proper to dispense with the regulations of the Church, and not with a portion of Scripture?”

“A.—Certainly.

“Q.—With respect to marriages of this description, do you find amongst Catholics that those persons who have contracted such marriages are received with the same kindness and good feeling as persons who have contracted other marriages?”

“A.—With a dispensation, certainly; as it is not thought disgraceful the moment the Church has given a dispensation.”

[“Hear, hear!”] The noble Earl (Earl Percy) said “Hear, hear!” but this statement of Cardinal Wiseman’s was not the impression the noble Earl wished to convey to the House. The argument the noble Earl had conveyed to the House, and which he had rebuked the supporters of the Resolution for not accepting, was that the Roman Catholic Church disapproved of these marriages, because they did not rest on Scripture. They had heard it said to-night that there was hardly any other country where these marriages were allowed; but the Commissioners, on the other hand, said that in all Protestant States, with the exception of some of the Cantons of Switzerland, these marriages were permitted; and, as to America, they quoted from one of the most eminent Judges in America, Mr. Justice Storey—one of the most eminent Judges that either America or this country had ever produced—to the effect that in most of the American States marriages of this kind were not only lawful, but were deemed in a moral and religious and Christian sense exceedingly praiseworthy, although in some few States the English prohibition was in force. The Commissioners, after finding that these marriages were approved of among the Jews and the great body of Protestant Dissenters, and that there was great difference of opinion on the subject amongst the clergy of the Established Church, came to this practical conclusion—

"Some persons contend that these marriages are forbidden, expressly or inferentially, by Scripture. If this be admitted, cadit questio."

And the Commissioners added—

"We consider that the feeling against these marriages is in a great measure founded rather on a vague and uninformed assumption that they are prohibited by God's Word, than on a mature examination either of the Scripture or the law of the Church."

The Commissioners unanimously — Bishops and Judges—were

"Constrained to express our belief that the Statue has failed to attain its object, but also to express our doubt whether any measure of a prohibitive character would be effectual."

That being so, they were met to-night by two classes of argument, which were mutually contradictory. The first speaker on the other side of the House (Colonel Makins) did not lay much stress upon the Divine Law, but had rested a great deal of his argument on the Canonical Law. The second speaker put the whole question entirely on social considerations, and gave up altogether the religious argument which the noble Earl had galvanized into life again. What he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) contended was, that the House of Commons was not a competent Body to expound texts of Scripture. He was not going to presume to express an opinion upon them; but, at all events, so far as the meaning of Scripture on this subject was involved, there had been the greatest difference of opinion between the most eminent men in all ages on the question. He maintained that the allegation of a Divine Law, the existence of which was disputed by one half of Christendom, was too slender a basis on which to rest a restriction which imposed on the nation the special opinions of one section of the community. In the Church of Rome there was evidently a difference of opinion; for, whilst Cardinal Manning was against these marriages, Cardinal Newman, whose opinion was entitled to great weight, and whose mind was singularly free from any bias in favour of advanced or free legislation in Church matters, had stated distinctly in the passage quoted by the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) that if he looked on this question as it affected the poorer classes, he was in favour of a relaxation of the law, but as it affected the richer classes, he was in favour of the law as it existed. One hon. Member had referred to the opinion of the Church of Scotland. Dr. Chalmers was in favour of these marriages. Dr. Norman Macleod was of the same opinion. Taking everything into consideration, he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was of opinion that it was the duty of the Legislature to leave the matter to individual conscience. A man might think these marriages wrong, but he was not bound to contract them; and, under any circumstances, he had no right to impose his opinions on other people who did not share them. In "another place," Lord Houghton had quoted the opinion of the Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Philpotts, who, shortly before his death, said that if the law did not interfere with the Church of England he had no concern with it, and if the law gave the right to contract such marriages with Dissenters he had not a word to say against it. That was the opinion of the Bishop who, of all others, they might say was responsible for the law; and, that being so, they must, he thought, regard this question solely from a social point of view. That point of view was a ground upon which it was very difficult to found prohibitory legislation. What a number of gentlemen or the Legislature might think of social considerations was apart from moral considerations. If these marriages were morally wrong, nothing could set them right; but if they were not morally wrong—and there were a large class of individuals who thought them right—it was very thin ice to tread on to say that, because they themselves might not think them right, therefore they were to be forbidden. No stronger argument had been used against the Motion than that, which had been fairly put, that the residence of the sister-in-law would be interfered with if these marriages were allowed. But the law could not prevent affection springing up between these parties. It did not—experience showed that it did not. The legal prohibition was powerless. If they said that, because these people could not marry, they should never entertain an affection for each other, their argument would be strong—he did not say it would be unanswerable; but the mere fact of their passing an Act of Parliament saying that they should not marry, did not, and would not, prevent them from entertaining that very affection, the very existence of which, it was said, the law should prevent. All that the law could do was to give a conventional sanction to what was the true position of the parties. The position of any lady residing in a widower's house was a difficult and delicate one; and the argument used on this head as to the sister-in-law would apply in the same way to cousins, and even to strangers. If they allowed the parties to be placed in circumstances that permitted affection to arise, they had no right to crush that affection, but the converse. If the affection did not arise—and in the majority of cases it did not, for he was willing to admit that the class he was talking about was a minority, even where the circumstances would permit of these marriages—where was the difficulty? Someone talked about slander and insinuations cast at people—about the mean whisperings of the envious tongues of neighbours; but that was not a ground for passing legislation. They must not interfere with the rights of persons because some people might, under certain circumstances, make offensive references to them. They could not put a man and his sister-in-law on the same footing as a man and his sister. Human nature was stronger than the canons of any Church, stronger than any Act of Parliament. They could not upset the conviction which prevailed amongst a large number of the people that the best step-mother for motherless children was the sister of the mother who had gone. The main strain of the argument to-night was in reference to the poor, and they had been told that the proper remedy was some gigantic scheme for housing the poor—that by providing the poor with additional accommodation in their dwellings they could grapple with the difficulty. Well, those acquainted with the matter—and no one better than the hon. Member for Stoke—knew that with the poor this was a question of the gravest character. In the homes of the working classes there were not arrangements which enabled the relationship of a widower with the sister-in-law to be defined and guarded as it could be in other classes of life above them; and, no doubt, where the deceased wife's sister went to reside with the working man, and he wished to marry her and she wished to marry him, it was in the interest of morality as well as in the interest of the children and of the man that that marriage should take place. But there was another consideration. He had been dealing with the religious and social questions; but there was the question of the anomaly in the law as between the Mother Country and the Colonies. There could not be two codes of morality, one for Melbourne and one for London. There could not be two laws for people under the same Sovereign. Her Majesty reigned over 9,000,000 square miles, and yet it was only in 120,000 of them that these marriages were forbidden. If the Crown had given consent to these marriages in the Colonies, there could be no argument based on moral considerations why the Crown should not give consent to them in this country. Assertions had been made—and some hon. Members had spoken incorrectly and unfairly—as to the morality of America and our Colonies. Vague assertions were made which were incapable of proof. In reply to them, he ventured to say that the relations between husband and wife, and between man and woman, were as pure and as high in the Colonies as they were in Great Britain itself. Endorsing every word of that section of the speech of the noble Earl (Earl Percy) containing the extract from the speech of the Prime Minister, showing what Christianity had done for woman, he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) believed that no Christian people had ever recognized the ideal of womanly purity and conjugal sanctity as had the Anglo-Saxon race, and wherever that race prevailed these marriages took place; and there was not a tittle of evidence from either Legislature, Judge, or Representative in any Colony or in any State in America, to show that these marriages had produced immoral results. Under these circumstances, he submitted that the Motion was a just and a wise one. He was glad that the debate had been conducted, so far as those who had opposed the Motion were concerned, with a moderation in tone and language very different from what they had been accustomed to out-of-doors, and very different from that which they found in the various leaflets by which hon. Members had been annoyed and disgusted. The question was a very difficult and a very grave one, on which feelings were very strongly excited on one side or the other; but those who, on conscientious grounds, maintained the restriction of the present law, had no right to apply to those who differed from them language imputing one of the foulest crimes that human nature was capable of. He saw the word "incest" used in connection with the proposal to legalize these marriages. The Bill was called the "Sisters' Marriage Bill" and "the Incestuous Marriage Bill." ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) cheered that term. Let him tell the hon. and learned Member that the word implied the deepest moral degradation—[Mr. WARTON: Hear, hear!]

—and that there were men, and women too, who were in favour of the relaxation of the law, and who had themselves contracted these marriages, who were as incapable of this moral degradation as the hon. and learned Member himself, or as any Member of the House. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) asked them, to-night, whether they knew in their own individual circles cases which would be affected by a Bill to legalize these marriages? While the hon. Member was speaking, he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had thought of one case, that of a friend of his own, who was now dead, and as all the other parties concerned were also dead, he might be allowed to allude to the case. His friend was a man of eminent attainments and of eminent public service; and if he were to mention his name—which he should not—many hon. Members would join in testimony to his virtues and great public service. This gentleman, shortly after his marriage, was confronted with the calamity that his hon. Friend alluded to—he saw the mother of his young children destined to an early death from pulmonary consumption. On her death-bed she asked him, almost in articulo mortis, after they had received their last Communion together, to promise her, if ever he took another wife, he would endeavour to secure her sister to be the mother of her children. He gave the pledge, and many years after that, having waited in vain for the necessary alteration in the law, he was compelled to expatriate himself at the zenith of his position, to seek another domicile, not in a foreign country—startling irony of the situation—but still to remain a subject of the Queen in one of our Colonies, where he fulfilled his pledge to his dying wife. When he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) recalled to his memory this friend, and men like him, his indignation deepened to disgust at the prurient insinuations with which this controversy had been defiled. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had told them again and again, during the present Session, that the true protector of the rights of minorities was the House of Lords; but in that House a majority of the temporal Peers, ranging from Princes of the Blood to the last addition and greatest ornament of the House, had been outvoted, and might be outvoted again, by a clerical caste. But the noblest tradition of the House of Commons was the readiness with which it used its vast, and, when it was in earnest, its resistless power to prevent oppression and redress injustice, no matter how few or insignificant were the oppressed. He knew it was a minority for whom he was pleading. If it were a majority, all the arguments of the other side, theological, canonical, clerical, ecclesiastical, and social would have been long since scattered to the winds. It was a minority who asked for this relief—he came to-night to appeal to the House on behalf of a minority of pure men and pure women. [A laugh.] The hon. and learned Member for Bridport might laugh; but let him get up openly and say that these people were not pure. He repeated, he came to the House to appeal on behalf of a minority of pure men and pure women who were smarting under these restrictions. He appealed not only on their behalf, but on behalf of innocent children whom a merciless sacerdotalism branded with the stigma of illegitimacy; and he trusted that the House, on the first occasion of its dealing with the question, would, notwithstanding the inarticulate objections of hon. Gentlemen opposite, record by a large majority its conviction of the impolicy, the injustice, and the cruelty of this prohibition.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: It was with sincere regret that I heard the latter part of the speech of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). Much as I differ from his arguments, I thoroughly appreciate and admire his logic. I accepted what he said as to the moderation with which the debate had been conducted by those opposed to the proposed alteration of the law, and I was prepared to pay him a similar tribute; but in the latter part of his speech he used words which stir up some of the most bitter feelings of ecclesiastical hatred. He spoke of a sacerdotal caste, and he used such phrases as "intolerable" and "merciless sacerdotalism." I believe the hon. Member belongs to a denomination of Christians which is not mine. I believe that we have broad differences between us. Those differences might hereafter come up in salient antagonism; but I should be ashamed of myself if I were ever to use towards that form of Christianity which is dear to him phrases of contemptuous hostility analogous to those which he has just thrown upon my Church. So much for that part of the hon. Member's speech, of which I am glad not to think any more. The hon. Gentleman told us, with very thrilling pathos, an anecdote of a dying wife who invited her husband to make her sister the future guardian and nurse of her children. The story, as he told it, was very effectively rendered; but it was a story which must be judged, one way or the other, by facts and not by diction. Such an alliance as that was either right in the eyes of God and expedient in the eyes of man, or it was not. If it was right, it did not require a power of narrative like that of the hon. Member's to recommend it to the House; but if it was wrong, all his gifts of thrilling narration could not make it tolerable. The hon. Member dwelt on the history of Lord Lyndhurst's Act; and, while striving to make the House believe that the present law was not the ancient law of England previous to the year 1835, the hon. Gentleman gave copious anecdotes of the genesis of that Act. I cannot follow him in seeing much importance in the minutiae of its Parliamentary history. The important matter is, what was the Act which received the Royal Assent? On this head I want to bring before the House very distinctly that, whatever may have been the Amendments in Committee to the Bill, one thing is certain, and that is that Lord Lyndhurst's Act, in its ultimate form, is now the law of the land. Another thing is equally certain—namely, that Lord Lyndhurst's Act, in that ultimate form, simply re-enacts and carries out the ancient law of England, with this difference, that marriages which were once voidable are now void. So the controversy is narrowed up to the question, What is the difference between marriages voidable and void? I will give the answer in the words of a lawyer to whom, I think, even the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) will bow—I mean the late Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns); and I could call even upon the hon. Member to confess that the description of Lord Lyndhurst's Act which he gave is quite the description of it that an impartial critic would give after hearing the words I am about to quote. Lord Cairns, speaking in the House of Lords on the 11th of June, 1883, said—

"My Lords, is that a true description of this measure"—namely, the proposed Bill for legalising marriage with a wife's sister—"that it puts things exactly in the position they were in before Lord Lyndhurst's Act passed? I speak with some knowledge of the law, I hope, and I assert that nothing more inaccurate could be said. I say it is perfectly inaccurate so to represent this matter. I say that before Lord Lyndhurst's Act passed these marriages were illegal and void. This has been so decided by your Lordship's House as the highest tribunal in the realm. They were technically spoken of as voidable, no doubt. That is to say, the sentence of the Court was needed to declare that they were void. But, as Lord Brougham said, they were voidable because they were void."

I appeal to Lord Brougham, who was no reactionary Tory, no opponent of Reform, and whose name I should have thought was venerated by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Benches opposite—I am satisfied with Lord Brougham's view of the state of the law. Then the hon. Member dwelt a good deal upon the Report of the Royal Commission. I was in the House of Commons at the time when that Address was carried, asking for the Royal Commission, and I acquiesced in its appointment. But I do not pretend to say that I think the decision to which the House came to was quite the wisest that might have been arrived at; and I am glad to think that my countrymen have virtually come to my conclusion. If ever a document was proved to be a dead letter it was the Report of that Royal Commission, in spite of the eminent men who sat upon it. The inquiry, however, brought out one or two interesting facts, one of which was that, while the Commissioners professed to have found traces of 1,608 alliances of the kind, they balanced the statement with the pregnant fact that it was discovered that only 40 of these unions had been formed among the poorer classes. Lord Hatherley afterwards took very great interest in this question, and he made an inquiry in Westminster. He found that in the two parishes of Westminster there were 60,000 inhabitants, of whom 40,000 were poor people. Only one marriage of this sort could be found amongst this large population. Of course, the audacious lawyer was called to account, and the friends of the wife's sister found out the stupendous fact that Lord Hatherley's estimate ought to have been doubled, for not one, but two such marriages could be found amongst the 60,000 inhabitants of Westminster. My hon. Friend and Successor the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) took care not to tell us how many of that large body of themselves—Memorialists in Stoke—have contracted this alliance, or how many are persons who employ themselves in the very common amusement of talking about and interfering with their neighbours' business. In the course of my connection with Stoke I heard of two marriages of this kind, and I came directly across a third. The gentleman who had contracted an alliance with his deceased wife's sister was so pleased at my not shirking my convictions on this question during my first candidature, that when I went a second time to the borough, to return triumphant, I found him one of my most active supporters. Such is my experience of Stoke. In fact, what I have never found, and what no one has ever found, is anything like a consistent growing feeling in the country in favour of the proposed alteration of the law. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) certainly astonished me by some of his arguments. He began by asserting that the only theological argument against permitting marriage with a deceased wife's sister was a certain verse in Leviticus, of which there was only one interpretation. However, there happen to be two quite different interpretations of it; there is the marginal interpretation, and there is one of the text, and I invite the hon. and learned Gentleman to read the margin as well as the text. Then his "only one interpretation" totally and absolutely ignores the verses that precede the 18th verse of Leviticus 18—those from the 6th to the 17th verses of that chapter—which lay down the table of prohibited degrees, not by specifying every degree, but by specifying one or other of all the analogous degrees in the person of one sex or of the other—prohibiting marriage with the daughter in the name of the mother, or with the wife's sister in the name of the brother's widow. So understood, the prohibitions are identically the prohibitions in our authoritative Table, and that is the ground on which we say these marriages have the law of Scriptural prohibition. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) talks of the great purity of private life in America. That is not a question on which I wish to enter; but I only point out that in the year 1860 there was one divorce amongst 59 marriages in Massachusetts. In 1878, in the same State, there was one divorce in 21 marriages. In Vermont there was one divorce in 14 marriages; in Rhode Island, one divorce in 12; and in Connecticut, one divorce in 11 marriages. Deducting the Roman Catholics, who do not admit divorce, there was in Massa-chusetta, amongst Protestant marriages, one divorce in 14 marriages, and in Connecticut one divorce in eight marriages. That is the state of things in the country we are called upon to take as our example. We know that in America, and in Germany, and in Holland, and in Denmark, and in all countries where the wife's sister can be taken to wife, the brother's widow can be taken to wife, that an own niece can be taken to wife, and that an own aunt can be taken to wife. [Laughter]. Hon. Members may think it very amusing, but I see nothing amusing in a statement so very appalling to all sound common sense and elementary morality. In France, by the Code Napoleon, alliance with near relations, either by affinity or consanguinity, was prohibited; but in 1832, in the early reign of Louis Philippe, an Act of the French Legislature was passed, allowing all these marriages with sister-in-law, niece, or aunt, subject to dispensation, not from the Church, but from the Head of the State; a thing which, I believe, is a mere formality. I ask the House solemnly to pause and to consider well whether it will or will not, by a Resolution which, though barren in itself, still has a certain dynamic effect in the country, take a first step towards a state of things from which I am persuaded the majority even of the hon. Gentlemen who support this Resolution must recoil with horror. I have but one thing more to say. The hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) wanted to make out that all the Professors of Theology in the various Universities were of one way of thinking, and that his own, upon this question. He strove to base his assertion on some misleading statements of a pamphlet which has appeared under the Earl of Dalhousie's name, and as to which I advise examination before it is relied on. Let me tell the House that I directed letters of inquiry to the 41 British Revisers of the Old and New Testaments, and that I hold replies from 29 of them. Of these 29 Revisers, 20 are opposed to those marriages, while only seven are favourable to them, and two are ostensibly neutral. But I gather that one, at least, of these two is really opposed. I will not keep the House from a Division; but I trust that, whatever the result, it may not be the first step to national demoralization.

Mr. Beresford Hope

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, it was not his intention to detain the House more than a few minutes. Before giving the reason for, he might say with truth, the only political recantation he had ever made during the long period he had had the honour of a seat in the House of Commons, he had, in the first instance, to regret that upon a question which, of all others, ought to be taken out of the domain of religion and theology, the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) had followed the example of his Dissenting Brother (Mr. H. H. Fowler) by drawing upon the floor of the House a false scent upon this subject. Grand and eloquent as were the sentiments expressed in the earlier part of the hon. Member's (Mr. H. H. Fowler's) speech, the hon. Member, in his observations, betrayed something which approached very nearly religious bigotry and intolerance. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) was aware that the most liberal men in England were necessarily Dissenters. On one subject, however, it was not true that Dissenters were the most liberal of men, and that was the subject of religion. Upon that subject Dissenters were the most intolerant people he had ever met. Upon the present occasion, however, he did not mean to dwell upon theological questions. The religion to which he had the honour to belong allowed a dispensation in the case of a marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and, therefore, as an obedient servant of the Roman Catholic Church, he assumed there was no innate immorality in such a marriage. The Church of England, which was represented by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), had forgotten to tell them that, when the particular form of worship now known in the country as the Doctrine of the Church of England was first instituted, the reason that a row was made about these particular marriages was that Cranmer and others did not want to acknowledge the Papal supremacy. They denied to the Pope of Rome the power of dispensation, and they made a difficulty as to Henry the Eighth's marriage with his brother's wife, Catharine of Arragon; and they had continued the row they had with the Church of Rome to the present day. Many years ago he heard a great countryman of his—Richard Sheil—speaking of a man who was lately the Lord Chief Justice of England—Cockburn—say, after hearing a speech of the noble Lord, “his Christianity is unattached.” However right Sheil might have been in reference to Cockburn at that period, he was right in stating that Christianity, or any form of religion, ought not, upon questions of this kind, to enter into their consideration. He agreed with every word which had been said by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Berwick (Colonel Milne-Home). He agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend in what he said as to the effect of such marriages as were contemplated upon social institutions; there was no man in the House who viewed with greater abhorrence the idea of such marriages being contracted; but this was an age of opportunism. It was not sufficient to say that a few men of high position and of high social connections objected to marriage with a deceased wife's sister as likely to break up their arrangements. Hon. Members ought to picture to themselves the case of a man in one of the large manufacturing districts of Lancashire and Yorkshire, who, perhaps, had but a very small lodging, and who might be left wifeless with three or four children to take care of. When his wife was removed, the person a man looked to to nurse his children was necessarily the person who was best known to them, and dearest to them, and that was the wife's sister. Owing to the crowded state of the dwelling, it was very possible that, in some cases, immoral consequences might ensue upon the deceased wife's sister being in the house unless marriage with her was allowed the man. [A laugh.] It might be a matter of laughter to hon. Gentlemen, but it was no laughing matter to the unfortunate artisan who found his wife removed from him. It was for the House to say whether, for social sentimental reasons, and to please a few in high stations, it would sacrifice the interests of the masses of the people. He maintained that, if the House laid claim to represent the nation, it ought not to regard the sentiments of a class, but ought only to look to the interests of the masses of the people. He disliked the whole question; but, for the reasons he had assigned, he intended to vote for the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst).

Question put.

Main Question put.

Resolved, That, in view of the painful and unnecessary hardships inflicted upon large numbers of people of this Country by the Law prohibiting Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, it is the opinion of this House that a measure of relief is urgently called for.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDER (NO. 3) BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC LOCAL VETO (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 12.]

(Mr. McLagan, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Waddy, Mr. Dick-Peddie, Mr. Noel, Mr. Mackintosh.)

MR. M'LAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was drafted very much upon the lines of the Permissive Prohibitory Bill introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who, more than anyone else, had urged him to bring in this measure, and said that it was one after his own heart. It had been asked why he limited the Bill to Scotland? He did so for three reasons. First, because temperance legislation and public opinion were more advanced in that country than in England or Ireland. The second reason was, that in the Local Option Division, out of 60 Scottish Members 46 voted for and only 2 against it; and though out of those 46 some Members might attach a different meaning to what Local Option was, there could be no doubt of the fact that they voted for that Motion as it was framed and explained by the hon. Member for Carlisle. But, more than that, at least 11 Members voted for the Permissive Prohibitory Bill, of which this was merely a transcript. The Scottish Members who did vote for that Bill were the hon. and gallant Members for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) and Kincardine (General Sir George Balfour), the hon. Members for Dumfries Burghs (Mr. Ernest Noel), Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), Greenock (Mr. J. Stuart), the Border Burghs (Mr. Travelyan), Inverness (Mr. Fraser Mackintosh), Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell), Leith Burghs (Mr. A. Grant), Orkney (Mr. Laing), and Wick Burghs (Mr. Pender). Therefore, he thought he was justified, having such good men and true at his back, to introduce a Bill which embodied the principle of Local Option. The third reason why he limited this Bill to Scotland was that his hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, in his address to his constituents some years ago, complained of the difference of opinion which prevailed amongst the temperance reformers, and called upon them to formulate their demands, because, he said, it was impossible for any Government to introduce a measure unless they knew what these demands were. That, he thought, was very proper advice, and now the temperance party had formulated their demands. About two months ago a resolution was passed by the representatives of 17 temperance organizations that there should be a convention held in Edinburgh, and the meeting declared, amongst other resolutions, that any legislative measure for the sale of intoxicating liquors would not be satisfactory which did not confer on the ratepayers in parishes, burghs, and other districts the full power of controlling the drink traffic, and also the prohibiting of it where the majority should consider it meet. This was what the convention was agreed upon, and this was the principle of the Bill now before the House. They further declared that, while believing that all attempts satisfactorily to regulate the liquor traffic had failed, they were of opinion that any legislative measure which merely superseded the present Licensing Courts by Town Councils and County Boards would not be in accordance with the wishes of the community, and would fail to remedy the evils caused by the drink traffic. This, then, was what the temperance reformers in Scotland desired, and he might state that it need not excite any surprise if there should be opposition offered to any measure which did not contain the principles of these two declarations. Now, what did the Bill propose to do? It did not propose to abolish all licences directly and immediately on its passing. It was not a Licensing Bill; it was not to be called so; but what the Bill did propose

was this—to give power to the majority of the ratepayers of any parish, burgh, or district to abolish all licences which they deemed meet. The Bill would be inoperative until that majority was obtained. In fact, it had been properly said—"Until the breath of life be breathed into the Bill by the people it remains a dead letter." He divided his remarks into four parts—(1) The necessity for the Bill, (2) the objects of it, (3) the principle, and (4) the machinery. He would first speak as to the necessity for the Bill. The measure had not met with much favour in the country. All sorts of depreciatory epithets had been applied to it. It had been called "dishonest." ["Hear, hear!"] It had been called "a huge joke" and "a great blunder," and it had been called "tyrannical." ["Hear, hear!"] He found his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) agreed with these epithets. In the Preamble to the Bill it was stated—"That the traffic in intoxicating liquors was the main cause of poverty, disease, and crime, depressed trade and commerce, increased local taxation, and danger to the safety and the welfare of the community."

There were hon. Gentlemen who said it was not the traffic; it was the abuse of drink. It was the consumption. He was not going to quarrel with those hon. Members, and he would admit at once that the abuse and consumption of drink were the immediate causes; but they would admit that where the evils existed there was the traffic. It was idle to say that the traffic was not the cause of those drunken riots which they saw before the public-houses, or those quarrels between husbands and wives or starving children, of the diseases in the hospitals, of four-fifths, or nine-tenths, of the crime, and of seven-tenths of the pauperism of the country, when they saw those men and women attracted by the glare of the public-house, hovering about the door, and then darting into the house as a moth was drawn into a flame to its own destruction. In a publication called The Fruits of the Liquor Traffic, we found detailed some of the accidents and crimes due to the drink traffic that occurred in the last week of 1883 and the first week of 1884:—Twenty-five perilous accidents through drink, 13 robberies through drink, 5 cases of drunken insanity, 62 drunken outrages and violent assaults, 20 drunken stabbings, cuttings, and woundings; 5 cases of drunken cruelty to children, 72 assaults of women through drink, 13 cases of juvenile intoxication, 72 drunken assaults on constables, 94 premature, sudden, or violent deaths through drink; 18 cases of suicide attempted through drink, 15 cases of drunken suicide completed, 12 drunken manslaughters or murders. With such a category of crime before them, need they be surprised at the words of the late lamented Duke of Albany—"Drink, our terrible enemy, the only terrible enemy we have to fear in this country?" Archdeacon Farrar, in a recent sermon, also said—

"We have heard much in these few days of 'Horrible London,' and of the bitter cry of its objects. What makes these slums so horrible? I answer with the certainty and confidence of one who knows—Drink. And what is the remedy? I tell you that every remedy you attempt will be a miserable failure; I tell the nation, with the conviction founded on experience, that there will be no remedy till you save these outcasts from the temptations of drink. Leave the drink, and you might build palaces for them in vain. Leave the drink, and before a year was over your palaces would still reek with dirt and squalor, with infamy and crime."

It was self-evident that the traffic was the cause of the increase in local taxation, and also of the dulness of trade, if they were the cause of the pauperism and the crime. If the £130,000,000 spent on drink was spent on clothing and food, they would see a difference in the trade of the country. The Chief Constable of Liverpool had said—

"Shut public-houses on a Saturday night, and you will not have provisions enough for the people of Liverpool."

Let the House pass this Bill, and he would venture to say trade would not only be improved, but they would permit the people to improve their dwellings. At present they were entirely at the mercy of the licensing authorities. The poor man must inhabit any house he could get, even though it was surrounded by public-houses; while the wealthy man, by the influence of his wealth, was able to prevent any public-house being set down near his dwelling. They knew of many cruel cases where a working man had left a large town to avoid the turmoil and bustle, and all the horrible scenes which existed about the public-houses, and had gone to some neighbouring village where he might have peace and quietness. He had not been there any time when some publican fixed upon a house, the licence for which was granted by the Justices. Thus, there was forced upon the locality what Lord Cairns called "traps for the working man," by which the peace of the neighbourhood was disturbed, the decencies of society outraged, and the sanctity of home violated. Having spoken of the necessity for the Bill, he came now to the object of the Bill. The object of the Bill was to enable owners and occupiers of property in burghs in Scotland to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors within such areas. If the Bill was passed, and if it was found that a majority in any district were in favour of adopting the Act, then the Act should be adopted, and after that there would be no sale and no exchange whatever of liquor in that particular district. It was mentioned in the Bill "by a majority." There was a great difference of opinion upon that point. Some spoke of a majority of one, and he did not blame those who read the Bill in that light. Others spoke of the majority as three-fifths, two-thirds, and seven-ninths. He only wished to acknowledge the principle of the majority. His own opinion was that it was in vain to attempt to change the social habits of any people unless that attempt was backed by a strong public opinion, and he was quite prepared, if the Bill should ever reach Committee, to vote for a large majority. At present he left it open for the Committee to say what majority they thought proper. He was aware that when the hon. Member for Carlisle introduced his Bill many Members did not approve of a two-thirds majority; they wanted a much larger majority, and they only voted for the Bill with the knowledge that the majority could be altered in Committee. They could do the same with this Bill, and he himself was prepared for a much larger majority. Sundry objections were taken to this Bill. One was that it limited the power of the people to prohibition, and did not allow the people to control at the same time. He admitted that the Bill was directed to prohibition. It was not a Licensing Bill, and therefore he was not going to interfere with the licences at all. He left the licensing authorities to do as they pleased. He said to them—"Go on licensing as you please; all I want is that if the people want to put down public-houses they should be allowed to do so." It was a mistake, however, to suppose if the Bill was passed that it would have no controlling power. He believed it would have a great moral influence on the Justices in dealing with the Licensing Question. Let the Justices not attend properly to the conducting of the traffic, or let them not reduce the number of houses, and the people would at once say—"If you do not reduce the number of these houses and pay more attention to the control of the traffic, we shall at once call a meeting and take steps to forbid the traffic altogether." The moral power and influence of the people would be as great as if they had a legal power. He had no hesitation in saying that. No doubt, a great deal of good had been already done by reducing the number of public-houses; but he thought there was far too much said of the good that had been done in this way; because, while there had been a reduction in the number of public-houses, there was still a great amount of drunkenness in certain districts. He would give a few figures to show what he meant. In 1858, in Glasgow, the number of public-houses was 1,622; the rent of these houses averaged £40 16s., and the gross rental was £66,000. In 1883 the number of public-houses had increased to 1,778, and the rents had risen from £40 16s. to £104, while the gross value of the houses had risen from £66,000 to £185,000. What they did when they reduced the number of public-houses was to increase the accommodation of the existing houses, and so to create a monopoly. He decidedly objected to that. He thought it was quite right to put down public-houses; but that could be carried too far. If they were to have public-houses at all, it was better to have a reasonable number, and still better to have none at all. Another objection had been raised to the Bill, to the effect that it prohibited manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquors. No doubt, if the Bill were carried out in its entirety that would be the case; but they would require to have a great majority of people in favour of it. Suppose that the Bill never passed, and the majority of the electors were so impressed with the evils of drunkenness that they determined to put down all public-houses and do away with the manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquor, and supposing that became a question at a General Election, what would be the effect of it? The effect of it would be that a majority would be returned to that House pledged to carry out that reform; and the Government would at once introduce a Bill to put down the importation and manufacture of drink throughout the country. His Bill would only do that by a slower process, but under similar circumstances, if a large majority of the people were in favour of it. The measure was wide in its scope, but limited in its operation; and what he considered one of the great merits of the Bill was this—that it allowed a small community, not numbering less than 300 inhabitants, to take advantage of the Bill and put down public-houses in their immediate neighbourhood; whereas under a more general scheme it would be necessary to deal with the whole country at once. There were about 200 parishes in Scotland that had no public-houses. Why should they debar the other 800 or 900 parishes from having the same privilege if they desired? At present the proprietors of the land had the power to remove public-houses on their property; why should they not give the same privilege and power to the proprietors and tenants of houses in their immediate neighbourhood, seeing that they had far more interest in the question than the proprietors of land? This was essentially a working man's question. It proposed to confer upon him the same rights which were possessed at the present time by the landed proprietor, and the same privileges which the wealthy man now enjoyed, of having a public-house put down near his residence. They had abundant proof that wherever there were public-houses there was drunkenness, and where there were no public-houses there was a greater reduction in drunkenness, and sometimes no drunkenness at all. That was the case in the 200 parishes to which he had alluded. There were some statistics, thanks to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), to which he desired to call attention. From a Return moved for by that hon. Member they found that from 6 o'clock in the morning on a Saturday till 6 o'clock in the morning on Sunday, during the greater part of which licensed houses were open, the number of persons arrested for drunkenness in 1882 was 12,254; while those arrested during the same year from 6 A.M. on Sunday to 6 A.M. on Monday, during which licensed houses were closed, was only 1,492. Dr. Millar, one of the surgeons of the Edinburgh Infirmary, stated that the average number of cases due mainly to drink which were brought to the Infirmary from 12 o'clock on Friday night to 12 o'clock on Saturday night was, on the average, 9·4; the number admitted from 6 P.M. on Saturday to 6 A.M. on Sunday was 6·11; and from 6 A.M. on Sunday to 6 A.M. on Monday the number admitted was only 3·88. It appeared from the evidence given to the Lords' Committee on Intemperance by Captain M'Call, the head of the Glasgow Police Force, that the average number of drunken and incapable persons taken up on each Saturday in October in 1873, from 6 A.M. on Saturday to 6 A.M. on Sunday, was 192; while the average number of the same class taken up on each Sunday, from 6 A.M. on Sunday to 6 A.M. on Monday, was only 14; thus proving that when the temptation was removed by the closing of public-houses there was much less drunkenness. Another objection had been taken to the Bill, on the ground that it only abolished licences or the traffic directly and immediately, and not through the mediation of a Board. A great many people thought this should not be, and he was not surprised at it. He was of the same opinion a few years ago. In fact, one of the objections that he had urged to the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was this very thing, that he did not approve of the plebiscite, but was in favour of a Board. But they all got wiser as they got older. He now confessed he had been in the wrong; and the further experience he had had, and the observations he had made, not only in this but in other countries, had fully convinced him that if they really wanted to put down this great evil they must have the direct veto of the people. He saw no other way for it. He had once voted for the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle as a protest against the Government for not introducing any Licensing Bill; but the late Liberal Government did introduce a Bill, and after that he ceased to vote for the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle, because he did not approve of the vote being given directly to the people; and when the Local Option Resolution was before the House he spoke in favour of its being given to a Board; but, as he had said, he had changed his opinion entirely, and he now came to the House as a humble penitent, confessing that he had been wrong. They all knew that a Board was a very expensive thing. People in Scotland were beginning to groan under the burden of so many Boards. She now had School Boards, Road Boards, and Parochial Boards. In fact, as the hon. Member for Carlisle had said, they were "Bor'd" to death; and yet it was proposed to force another Board upon them. A Board was far more apt to be influenced by people outside than would a vote of the people. He had confidence in the people in this respect, that they would do their duty thoroughly. If they were not in favour of the traffic being kept up they would say so; and if they were in favour of it they would maintain it. By the right of veto under the Bill, they would allow any district having a population of not less than 300 to abolish licences if they thought proper. Supposing a Board was elected for the City of Perth, and that one ward in that city wanted to have no public-house, if the representatives of the other wards wished them they debarred those people from having what they wished. If they adopted the principle of a representative Board he should not object; but until that was done he could not resign the position he had taken up. Another objection to the direct appeal to the people was that it was unconstitutional; and it was asked why not allow the people to vote, as they do now through their representatives? The answer to this was that they already had a number of Acts under which the people voted directly. For example, there were the Police Act, the Free Libraries Act, and the Borough Funds Act. Under the last-mentioned Act the people had power to prevent a Town Council going to Parliament with a water or gas scheme; and if they allowed a plebiscite in these cases, he did not see why they should not allow it in the case of public-houses. If the people were allowed to decide by plebiscite whether they should have pure water, why should they not be allowed to decide in the same way whether they should banish from their midst a traffic which produced so much social misery and moral depravity? It was further said that it was unconstitutional, inasmuch as it gave the majority the power to dictate to the minority what they should and what they should not drink. [Mr. WARTON: Hear, hear!] There was nothing about consumption in the Bill; and he could assure the hon. and learned Member for Bridport that he might buy his glass of whisky elsewhere and bring it with him if he pleased. The Bill would not prevent that. It would only do what the Legislature had done in passing some 400 Acts restrictive of the liquor traffic. Mr. Stuart Mill said that the dealers in strong drinks were interested in their abuse and in promoting intemperance—a real evil, which justified the State in imposing restrictions and demanding guarantees. The Bill did nothing else than that, and it did it for the reason stated by Mr. Stuart Mill. Then it was objected that it would interfere with the liberty of the subject. Now, living in a state of civilization as they did, the liberty of the subject was always interfered with. What was civilization? It was made up of restricted liberties; they could not, as individuals, do what they liked; and if they gave the majority the power of doing away with licensed houses in their particular districts, where they produced so much evil, they would only be acting in accordance with the principles adopted in every civilized country, and with the spirit of the legislation which had been passed during the last 20 or 30 years. They now, for example, had compulsory Education, Vaccination, and Sanitary Acts, all interfering with the liberty of the subject; and the present Bill was a small interference with that liberty as compared with those other Statutes. He had addressed himself to the general objections to this Bill; but there was one clause about which he would like to say a few words. It was the clause dealing with what was called compensation. He did not call it that. He called it the Reimbursement Clause. He was found fault with for going too far, and he was found fault with for not going far enough. He simply proposed to reimburse anyone who had laid out any money on structural alteration of his premises to meet the requirements of the Licensing Justices. He should like those gentlemen who went in for compensation to explain what they wanted compensation for. Licences were only granted for one year, and no man had a right to a renewal. This restricting of licences to one year had existed for a long time. The Legislature had, no doubt, good reasons for restricting them to a year. One of these reasons, no doubt, was that they wanted to preserve the control of the traffic; and another might be that they did not want a publican to establish a claim for compensation. As a set-off to this restriction, there were the enormous profits that were made in the trade. These profits were enormous. Only the other day two cases came under his notice. One was that of a man who had only an ale and beer licence. The original rent of his house was £15; immediately after he got a licence he was offered £30 rent and £270 down for a lease of seven years; and a man must be a fool to make such an offer unless he expected to get his money back. The other case was that of an hotel proprietor who died, and whose widow was offered £1,050, in addition to rent, for a lease of four years. How could publicans expect compensation for goodwill? Everyone who had had experience as a Licensing Justice must have had cases in which their sympathies were excited for some poor widow who had been left destitute, and who had no other way of living, because she had never learned any. In the business of a publican there was very little to learn, and very little capital was required; and, therefore, he did not see what they could expect compensation for. Did they ask compensation when the Sunday Act was passed, and one-seventh of their profits were taken from them? Certainly not. Did they ask compensation when the licences were reduced from hotel licences to public-house licences? Certainly not. He found that the Glasgow Justices had taken away licences from some of the public-houses without any rhyme or reason, and the publicans did not demand compensation. They had appealed to the Licensing Committee, and, supposing that Committee confirmed the decision of the Justices, he understood the case would be taken to the Court of Session. In cases of that sort the question would be removed from the arena of the House of Commons to the arena of the Court of Session, and that Court would decide whether compensation should be given or not. For his own part, he could not see any reason why compensation should be given. In the Grassmarket in Edinburgh there was a public-house which was rented at £19 10s., and when it got a licence the rent was raised to £60. The house was then sold for £1,400, and the rent was raised to £95. On the new tenant applying for a licence the Justices refused to grant it. The man then refused to pay the £1,400. The case was taken to the Court of Session, and the Court decided that it was a bond fide transaction, that the licence was not a marketable commodity, and the man was obliged to pay the £1,400. With regard to the machinery of the Bill, in the first place the Bill defined districts; but before that could be done the Sheriff must require the people of the district to produce some responsible person who would be surety for expenses; and, further, one-tenth of the people who voted must send a memorial to the Sheriff requiring a house-to-house poll; and then, if a majority of the votes decided in favour of the adoption of this Act, it should be adopted. The machinery of the Bill was, in fact, exceedingly simple in its operation; but it might be asked whether the Bill would be practicable? He could adduce the Maine Law and the law of Canada. These laws were of two kinds—the purely prohibitory, and the permissive prohibitory. The Maine Law, which was at first purely prohibitory, was, in a measure, semi-prohibitory even now. He had heard different opinions expressed as to the success of these laws. He had heard hon. Members who had visited Maine say that it was a complete failure, and that they could there get as much drink as they liked. But think of any Justice of the Peace standing up in that House and deliberately saying that he had broken the law of this country by drinking in a shebeen; and what better was it that he should have broken the law of a foreign country and boasted of it there? That the law was quite efficient in Maine they knew by the results. In those places where the prohibitory law did not exist

61 cents per head of duty was paid; but where it did exist only 6½ cents per head was paid. Further, he might mention that in a population of 750,000 there were only 22 prisoners in the State prison, 16 of whom came from places where the Maine Law was not strictly enforced. In some counties of Maine there were no poor rates whatever. What a millennium that would be in Scotland! Coming to Canada, they had a prohibitory law in the North-West. Last year another Act was passed giving the licensing power to a few gentlemen nominated by the Government, but, at the same time, introducing into the Act exactly the principle of the Bill now under discussion. It allowed a three-fifths' majority of the people to put a stop to the drink traffic in the district to which they belonged. That was the present Canadian Act. The Canadians did not proceed by haphazard, but began by appointing a gentleman who was a teetotaler and in favour of a prohibitory law, and another who opposed it, to make inquiries in Maine on the subject, and the non-abstainer returned to Canada perfectly convinced; and, after hearing the evidence placed before it, the Canadian Parliament, by large majorities, adopted the Maine Law. If the English House of Commons were in any doubt on that matter, let them also send out a similar deputation, consisting of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and some other gentleman, even a licensed victualler. It was asked whether a measure like the present one was practicable. Well, in Scotland they knew that there were about 200 parishes in which there was not a public-house. Many other facts showed that it was perfectly practicable. He was told that the burgh of Dumbarton was one of the most drunken in Scotland; but a plebiscite was taken there recently, and 3,719 voted for doing away with licences, and 243 against. In Motherwell, 1,393 voted for doing away with hotels on Sunday and 93 against, and 1,314 for closing public-houses, and only 131 against; in Stornoway 3,495 voted for doing away with public-houses, and only 32 against it; in Rothesay, while 957 voted for a change in the present system, and 157 for permanent licences, 1,101 voted for the liquor traffic being directly under the control of the people, and 167 against. He wished to say a few words about the Amendment of the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. C. Parker). It was a very curious Amendment. Like a chameleon, it was always changing its character. As the Amendment stood yesterday, it "fully recognized the great evils of the drink traffic;" but now that was struck out. He hoped his hon. Friend still recognized those evils. The Amendment recognized "the urgent call for legislation to give to local communities effectual control over the drink traffic;" but it objected to a Bill "which offers to ratepayers no other remedy than total prohibition." He presumed that his hon. Friend thought that remedy was good; but he wanted some other remedies besides. It was a very Irish way of giving effect to the urgent call for legislation in the direction of local control to put a spoke in the wheel of the only Bill that dealt with the question. His Bill did deal with local control, with the addition of local prohibition. He regretted that his hon. Friend had put down this Amendment. The hon. Member had voted for the Local Option Resolution of last year, which was defined by the hon. Member for Carlisle to be the principle which was embodied in this Bill. The hon. Member had voted for an abstract Resolution; but he would not vote for a Bill by which it was attempted to carry that Resolution into effect. There was a great similarity between the tactics of his hon. Friend and those of the Opposition on the Franchise Bill. His hon. Friend was throwing an obstruction in the way of temperance legislation, and must take that responsibility upon his own shoulders. The necessary effect of his action was to divide the Party, and give the Government an excuse for not bringing in a Bill. He never expected to pass the Bill—he meant this Session; but he thought a great deal was gained by this discussion upon it; and perhaps next year, when he should introduce it again, it would be passed. If the Amendment were carried it would recognize the principle of the Bill. [Mr. C. S. PARKER: Hear, hear!] Why, if that were the case, had his hon. Friend put this Amendment on the Paper? He now came to the attitude of the Government. He regretted to see that the Home Secretary had left; but he appealed to the Lord Advocate whether the necessity for this Bill was not recognized? Nothing had given him greater pleasure than to read the speech delivered by the Home Secretary on the Sunday Closing Bill. That speech contained within it the germs of a good measure; and he would be satisfied if the right hon. Gentleman only turned into a Bill what he had stated in that speech. He would not throw any obstruction in the way of the Government on this question. If they would embody in another measure the veto which was the principle of this Bill, all temperance reformers in Scotland would be satisfied, and do everything to pass the Bill. He would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that their late Leader gave householders a right to vote for Members of Parliament. If he had been there now he would not have opposed that Bill. To Members on his own side of the House he could only say—"Trust the people." He might appeal even with confidence to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) and the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan), and say to them—"Have confidence in your customers." Was it not better to carry on the trade with the full approval of the great majority of their neighbours than to force it upon people who objected to it? He was not one who used the harsh expressions he had heard used against licensed victuallers. They were conducting a trade which was sanctioned by law; and if anybody was to be blamed it was not they, but the Legislature, and it was the duty of Parliament to put them in a better position than they were now in. He would not say that the hon. Member for Perth was the friend of the licensed victuallers; but he was doing the work of the licensed victuallers. A licensed victualler had himself said that—"It is intoxication or the liquor traffic that fills our gaols, that fills our lunatic asylums, that fills our workhouses. Were it not for this one cause, pauperism would be nearly extinguished. The struggle of the school, the library, and the Church, all united against the beer-house and gin-palace, is but one development of the war between heaven and hell."

He had only to express his earnest hope that some Member of the Government would give them the assurance to-day that they would, as far as the Public Business would allow, introduce and pass a measure embodying the principle of Local Option as defined by the hon. Member for Carlisle, and thus put an end to the present state of matters, of which the memorable words were used by the late Mr. Charles Buxton, one of the firm of the largest brewers in Britain—

"Add together all the miseries generated by war, pestilence, and famine, and they do not exceed those that spring from this one calamity, the drink traffic."

The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. M'Lagan.)

MR. C. S. PARKER, in moving, as an Amendment—

"That this House, while fully recognizing the urgent call for legislation to give to local communities effectual control over the drink traffic, does not deem it expedient to proceed with a Bill which offers to ratepayers no other remedy than total prohibition," said, the change in his Amendment, on which he had been challenged, was not a change of substance. His hon. Friend knew pretty well the reason for it. The hon. Member had come to him and said that he and his Friends could accept the Amendment as not being hostile to the Bill. It was not exactly hostile to the Bill; but it was intended to set aside the Bill; and, therefore, he had sharpened the Amendment to make that plain. He had inserted the words "the House does not deem it expedient to proceed with the Bill," and had left out other words, only because they were not needed. He could go two steps with the promoters of the Bill, but no farther. He recognized the evils of the drink traffic, and the necessity for a remedy on the principle of Local Option. So far, he was at one with his hon. Friends. But when they came to the work of defining and applying Local Option, then they parted company. His hon. Friend had not in the least exaggerated the urgency of the case; the call for legislation was general from all classes and from all parts of Scotland. Had time permitted, he could have offered proofs of this, perhaps as telling as those already given. But he would rather deal more closely with the question. They had to do no longer with a Resolution, but with a Bill. The House had affirmed three times the abstract Local Option Resolution. But now there was at last before them a definite proposal, or rather two proposals, for legislation. The Government had promised in the Queen's Speech to introduce a measure enlarging the powers of the ratepayers through the representative system, and including among their powers the regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Unfortunately, that promise had of late dropped out of sight. The House had been so much engrossed with the Soudan and with the cattle disease that they had found no time to think of that more fell disease which was attacking men, women, and children, driving them to poverty, to shame, to crime, and even to death. It was only through the energy and good fortune of a private Member in the ballot that a Wednesday's Sitting was secured for this important question. Let them, then, make good use of the time to examine the principles of his Bill, as compared with those laid down in the Queen's Speech. His hon. Friend had spoken of the principle of his Bill as being that of Local Option; but there were in the Bill no less than three principles—Popular Control, the Plebiscite, and Prohibition. On the first he need not dwell; the majority of the House were pledged to popular control. But with the second principle came divergence between the Government proposal and that of the Bill. The Government proposed to work through the representative system; his hon. Friend preferred the plebiscite. The one form of popular control was favourably known by long experience in all affairs Imperial or local; the other was comparatively untried. His hon. Friend, no doubt, had reminded them very properly that the plebiscite was not entirely new to our legislation. He had spoken of three cases where the plebiscite vote was taken—the case of Town Councils wishing to promote a gas or water scheme at the public expense, the case of free libraries, where the electors voted for an additional rate to be paid out of their own pocket, and the case where consent of the ratepayers was necessary before expenditure of borough funds. But surely his hon. Friend must admit there was a long stride between any such plebiscite as those and a plebiscite that should deal with the interests of an important trade, especially by sudden prohibition. The control of the liquor traffic was not, as some had said, a judicial function; but it was an administrative function of much delicacy; and it would be a very serious departure from the representative system, if they were to transfer the control to the whole mass of electors at the polling booth, not hearing arguments, nor inquiring into facts, with patient, just, considerate action. And then came the third principle of the Bill, the point on which he wished to concentrate the attention of the House. In giving, for the first time, popular control over the trade, his hon. Friends proposed to allow no other choice than that of total prohibition? Was that wise, or unwise? Ought they to place limits on Local Option, and if so, what limits? Some hon. Members would impose both a higher and a lower limit on the number of licensed houses in proportion to the population. In a former debate his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—whom he was sorry not to see in his place—was understood to give his vote for Local Option, with the explanation that he would not be a party to absolute prohibition; he would always maintain some accommodation for the minority. The Prime Minister went further. He would give a Local Option so wide as to permit total prohibition, but also to leave it open to a great town like Liverpool to make another experiment in free trade under licence; and he believed the Secretary of State for the Home Department was of the same opinion. For his own part, he should not think it necessary to place any upper or lower limit upon the number of licences. If only he was satisfied that they had got a fairly representative authority, he should be willing to give them the same power that licensing authorities had now—power to refuse any or every licence. But any limits proposed by the right hon. Member for Bradford, or by others, were as freedom itself compared with the narrow option offered by this Bill. If the promoters of the Bill called upon the House to trust the people, why on earth would they not trust the people with larger powers? Why so jealously restrict them? Why cabin and confine them to one single choice, and that the most extreme, the least likely to be generally adopted, the most likely to provoke reaction? They might have given other powers. For instance, in the City of Perth the general opinion was that no new licences were needed, and he fancied many of his hon. Friends from Scotland could say the same with regard to other districts. Why, then, should not the Bill empower the ratepayers to say there should be no new licences granted?

DR. CAMERON: They can do so.

MR. C. S. PARKER: There is no such power.

DR. CAMERON: Yes; by law.

MR. C. S. PARKER: No.

MR. M'LAGAN: Yes; by the present law.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, that he was not aware there was any power by law by which the ratepayers could say there should be no new licences. But why should not the ratepayers have the power to veto even one new licence? In some of the Colonies these powers existed. By the Act in force in New Zealand, the electorate could vote on each kind of licence separately; and if the majority expressed the opinion that there was a sufficient number of licences already of the kind in respect of which the vote was taken, that number could not be increased. Why should not the ratepayers of Scotland have similar powers under this Bill? If they wished to have no more grocers' licences, or no more drinking bars, why should they not have power to vote for this? Why not for shorter hours of sale? The Secretary of State for the Home Department the other day, in reference to the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill, said he thought it was a question that might be safely left to the community in each case to decide, instead of Parliament laying down one rule for the whole country. On the same principle of liberty, would his hon. Friends who were promoting this Bill consent to introduce these various powers, or did they intend to stand or fall by total prohibition? No doubt, if they were willing to put these various powers in the Bill, they would have greatly to alter its character. They must change the Preamble; they must change the title; and, he thought, they must change the machinery also. It was possible by a plebiscite to vote on total prohibition, on prohibition of new licences, or of a certain class of licences; and it was possible, also, to vote on the hours of closing; but there were many regulations beyond that which it would be most desirable to enforce if approved by local public opinion, and which, he thought, could hardly be submitted to a direct popular vote. For his own part, he had far more confidence in the representative principle to deal with all these matters. Nor did he expect that his hon. Friends would put these powers into the Bill; because many of their supporters would lose their enthusiasm if the Bill were only for the suppression of intemperance, instead of being for extinction of the whole trade. To please such supporters, the Bill was purposely made extreme in its provisions. When such a Bill was first proposed, it was strongly felt there must be a large amount of popular support to justify it. He believed Mr. Charles Buxton was the original author of the Permissive Bill, and he required that five-sixths of the voters should be united. Then came his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who was content to have a two-thirds' majority to prohibit; but now, after six years' interval, during which public opinion had marched forward, his hon. Friends produced a Bill by which a majority of one might put an end to the trade. His hon. Friend, however, had not quite the courage of his Bill. He asked the House to save him from his Friends by altering the majority in Committee, and he even angled for the vote of the hon. and gallant Gentleman behind him (Sir Alexander Gordon), who suggested a majority of seven-ninths. But the larger the majority required, the fewer places would adopt the Bill. Its character as an extreme measure was well seen in the one exception it made. In Canada, where they had total prohibition, the Act made two exceptions, one of which the hon. Member adopted, and the other he did not. The one he did not adopt was the permission to buy wine for Sacramental purposes. In Scotland, among the extreme Party who supported the Bill, the feeling ran so far that they actually complained of Christian churches for using wine in the Sacrament, because reformed drinkers, when they had tasted the Sacramental wine, had got back their craving for drink and been entirely lost. That was the view taken by some of the supporters of his hon. Friend, and their reason for withholding this exception. Then there was the medicinal exception. If anyone got from a legally qualified practitioner, not a general certificate of leave, but a prescription suited to his particular malady, he might obtain drink from the druggist. Medical men would be well off under such a Bill; because he supposed they would be allowed to prescribe for themselves and their friends, and therefore they would become very popular. But he could have wished there had been appended to the Bill a Schedule giving the form of the prescription. Perhaps his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) would tell them what it ought to be. He did not know much of doctors' Latin; but he supposed it would be somewhat in this form—" Recipe aquæ vitæ," or "spiritus vulgo dicti whisky," so many ounces, or so many drams. Or if the patient were allowed a little "toddy" on going to bed, then he supposed it would run "Fiat mistura spiritus et aquæ ferventis" and "Sumat cochlearia ampla tria," or "quantum sufficiat, hord sonni." Armed with that prescription they might get drink within their own district, otherwise they must go beyond, which, though it might be a trifle in these modest beginnings, would soon become serious, as it might come to sending for supplies outside Scotland. It was commonly said, at the age of 40, every man was either a physician or a fool. He was so especially in matters of diet. Yet, under this Bill, he was to go to a legally-qualified practitioner to obtain a prescription for what he knew from his own experience agreed with him; otherwise he could not obtain it in his own district. Suppose a man found that it promoted his digestion to take with his dinner a glass of bitter beer; unless he got a medical prescription, or went outside a prohibited district, he might be driven to ginger beer; or if a lady should require refreshment, without the prescription she could not procure a glass of claret, but must take something more like raspberry vinegar. He wished to ask what was all this for that they were going so far? He did not think most of his hon. Friends who had brought in this Bill would say that they thought it necessary to protect the moderate drinker. What they wanted to deal with were the serious and grave evils arising from intemperance. Could they not deal with them in a more practical way than this? Could they not diminish the temptations flaunted at every street corner without going so far as to say that, even in an hotel, lodgers should not have what they were accustomed to take at home with their meals? It was said that among the warmest supporters of the Bill were many of those who drank most. He hoped there was much truth in that. But if so, would it not be possible to accommodate them without total prohibition for everybody? At present we had only an Habitual Drunkards Act, which enabled habitual drunkards to shut themselves up in retreats; but the Colonies had more than that. In the last Canadian Act, Section 92 gave power to Justices to forbid the sale of liquor to habitual drunkards; and Section 93 entitled a parent, guardian, husband, or wife to make application for such purpose. The names on the forbidden list were sent to the liquor bars of the neighbourhood, and heavy penalties were imposed for serving such persons with liquor. Of course, that plan was easier to work amongst a scattered Colonial population than it would be in this thickly-peopled country; but if they were going to interdict people with a view to temperance, he thought it would be more rational to get a list of those who drank to excess and interdict them only, rather than all who had not prescriptions from a physician. These were arguments that weighed with his judgment in favour of a different Bill from that now before the House, a Bill that should give a much larger and more effective Local Option. But this was not a question for argument only. His hon. Friend had impressed upon them that they had the opinion of the country to reckon with, and had been kind enough to warn him (Mr. C. S. Parker) that a special responsibility would rest upon his shoulders for throwing out the Bill. He was not afraid of that. He knew that public opinion in Scotland ran strong for Local Option, but not for such a Bill as this. The best proof of that would be the votes of the Scotch Members; and he trusted they might be allowed to go to a Division. One of the London papers said that the majority of Scotch Members were in favour of the Bill. How much truth there was in that their speeches, if not their votes, would soon reveal. In the meantime, where was the evidence of public opinion in favour of the Bill? Take Petitions to Parliament,

There were some; but his hon. Friend had not relied on them. And rightly, for the number who petitioned against the Bill last year was very considerably larger than the number who petitioned for it last year and this year put together. That, he thought, was a remarkable fact; because no one went out of his way to petition against a reasonable temperance measure. Again, take plebiscites. He would only refer to the one that his hon. Friend had put first. His hon. Friend held up Dumbarton to reproach as the most drunken town in Scotland, and he understood him to say that Dumbarton had passed a vote in favour of the Bill. [Mr. M'LAGAN: No.] Well, then, in favour of total abolition of the liquor traffic. Now, he happened to hold in his hand the exact question that was put to Dumbarton. It was this—"Whether the inhabitants are in favour of Local Option?" But that was after the Scotch Members, almost unanimously, had voted for Local Option; and, lest Local Option should be taken to mean total prohibition only, the Circular went on—

"Local Option is a law that will give the people power by their votes to prevent the issue or renewal of all or any licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors."

That being so, the present was not a Bill that would satisfy the good folks of Dumbarton, for it would not enable them to stop one licence without stopping all. Again, what said the newspaper Press? Were the leading organs of opinion in the great cities of Scotland in favour of the Bill? Was The Scotsman, The Glasgow Herald, The Dundee Advertiser, or, in his own county, The Perthshire Advertiser? They were all against it. Then take public meetings. In Dundee, a town in which there was a great deal of intoxication, the meeting for the Bill was anything but a success, being thinly attended and carrying no weight at all; and in the Dundee School Board a motion in favour of the Bill was opposed by Provost Moncur, a well-known temperance reformer, and did not find a seconder. In Glasgow a Conference of 256 ministers declared for "Local Option vested in Local Boards;" the Scottish Temperance League asked for "power by Local Representative Boards or otherwise to prohibit all or any licences;" a larger Conference of Temperance and Social Reformers, presided over by a late Lord Provost—Sir William Collins—pledged itself to "Local Boards;" and the Liberal Six Hundred resolved that—

"The entire control of the licensing system should be placed in the hands of the ratepayers through Local Representative Boards."

But then there was the great Edinburgh Convention, two months ago, at which, as his hon. Friend said, "the Temperance Party had formulated their demands." He must say he was astonished to hear his hon. Friend quote the resolution passed by that meeting as furnishing the principle of his Bill. The resolution was specially addressed to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate, who wanted to know what was considered a practical measure, and the answer was as follows:—

"No legislative measure on this subject will be satisfactory which does not confer upon the ratepayers the full legal power of controlling the drink traffic, and also of prohibiting it where a majority shall think fit."

Two things, not one; control, and prohibition. The Bill gave prohibition; why not also "full legal control?" But now let them take the authorities who had practically to do with the working of the present system. The licensing magistrates had not expressed any opinion in favour of this Bill; nor the Commissioners of Supply; nor the Town Councils; nor the Convention of Royal and Parliamentary Burghs. And were the Churches of Scotland in favour of the Bill? A London newspaper said so; but his hon. Friend knew better. One of the largest Churches—the Free Church—had had for years a Committee specially dealing with temperance, and year after year they had petitioned in favour of Local Boards. Such facts as these gave some indication of public opinion in Scotland; but, after all, the truest test of it was through the Representatives of Scotland. By their speeches, and by their votes, it would be seen how many of them were opposed to this Bill, how many stood neutral, how many gave it a half-hearted, and how few a whole-hearted support. He would appeal then to Scottish Members to have the courage of their own true opinions. If they took the sensible view of the matter—the view which commended itself to their own judgment—they need not be afraid that their constituents would be hard upon them. To the Government he would say, he knew the difficulties with which they were surrounded; but he asked them not to delay, if possible, in dealing with this question; and when they did bring in their Bill, let it not be a disappointment. He had been sorry to see that in their London Government Bill this question was passed over by a temporary arrangement, allowing the present state of things to remain till Parliament should otherwise provide. If the Government would create in each district an authority that should, on the one hand, be truly local—not dealing with too large a district—and that, on the other, should command the confidence of the whole community, the amplest discretion, he thought, might be safely left in the hands of such a Body. These Boards would make mistakes at first, no doubt; but they would soon gain experience, both from their own proceedings and from those of other Boards; and he believed they would be able to deal satisfactorily with the whole of this difficult but most important question. Lastly, he would ask of the House as a favour to Scotch Members that the Bill should not be talked out. He hoped, also, the Bill would not be merely negatived, but that the House would adopt the Amendment, which had been drawn up with a view to placing on record that, while the House declined to accept under a new name the old Permissive Bill, it did not fall back in any way from the position it had taken upon three former occasions by passing Resolutions in favour of Local Option, or, as he preferred to call it, local popular control.

MR. BAXTER said, that when his hon. Friend the Member for Perth gave Notice of his first Resolution in opposition to this Bill he had taken the liberty of pointing out to him that as it was drafted it by no means necessitated the throwing out of the measure, and that, if it were not amended, it might lead to false hopes on the part of its supporters. But the Resolution as it was now moved he felt quite at liberty to second, as his hon. Friend had requested him to do, because he thought it fairly expressed the sense both of the country and of the House. He was not going to make a speech, for two reasons. In the first place, what they now wanted was not long speeches upon the temperance question, but a general and varied expression of the opinion of Scotch Members on this particular measure. In the second place, he would not detain the House, because a supporter of the Bill had told him in the Lobby that it was highly desirable it should be talked out. That meant that his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) and his supporters were very desirous indeed to avoid a Division. He, on the contrary, was most anxious that the opinion of the Representatives of Scotland should be expressed by them upon this most extraordinary measure. He should be very sorry that his hon. Friend, who had made such an eloquent and interesting speech that day, should have thought it necessary to introduce a Bill of this kind into the House of Commons at all. His hon. Friend had quoted a number of epithets which had been applied to it. He was not prepared to adopt every one of these epithets; but this he did say—that he entirely agreed with the expression of the deputation from one of the great public bodies of Scotland which said that this was an impracticable and unworkable Bill. If he had had any doubts upon this score the speech of the hon. Member for Linlithgow would have removed these doubts. His hon. Friend had no expectation at all, either this year or any other year, of passing such a measure as this. Several hon. Gentlemen had said in his hearing that they would vote for the second reading of this Bill, because they knew that would be a very safe vote—it would please a large number of the most ardent friends of the measure, and there was not the most remote possibility of it ever taking a place on the Statute Book. He had never felt it his duty to take such a course as that in the House of Commons. If his hon. Friend had not moved this Amendment he should have considered it his duty to move that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months. He would have done so on this general principle—that a sweeping measure of this kind occupied the time and wasted the energies of philanthropic men, and prevented them from devoting attention to measures of practical temperance reform. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not oppose the consideration of this question from any hostile point of view towards the temperance movement. There were hon. Members who had often quoted in that House the aphorism—"You cannot make men sober by Act of Parliament," and said that, therefore, they did not believe in legislation of this kind. That was not his view at all. On the contrary, his firm belief was that a very great deal of good could be done by cautious, practical, progressive legislation in the restriction and the regulating of the drink traffic, and preventing the extension of increased facilities and temptations to intemperance. If anyone doubted that, he could cite the working of the present law in Scotland. The Act of Parliament, commonly called the Forbes Mackenzie Act, which was carried through this House by Mr. Forbes Mackenzie—although it was well known the real author of the measure was the late Lord Kinnaird—had worked so well, and had the confidence of the people of Scotland to such a degree, that, although it was now between 30 and 40 years since it came into law, not a single Scotch Member had been got, though he believed strong influence was brought to bear upon them by the publicans at one time, to alter its provisions, far less to vote for its repeal. On the contrary, all legislative proposals and attempts made since that time had been to go further in the same direction, to make still further restrictive laws to regulate the traffic. His hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had a Bill now before the House for materially restricting the hours at which both publicans and grocers in Scotland might be permitted to sell liquor. That Bill had been supported not by Temperance Lodges and small Committees only, but by Representative Bodies in Scotland. It was a Bill which might require alteration; but he should be surprised if, in its main provisions, it did not become law. What he was anxious to impress upon the House was that legislation of this kind should not go too far ahead of public opinion. His hon. Friend (Mr. M'Lagan) had acknowledged this; but he asked him this question—Was he prepared to say that there was anything like a strong popular opinion of the people of Scotland in favour of this Bill? If they legislated in this manner in advance of public opinion, they immediately brought about evils much greater than those they were trying to remedy. He should be very glad to see the day—which would probably come, though he might never see it—when they should have no such things as shops in which spirituous liquors would be sold in glasses to be drunk over the counter. But they could not do this by violent changes in the law. The very first effect of the passing of a Bill such as this would be the opening of innumerable shebeens and back doors, and a system of illicit drinking, such as was now doing great injury in places where a too prohibitory law had been adopted. His hon. Friend had animadverted on the conduct of certain Members of the House who had made themselves acquainted with the manner in which the law was evaded in the United States. He had insinuated that they went to the secret bars in order to drink. He was not ashamed to say that, when visiting the States where the Maine Law existed, he had been extremely anxious to find what was going on there, and he had witnessed scenes at those back door entrances that he should not like to describe to the House, all caused by the attempt to go ahead of public opinion. He shared the objection against a plebiscite. He held that it was very undesirable to refer so many questions directly to the rate-payers to vote without any representation. He put it to his hon. Friend whether, admitting that the principle of this Bill was a good one, this was a good time for bringing it forward? He had a distinct pledge from the Government to carry into effect the Resolutions which the House had passed in the direction of Local Option. They had a promise that the Local Government Bill would contain provisions dealing with the whole question. He hoped that Bill would take away the whole power of licensing from irresponsible magistrates, and give it to the representatives of the people in the town and country, who, he was sure, would be able to give full expression to the wishes of the body of the people. For these reasons, and believing that this Bill was standing in the way of real effective legislation, he cordially seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while fully recognizing the urgent call for legislation to give to local communities effectual control over the drink traffic, does not deem it expedient to proceed with a Bill which offers to ratepayers no other remedy than total prohibition,"—(Mr. C. S. Parker),—instead thereof.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he repudiated the idea that there was any real foundation for the charge which the hon. Member who had moved the second reading of the Bill had brought against Scotland. Statistics proved that England, taking the population of each country, drank 50 per cent more alcohol than Scotland, and that the Scottish people were as sober as those of any country in Europe. Ireland nominally consumed less alcohol in proportion than Scotland; but this was accounted for by the large number of illicit stills—sometimes amounting to 800 in a year—that were discovered in the former country; whereas in Scotland there were rarely more than two or three. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill had made a particular allegation in regard to the town of Dumbarton. Well, he had not the honour of representing Dumbarton, for it was included in the group of burghs which the hon. Member for the Kilmarnock Burghs (Mr. Dick-Peddie) represented. He was not going to say that the hon. Member's statement was not based on some foundation of truth. All he could say was that Dumbarton was a proof of how little they could do by legislation to restrain the drinking habits of the people, especially when they were making high wages, and were very hard-worked people. It had been one of the favourite arguments of teetotalers that it was a great advantage to a country or to a town that they should limit the number of public-houses. The most sanguine supporters aimed at one public-house for 500 of the population. Well, Dumbarton had gone far beyond that, because it had only a public-house to 750 of the population, and the result was that a complete monopoly had been created. It was the most money-making trade in Dumbarton, and he ventured to say that the habits of the people were not one bit improved. There was another matter in the speech of the hon. Member (Mr. M'Lagan) which he felt that he ought to take notice of. The hon. Member had tried to make it out that the publicans had no right to any compensation for being deprived of their business. The argument of the hon. Member was that licences were granted for a year, and had to be renewed every year, and that business so conducted had no ground for compensation. He must look, however, at the custom of the Licensing Courts. He had sat now for a very long period as a Justice of the Peace and a magistrate, and he had never known a case of a man being deprived of his licence unless he had been convicted of having broken the law; and even then it was not done for the first offence, but only after a second conviction. So much was that the case, that at every Licensing Court upon which he had ever sat the list of the renewals of licences was read over and passed as a matter of course, and in regard to every name that was objected to due notice had to be given to the applicant, and the case was heard along with the applications for new licences. He thought publicans had a just right to compensation if ever Parliament resolved to put down licences. He did not think the House, and especially Scotch Members, ever had a greater surprise than when this Bill—in an even more stringent form than it was in now—was introduced last Session, because previously the hon. Member had been so moderate in all his views, so just and reasonable on every question, that they naturally looked on him as fairly representative of Scotch feeling, so much so that there were very few Select Committees or Commissions of which they did not find him a Member. He was appointed a Member of a Commission that inquired into this very subject—the Commission on Grocers' Licences—which sat in 1877. That was not very long ago, and yet, in the Report of that Commission, he found the Commissioners saying that—

"All the law can do without touching upon the liberty of the subject is to see that the trade which Parliament has recognized is carried on within the prescribed limits founded on common sense and considerations of public order. It is expected that the influence of education and the moral tone of the community will be more effectual than the extension of restrictive legislation in leading to improved habits of decency and moderation."

He (Mr. Orr-Ewing) agreed with every word he had quoted from that Report. The hon. Member (Mr. M'Lagan), however, although he was a Member of that Commission, last year brought in a Bill, the most drastic and the most unjust that had ever been presented on this subject. He believed, moreover, that his hon. Friend had been a consistent opponent of the Permissive Bill, which was moderation itself compared with the Bill of last year. The Permissive Bill required a majority of two-thirds before the liquor traffic could be stopped; but here only a bare majority was required. No doubt, the hon. Member had said to-day he might extend that; but there was a strong power behind him composed of men that he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) did not hesitate to say were most unreasonable, and they would compel the hon. Member to do that which he himself did not approve. The present Bill was in a certain sense an improvement on the Bill of last year, because under last year's Bill, if permission were once given to put down the liquor traffic, they could never go into the same area again and ask the people to reconsider the matter. Now, if he understood the Bill aright, each area was to have an opportunity of reconsidering whether licences should be renewed or continued; but there was no provision in the Bill for compensation, except for what had been expended on the glasses and the counter over which the liquor was consumed. That, he thought, was a most serious objection to this Bill. He thought it had been acknowledged by the Leader of the Government that he never would be a party to putting an end to this legitimate business without giving ample compensation to the persons deprived of it. It was as legitimate a business as distilling or brewing; and if Parliament ever decided to put a stop to brewing and distilling it would not do so without giving ample compensation to these great interests. Why were they to treat this trade differently from these other trades, merely because it was less powerful and less wealthy? It would be most inconsistent for this Government to do anything of the kind. It was further to be noticed that the Bill, as pointed out by the hon. Member for Perth, would not only put down public-houses, but grocers' licences and hotels. What, then, would be the result in a town like Oban, if, in an enthusiastic moment, the people were to adopt this Bill? Where would the visitors from England, Ireland, and other parts of the country go to who visited that beautiful place if there were no hotels? This, he thought, was legislation run mad. The Bill of this year gave power to reconsider the question of licences every three years. Did they think any respectable man would go into a trade with such conditions? The thing was impracticable. His hon. Friend brought forward a chapter of horrors, and talked about Monday as being the woman's day for getting drunk. He was sure there was no district in Scotland where such a state of things was to be witnessed. [Mr. M'LAGAN: I said in Westminster.] He (Mr. Orr-Ewing) thought they were dealing with Scotland. Were they to pass a stringent measure of this kind for Scotland because of evils in Westminster? Surely Westminster could look after itself? He would like to call attention to the real reason of the hon. Member for bringing forward this Bill, which he gave to his constituents. The reason the hon. Gentleman gave was that he had lately himself become a teetotaler. He had long been in the habit of taking drink; but he found himself so much better without it that he was anxious every other person should follow his example. It was the case of the fox and the tail over again. He did not object to any hon. Member changing his views, but he should do so in moderation. If a man advancing in years lost confidence in himself—if he saw the errors of his youth—if he had been ordered by his physician to change his habits of life, and take water instead of whisky, he was quite entitled to do so; but why not allow society in general to change their views also, rather than compel them to do so by such a drastic measure as this? There were great influences at work in favour of temperance. It was nearly 50 years since he entered business, and at that time it was not uncommon on Mondays to have some departments of their works stopped through the drunkenness of the employés; but he never now saw a drunken man in his premises, nor did he meet one in the neighbourhood, except on the occasion of some great market. That condition of things had been brought about by Temperance Societies, by greater intelligence, by the change of pay-day, by the people being more intelligent, and seeing more clearly the evil of excessive drinking, and he also thought it had been effected, to a great extent, by the improved habits of the upper and middle classes. He believed in persuasion and example; he believed very strongly in the improvement of workmen's dwellings, of which he was sorry to say many masters thought too little; he believed in the establishment of workmen's public-houses, where young men could go who had not room at home to bring in their friends or to amuse themselves—houses where they could enjoy the advantages of a library and have games of draughts and chess—where they would have comfortable rooms, and get drinks of other than an intoxicating character. By these regenerating influences he believed they would work a great revolution in the habits of the people. No doubt, in a town like Glasgow, where some miserable people lived in dwellings where they rarely saw the sun, they were driven to the gin shops, and drunkenness was the result; but, taking Scotland as a whole, the sobriety of the country districts was not to be excelled in any country in Europe. It was excessive drinking they ought to endeavour to cure, and he did not believe that could be done by compulsory legislation. Were they to degrade the whole inhabitants of a country for the misconduct of a few? Was this Bill trusting the people? Was it true liberty? No. It was downright tyranny, and the very worst of tyranny, because it was the tyranny of the mob. He admitted that drunkenness was an offence against society, and that the law could not be too stringent in punishing such an offence. He admitted, further, that the people of this country were of opinion that drunkenness was a curse; but if the people of Scotland were of opinion that drink was such a curse as was stated in the Preamble of the Bill, he thought it was not such a Bill as this which the Government ought to support. They rather ought to bring in a Bill to take away the power of distilling, brewing, and importing drink in any shape or form whatever. That was the only way in which they could attain the end which it was the object of this Bill to reach. If the Government intended to support this Bill he thought they must be prepared to go much further. They must be prepared to destroy the power of producing the drink which was doing so much harm. He hoped the Government would not support this Bill, because, if passed into law, it would destroy a legitimate trade in which a large amount of capital had been invested; and it would raise strife and turmoil in every parish in Scotland without doing a particle of good.

DR. CAMERON: I must congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) on two things in connection with this Bill. First, in having roused the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing) to unwonted flights of eloquence; and, in the second place, in eliciting from the hon. Member for Perth a brilliant coruscation of wit. However, I may say in regard to the speeches of these hon. Gentlemen, as was said by Chatterton of the sermons of a certain clergyman—

"His sermon had no argument, 'tis true;
Would you have sense and pretty figures too?"

The speeches of the hon. Members contained very little of argument, or, at any rate, very little that could not be easily demolished. Now, the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire has said that the hon. Member for Linlithgow has cast an imputation of excessive drunkenness upon the people of Scotland. I do not think that my hon. Friend led anyone to believe anything of the sort. What he said was that the people of Dumbarton were held to be the most drunken people in Scotland. I do not know whether it is so or not; but I believe the statement was made on the authority of a previous statement made by the hon. Member (Mr. Orr-Ewing) himself. In Dumbarton there is a good example of what can be done in the cause of sobriety by legislation; but the hon. Member told us that nothing has been or can be done by legislation to make the people of Dumbarton more sober.

MR. ORR-EWING: I did not say that.

DR. CAMERON: The hon. Member mentioned a great number of things that had been brought to work to promote the sobriety of his neighbours in Dumbarton; but, curiously enough, he omitted to mention the legislation which had taken place for Dumbarton as well as for other parts of Scotland, in the shape of the Forbes Mackenzie Act. The result of that Act in Dumbarton is that, whereas the average arrests there are 67 daily, the number on Sunday is only 5. Now, I think that if you want a striking illustration of what can be done in the way of securing sobriety by legislation, you need not go further than to Dumbarton.

MR. ORR-EWING: I was speaking of my own parish. Everyone admits the good the Act has effected.

DR. CAMERON: Well, if everyone admits it, then the hon. Member admits the advantages of legislation in promoting sobriety. He stigmatized the Bill of my hon. Friend as drastic, unjust, and tyrannical. Now, my hon. Friend proposes to do no more than place in the hands of the people power which in the hands of the landlords has been exercised with great benefit to the country for an indefinite number of years. But I suppose one may say, taking a slight liberty with the words of the great poet—"What in the landlord's but paternal care, is in the people's hands rank tyranny." I would go the length of placing in the hands of the people everything that is now placed in the hands of the landlords. In the hands of the landlords the power of suppression and control has done nothing but good; and I maintain there is no earthly reason why you should intrust these powers to the landlords—to a single class of the community—and refuse them to the people. That is what I call trusting the people. The hon. Members for Dumbarton and Perth alluded to the question of compensation, and on that question I will point out that the prohibitory system is already at work in Scotland wherever the landlords choose to enforce it. A landlord might put down every public-house on his estate; and, if he did so, what provision have you for compensation? A landlord can put down every grocer's licence and every publican's licence; a landlord has unlimited power in that respect, and my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) has told the House that in 200 parishes in Scotland the landlords have exercised their power of putting down licences.

MR. ORR-EWING: The hon. Member is not correct in that. Landlords have only reserved to themselves power of preventing houses being converted into public-houses.

DR. CAMERON: I am perfectly correct. As a matter of fact, many landlords have prevented anything in the shape of a public-house being set up on their estates. I myself have for years lived in a district where such a provision has been inserted in the feus, and I venture to say most of the Scottish Members in this House are in the same position as myself. I repeat that, as a matter of fact, in 200 parishes in Scotland this power of suppression on the part of the landlord has been exercised, and, it is admitted on all hands, with the most beneficial results. With regard to compensation, I am not particularly against compensation; indeed, I am as liberal-minded on that subject as the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who only considers it a question of detail. I regard it in the same light. It is wonderful how tender in some respects hon. Gentlemen are on the question of compensation. Officers in the Army had been breaking the law all the days of their life in selling their commissions; and it was deemed absolutely necessary to compensate them when the power to sell commissions was taken from them. Last year we abolished every toll in Scotland. The toll-keepers, who had been engaged all their lives in a legal and honest occupation, were thrown without employment upon the world. Yet what compensation was given to them? The Bill in reality proposes exactly that form of compensation which has been thought good enough for agricultural tenants—namely, compensation for unexhausted improvements, precisely on the same basis as that on which it was given to tenants. My hon. Friend (Mr. M'Lagan) referred to various cases in which plebiscites had been taken; but he omitted to mention an important fact in regard to Stornoway, although he told the House how many were in favour and how very few were against public-houses. I have received a letter from an inhabitant there, stating that in order to find out the feeling of the people on this subject a plebiscite was taken, which resulted in 3,495 people voting against all public-houses, and only 32 voted in favour of keeping them open. The figures were placed before the magistrates the other day; but their honours, in their wisdom, thought fit to renew every licence. "Before that," writes my correspondent, "the people were under the impression that licences were granted for the public convenience, and that the public were the best judges of their requirements." But Stornoway was an out-of-the-way place, and that accounted for the people harbouring any such ingenuous idea as to the object of their licensing system. Now, the hon. Member for Perth said that what we want is Licensing Boards. I am in favour of Licensing Boards, local veto, or anything else which will grapple with this evil; and it is because I am in favour of one and all that I will vote for and support one and all. That seems to me a much more rational way of promoting the cause of temperance than to say, as the hon. Gentleman does, because I would like some other means adopted than is proposed in this Bill I will move a hostile Amendment to it. It strikes me the hon. Member will have to take up a firmer attitude if he wishes to escape the fate of the man who tried to sit between two stools. I hold in my hand a telegram stating that a Liberal meeting was held at Perth last night, at which those in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker) were in such a minority that a resolution in favour of this Bill was carried unanimously—the supporters of the Amendment having left the room when they saw what was about to happen. The hon. Member's course will not, I believe, please the temperance members of his constituency; and with regard to his intemperate constituents, they are not likely to give him any effectual support which will enable him to do without the support of the Liberal Committee. He says he would like to see greater liberty allowed to ratepayers, and he asked whether we intended to allow ratepayers to veto any particular class of licences. Certainly we should. This is not a Licensing Bill, and we should be most happy to allow the people, as the landlords are allowed at the present moment, to suppress any particular kind of licences, leaving all others untouched. Then the hon. Member for Perth went on to speak of injustice and absurdity, and complained that the Bill did not contain provisions as to sacramental wine, and he drew a terrible picture as to what would result in regard to sacramental wine if the Bill were passed; but there are nearly 200 parishes in Scotland under the prohibitory law put in force at the instance of the landlords. What about the sacramental wine there? Is there any saving provision in that respect in the general law? It is also the same with regard to medicines. There are 200 parishes in Scotland where you have a prohibitory law in force; is there any difficulty in obtaining spirits for medicinal purposes there? The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire spoke of strangers arriving at Oban, and being unable to obtain liquor; but there are many beautiful places in Scotland where prohibition is in force, and if tourists want liquor they must carry it with them or do without it. We do not propose any untried experiment. What we propose is that the power that already exists in the hands of the landlord, which has been attended with beneficial results, should be extended also to the people. I think my right hon. Friend who seconded the Amendment (Mr. Baxter) said that the Bill stood in the way of the Government carrying out their intentions. Well, I should like to see the Government display a little more vigour in carrying out their intentions. If they cannot carry a Bill through the House, they might, at least, enforce the law as it at present exists. At Peterhead recently the confirming magistrates recommended the granting of certain licences, although there was not the statutory quorum present. The magistrates and the Excise authorities conspired to allow liquor to be sold without a legal licence, and when I called attention to it the Lord Advocate winked at their proceedings. Other cases of the same kind have been brought to my notice. It is not only the Lord Advocate who will not enforce the law in the interests of temperance. I have called the attention of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) to the subject. The law lays it down that the Controller of Licensing, the gentleman in charge of the Licensing Department in Scotland, is subject, under Act of Parliament, to a penalty of £500, and to incapacitation from holding office, if he wilfully allows persons without proper licences to sell drink. But when the Secretary to the Treasury was asked what action the Government intended to take upon the case I have just mentioned, the reply was that no action at all would be taken. Well, is this not suspending the law against the interests of temperance and in the interests of intemperance? It makes me very doubtful about any speedy prospect of the Government carrying out any intentions they may have. I have heard of a certain place which is paved with good intentions; and much as I admire Her Majesty's present Government, and much as I respect the late Government, I believe that both Governments have contributed not a little to the pavement of that place. Therefore, I think that my hon. Friend has acted wisely in bringing forward this Bill now and trying to push on the Government and stimulate them to do something; and I wish them to understand that until they take up this question they shall have no peace. I do not tie myself to all the details of the Bill; but I am willing to back almost any Bill for the sake of protesting against the inaction which has characterized two successive Governments in dealing with the burning question of intemperance in Scotland.

MR. COCHRAN - PATRICK said, that, while he agreed that his hon. Friends had proved an overwhelming case in favour of legislation, he was not altogether sure whether they had touched the point now really under the consideration of the House—namely, whether the measure introduced was the only measure, or even the best measure, for producing the effects which they all desired to see. He ventured to think the public opinion in Scotland was very strongly in favour of legislation upon this subject, and he thought that they had arrived at the stage when it was absolutely necessary that the matter should be dealt with by legislative interference. But, with regard to the particular measure now before the House, he thought there were some reasons which made it very doubtful whether it would really, if passed into law, have the effect which his hon. Friend expected. Experience had shown that prohibition not only failed in many cases to produce any effect, but in some cases, by the natural law of reaction, it actually had the effect of stimulating that which it was intended to suppress. The proof of that proposition existed in almost every volume of the Statute Book with regard to Scotland. His second objection to the Bill was that it created a large number of new crimes. It added very largely to the statutory offences at present existing in the country, and made criminal offences out of acts which were not in themselves prejudicial to the community. If the measure were passed, it was perfectly certain that various harmless acts would be made statutory offences, punishable by penalties, while it would create offences in one part of the country out of acts which in another part, perhaps only half-a-mile off, would not be offences, and would be perfectly harmless, thereby introducing very considerable confusion in the mind of the people as to what were or were not offences; and from that point of view he thought it would be very unsatisfactory. He had several objections to matters of detail in the Bill with which he would not trouble the House. He hoped that the Lord Advocate was in a position to say that Her Majesty's Government would accept the obligation which was laid upon them by the vote of last year. If they would supplement the promise in the Queen's Speech, and say that they were going to deal with this question as a part of Local Government, in which way alone it could be dealt with satisfactorily, he should be content to accept their promise. On the other hand, if the Lord Advocate was not in a position to give the promise, he felt that he would not be justified in opposing this measure, which would be the only measure between them and the great evils now existing.

MR. A. GRANT said, he thought the Bill contained so much that was objectionable and otherwise unwarrantable that he was obliged to withhold his support on the second reading. He could not go so far as this Bill, and insist that steps should be at once taken to place in the hands of what might be a bare majority the power of total suppression of the sale of liquor in any locality. At the same time, he was of opinion that some Parliamentary interference had become necessary in order to check and discourage the drinking habits of so many of the people, which were the fruitful source of so much misery and crime, and by which the industrial classes of this country were so heavily handicapped in their competition with other countries. While he could not approve of the method which his hon. Friend had taken of dealing with the difficulty, he was bound to say that he fully recognized that his aim was a desirable one; and he was not prepared to say that the extreme temperance party, who were the promoters of this measure, were wrong from their point of view in taking their stand upon total suppression as the object to be aimed at, because it was often very useful to establish a high ideal, although there might be almost insurmountable difficulties in its being realized. Local Option, or local control, as he, and, he believed, the great majority of hon. Members understood it, did not mean, as the Bill expounded it, the right of a majority to say to a minority they should not drink, but it meant the right of the inhabitants of a district, by means of Boards elected by a majority of the ratepayers, to control and regulate the liquor traffic within the bounds of their districts; and if they thought that a public-house was, or was likely to become, a centre of temptation and of demoralization—in fact, a public nuisance—that they should be entitled to say they would not have it set down in their midst. But then came the question for the practical politician. Taking things as they are—“How far is Parliament likely to go, and how far is Parliament likely to have the support of public opinion in meeting the views of the temperance reformers?” Was it wiser to insist upon the right of total suppression, and nothing less than total suppression—to insist upon the whole of the Bill, and nothing but this Bill—or to limit their claims to what Parliament was more likely to grant, and to accept that as a step in the right direction, remembering that, if the assumptions of the temperance party were true, every step gained made the next step more easy. He did not believe that public opinion in Scotland, notwithstanding what had been said on the subject, was prepared to give the right of total suppression even of public-houses in any locality, far less the right of total suppression of the sale of any stimulants whatever. Public-houses, no doubt, with the attractions which they offered, did lead to misery and to abuses. He quite admitted that in many localities they were far too numerous; but their total suppression must necessarily involve a very considerable amount of inconvenience and of hardship upon those who at present made use of them, and who had no other intention but to make use of them in a moderate and temperate manner. He dared say that that view would not approve itself to the supporters of the Bill, and they would think it unreasonable and heterodox; but it must be remembered that it was the duty of Parliament to give consideration to the wants and wishes and interests of others besides those in favour of total suppression, even although they might be in a minority in some particular parish. This Bill was framed on the lines of the Permissive Bill of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, although he might say in passing that in many of its provisions it was much more drastic than that formidable measure. The last time the Permissive Bill was discussed in Parliament was in 1878, and the result of the discussion was that 84 Members voted in favour of the second reading and 278 against. They had been told to-day, and he frankly admitted it, that upon that occasion he formed one of the minority; but he must say that the result of that Division, accompanied with his observations since of public opinion throughout the country, had convinced him that the time had not yet come for such drastic legislation, and that public opinion in Scotland was not ripe for the acceptance of such a Bill. They could not at one stroke, by an Act of Parliament, all at once revolutionize the tastes and habits of a community. It was no use to legislate ahead of public opinion. Legislate abreast of it if they liked; but all measures to anticipate it as this did must inevitably end in failure. He might be asked what he had to suggest, as he admitted legislation was necessary; and his answer was that it seemed to him that a scheme with a basis of Licensing Boards to be elected periodically by the inhabitants of each locality, the localities to cover the whole of Scotland, would probably meet with some acceptance. Of course, the locality, to be of any use, would require to be of considerable extent. Probably the burghs and counties would be the limit; but these limits would have to be fixed by statute. These boards, he thought, also might have allotted to them the funds arising from the issue of licences, and they might be allowed even to fix the amount of the licences, subject to a prescribed maximum, in order to prevent its being fixed at a prohibitory figure. They might also be trusted with the duty of reducing the number of licences when they thought it was to the public advantage, subject to a fixed minimum to be laid down by Parliament. There was then another matter that might very properly be left in the charge of these boards, and that was the regulation of the hours during which public-houses should be left open. Any curtailment of the hours during which they were allowed to be open must result in a corresponding curtailment of the temptations which open houses afforded; but a curtailment of hours would do more than that. Nothing came out more clearly in the evidence given before the Lords Committee on Intemperance than the fact that it was in the late hours far into the night that the greatest mischief was done; and he believed that any movement for shortening hours would meet with the support of large numbers of the community who were by no means willing to go the length of the extreme and heroic remedy proposed by his hon. Friend. Further, it appeared from the evidence on intemperance taken before the Lord's Committee that many of the publicans themselves viewed a restriction of the hours of opening with favour; they were not all fiends in white aprons, as temperance lecturers were so fond of describing them. Many of them were respectable citizens, anxious to do all they could to keep themselves and their business as respectable as possible. He would not occupy the time of the House by criticizing the details of the measure; but he might point out that the proposal for arbitrary stoppage of the liquor traffic by a small majority was far in advance of the present measure; and he might also point to the expense that would be required for the additional police superintendence that would be necessary, which it was proposed should come out of the police rates, although these might be contributed to by districts outside which had no desire to adopt the Act. The sketch he had put forward might be good or bad, but certainly it was not reconcilable with the method proposed by his hon. Friend, though both their objects were the same. It was because his hon. Friend's method was unreasonable, unsound, and unworkable, because the provisions of the Bill were far too arbitrary, because the Bill, if it became law, would defeat its own object by its stringency, and lead to constant violations and evasions of the law, and, what was as bad, would create a sympathy with the law-breakers; and last, though not least, it was because he was certain that the Bill had not the support of public opinion throughout Scotland that he was compelled to refuse to support the second reading, and must give his vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, he believed they all felt the greatest sympathy with the general object of the hon. Gentleman who brought forward this measure. They all recognized the evil which the hon. Member endeavoured to grapple with; but their objection to this Bill was that upon the whole it would not work to the interest of temperance reform. That was his own conviction. His hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) expressed approval of the Bill, and his readiness to support other Bills in addition; but he thought that in dealing with a question of this kind they ought to be careful what legislation they favoured. The greater the evil which had to be dealt with, the more care they ought to exercise as to the remedies they supported, and they ought to see that those remedies were likely to prove successful. The question really before the House was whether this Bill was worthy of support? The principle of the Bill was that, where the Act was adopted, there would be the absolute prohibition of the sale and disposing of alcoholic liquors within the district for a period of three years. That was a great step, and if the Bill did not take that step, it did nothing whatever. His hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow said that what this Bill proposed was not an untried experiment; but he thought he was mistaken in saying so. It was true there were districts in Scotland where there were no public-houses; but that was the case in parishes where there were but small populations, or where the population had only recently become considerable, and the prohibition that was there exercised was, he thought, against new houses being licensed, rather than against old ones being continued. It was also said that landlords had done in their own parishes all that was proposed to be done by the popular veto under this Bill; but he was not aware that in any part of Scotland landlords had taken so great a step as was proposed under this Bill. Exercising one's own judgment on the probabilities of the case, he should say that, if this Bill were carried, the law would be sure to be evaded, that reaction would certainly set in, and that the result would not in the long run be favourable to the cause of temperance. For one thing, the community which adopted this Act would never have confidence that it would continue to be adhered to. However large the majority that was required, they could quite understand that the Act might be adopted by a close vote, and in such cases there would be the feeling that at the end of the three years the vote might be reversed. When the vote was reversed what was to happen? Were all the public-houses which had been closed three years before to be reopened? Reference had been made to the moral effect of the Bill; but the Bill was not a practicable measure, and if it was not practicable he did not see that it would have that moral influence which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) predicted for it. He would prefer some legislation which would be more certain to effect some measure of good, even although the change was not nearly so great as what was proposed under this Bill. He agreed that great good might be effected by a reduction in the number of licensed houses. He did not exactly understand the position taken up by the hon. Member who moved the second reading of the Bill when he said that if there was not to be a total abolition of public-houses, then there ought not to be a few only, but what he called a reasonable number of them. There was need for more popular control—popular control to support, and in some instances to guide, the action of the magistrates. He could not agree with the right hon. Member for Montrose Burghs (Mr. Baxter) in regard to the representative local bodies being intended to supersede the magistrates. He would look upon the representative body as supporting and co-operating with the magistrates, but by no means superseding them. He hoped that this extension of popular control, which was really wanted, might be secured by some measure of the Government, under such conditions as would promote temperance without attempting anything so impracticable as was proposed by the Bill now before the House.

Mr. J. A. Campbell

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan), who submitted this measure for the consideration of the House, owed us any apology for bringing under our notice a Bill relating to Scotland alone. He gave us some very good reasons for following that course, and others might be added. It is undoubtedly the fact that in the matter of temperance legislation Scotland has been very materially in advance of the other parts of the United Kingdom—at least, so we think in the North. We have had for over 30 years a Sunday Closing Act, which, I think, it is agreed upon all sides has worked exceedingly well, while it was only two years ago that Wales obtained a similar Act. Ireland lately succeeded in securing a like provision of partial application, and is seeking to have it in full; while England seems a considerable distance from getting such a measure even now. That is only one instance, and others might be given, showing that this matter is very well fitted for being dealt with for Scotland apart from the other portions of the United Kingdom. There is another reason which, to those of us who are supporters of the principle of Local Option, would be sufficient for the course which my hon. Friend has taken in submitting a Bill applicable only to Scotland, and that is that the regulation of the liquor traffic is eminently a local question. It is a question which the House has more than once affirmed may very well be dealt with by local or territorial communities very much smaller than such a unit as the Kingdom of Scotland. So far I should entirely go with my hon. Friend in holding that it was right to bring under the consideration of the House a measure dealing with Scotland alone, if it was not possible to comprehend other parts of the United Kingdom in it. I would, further, go with him in a very great deal that he said in the earlier part of his able and very interesting address. He repeated what is set out in the Preamble of the Bill in regard to the consequences, if not strictly of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, at all events of the excessive consumption of them, and, beyond all doubt and question, there is a very close relation between these two things. I quite agree that the vast mass of the crime of the country is due to that cause. No one whose duty it has been for a long time to take part in the administration of the Criminal Law of Scotland can doubt that this is the fact; and although I never compiled any actual statistics on the subject, I cannot suppose, from my observation, that my hon. Friend is far wrong in saying that nine-tenths of the crime of the country is due to that cause. It is a most melancholy experience for anyone who is concerned in the administration of the Criminal Law to observe the criminal offences of all sorts and kinds which are clearly, and I think I may say exclusively, traceable to drink; not only the crimes committed under the influence of drink—crimes of violence—but crimes of stealth and of fraud, and of all sorts. Stealing to obtain the means of drinking, and offences of every description, are committed by persons whose moral sense has been degraded and debased by indulgence in drink. So that I entirely assent to what my hon. Friend has said in regard to the necessity for legislation on this matter. This is a point upon which the Government have already very clearly announced their opinion, because on the occasion of the discussion on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), last year, it was declared in most emphatic terms. But we have not only to be agreed in regard to the desirableness—I might say the necessity—of legislation with respect to such a matter as this; we must be further satisfied, before assenting to a particular measure, that it is the best that can be devised for carrying out the object as to which we are all at one, and that it is not accompanied with unnecessary drawbacks or defects. Now, while agreeing with a great deal that my hon. Friend has said, I must, on the part of the Government, say that we are not able to assent to his Bill as it stands; but that, on the contrary, we shall give our support to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker). It is quite superfluous at this time, when the Bill has been so fully discussed and so long in the hands of Members, to point out what it does. It has been shown that, by a direct plebiscite or popular vote, it proposes to do one thing, and one thing only—that is, totally to prohibit the sale of liquor within the area over which the vote is taken. Now, that would appear to be a very strong thing, viewed by itself, apart altogether from the means by which it is intended to be brought about. It is a very singular—one would say almost an anomalous—result that, without arming either the people, or any board intermediate between them and the holders of licences or traders in drink, with any power of diminishing or regulating the number of houses, there should be but one thing offered without alternative—that is, total prohibition. The objections to that have been so well pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Perth, that I should feel it altogether superfluous to repeat what he said. But it has been expected, and quite rightly, that some declaration should be made on the part of the Government as to the view that they take of this matter, and the course that they propose to adopt with respect to it. Now, Sir, a declaration of that kind was made last year in as clear terms as it was possible to use, and to that declaration the Government still adheres. The Prime Minister, on the occasion of the debate which took place in April last year, following the Home Secretary, said that—

“The views of the Government are settled in this matter. We are not in favour of deciding Local Option by means of a plebiscite, and we are not in favour of creating a separate local authority for the purpose of settling that question and no other. But we are strongly in favour of creating all over the country—as is already done to a considerable extent in municipal boroughs—trustworthy representative bodies, commanding the confidence of local communities; and to those trustworthy bodies, so chosen for local purposes, we desire to commit the high and important function of determining this question.”—(3 Hansard, [278] 1365-6.)

Now, Sir, that is as clear and distinct a declaration of the view of the Government as can possibly be given, and that is the view which I hope and believe the House will agree to accept, as expressing and giving effect, in the fullest manner, to the true principle of Local Option. Some of us may think that that view involves a fuller, freer, and more Constitutional trust in the people, and a more proper mode of ascertaining the wishes of the people, than is contemplated by this Bill. We are familiar in all other Constitutional relations, both

Imperial and local, with representation—with ascertaining the views of the people, and then giving effect to them through representative bodies, greater or less, from this Parliament downwards to the different local boards, which we hope to see increased throughout the country. This being so, a very strong case will have to be shown by those who propose to depart from the familiar and Constitutional mode of ascertaining the popular sentiment, and giving effect to the popular will. Now, has any such case been shown here? I submit it is quite the other way. It has already been pointed out that this Bill, so far from providing for doing a great many things—because a great many things may be necessary to be done in respect to the liquor traffic—provides only for one; whereas if you have your popularly-elected board, elected by exactly the same constituency as would vote in a plebiscite, you have the mind, the will, of that body quite as truly reflected, and if that will be for total prohibition, then the action of the board would be in accordance with that will. If it were not, a restriction of numbers might be desired, and if so, then the board would carry that out. A regulation of hours might be required, and if so, that would be carried out by the board. In short, you would have, by means of such a board as I have indicated, the power of doing everything exactly in the way the popular will desired, and it would not be limited and restrained by one hard-and-fast provision such as exists in this Bill. It would be flexible, manageable, and familiar. I know the objection has been urged against a board of that kind, that unless it were chosen for the sole object of dealing with the liquor traffic it would not be satisfactory. In short, it has been urged, even by those who differ from my hon. Friend, and say we do not want a plebiscite, that we must have a board elected for this purpose, alone; because it is suggested that there might be considerations which would lead to the electors voting for particular persons other than how they would act in the question of the liquor traffic. Now, that is quite an intelligible argument; but I venture to submit that it has no real substance and force. A great many duties are confided to popularly-elected boards such as town councils and the local boards which many of us—

probably most of us—would desire to see in the counties ere long. They have to deal with every other matter regarding the health and morals and general well-being of the people. This has been quite rightly represented as largely a sanitary question, and as a moral question also. It is just one of those things in which the community may very well desire to be governed according to its own views. There seems to be no reason why in this matter it should not be governed, according to its own views, by a body which it had itself chosen. As to the argument that there might be other considerations coming in to dictate the selection of candidates, I think it pays a very poor compliment to gentlemen who hold strong temperance views. I am sure those who use that argument do not mean to say that an advocate of temperance is likely to be a worse man of business than anybody else, and, therefore, less eligible than others for discharging the general duties of the board. One would expect that it would rather be the other way. Therefore, I cannot doubt that in the case of any popular election there would be no lack of candidates who would be quite in harmony and sympathy with the prevalent popular opinion in regard to licensing, and yet capable of discharging all the other duties confided to local bodies. Men would be none the less capable of looking after the lighting, drainage, and paving of their locality because they had views in harmony with the popular mind on this particular question. Therefore, there does not appear to be any ground for separating this particular matter of local self-government from the other matters of local self-government, and I put it to the House whether the view expressed by the Prime Minister as to the mode of accomplishing the object which we are all anxious to achieve is not the most practical one. Something has been said on the subject of delay, and it has been remarked that the Government should be stimulated. If the Government needed stimulus it would be quite right to apply it; but I hardly think that passing a Bill which did not commend itself to the judgment of the Government, or, as I believe, to the House, would be the proper kind of stimulus to apply. Discussion is quite a proper thing—such an interchange of opinion as we have had to-day; but it would be better, although all of us should regret delay even for a Session, to have a good Bill, even at the expense of that delay, rather than to have a Bill now which is not a good Bill. These are the main considerations. I wish, however, to recall to the recollection of the House on this matter of alleged delay what was said last year by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in the discussion to which I have already referred. He said—

“We are all agreed that this is a matter that ought to be dealt with, and ought to be dealt with without delay.”—(Ibid. 1307.)

But the House knows very well that there are forces of delay too strong for the Government to have combated—so far, at all events, as to have enabled them to present their Bill this year. For this they are not responsible, and I can renew the assurance given a year ago that the Government have this matter still before them, and that they will not allow any avoidable delay to elapse in presenting to the House a measure which shall, in their judgment, be the best kind of measure for giving effect to the large principle which underlies my hon. Friend's Bill—that is, the principle of allowing the popular voice really to control, and to control in the largest sense, the traffic in intoxicating liquors. In support of his view as to a plebiscite, my hon. Friend who moved the second reading of the Bill referred to plebiscites which had been taken, with reference to proposals relating to gas, water, burgh funds, free libraries, and the like. Some people seem to think that there is magic in the word plebiscite; but, after all, it simply means a popular vote. Here my hon. Friend proposes to confide the vote to the electors—that is, to the same people who would vote in the election of such a Board as I have indicated, so that if he likes the term there would be nothing to prevent his calling it a board elected by a plebiscite. But there are great differences between the cases of free libraries and the others to which reference has been made, and a case like the present. These are all cases, I think, speaking from recollection, in which the question is put to the community—Shall you, or shall you not, bring a particular measure into operation in your locality—for example, shall you adopt the Free Libraries Act? That is a thing done once for all. But that is not the proposal of this Bill. It is a thing to be done from time to time. It is not a plebiscite to bring a local board into existence which shall deal with this matter. There is not to be any local board; but every three years a vote is to be taken on this matter, so that I think the hon. Member will find it not easy to discover Constitutional analogies for dealing with a matter of this kind, which eminently affects the well-being of the community in a different way from that in which all other similar matters are dealt with. My hon. Friend spoke of trusting the people, but I need say nothing more about that, because the proposal of the Government is eminently to trust the people not only in this, but in all matters affecting their welfare; so that it is not a conflict between an exclusive or despotic and a popular mode of regulating a particular traffic. Both the methods proposed are popular. The Government are in entire harmony with my hon. Friend in regard to the large principle, although they are unable to go with him in regard to what I may call the secondary principle which he has endeavoured to carry out by this Bill. I think it important that we should have a Division upon this Bill. It is of great importance that the voice of the House should be expressed in this matter, and that such an opportunity as the present for ascertaining the views of Representatives from Scotland should not be allowed to go by. I shall not detain the House further; but I may say that it does appear to me that the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) was not quite happy in the analogy he sought to draw between the existing licensing authority or the licensing authority contemplated by the Government and an irresponsible and non-elected body. If the Government had been proposing an irresponsible or non-elected body, his criticism would have been intelligible; but it is not a question whether it is to be an elected body or not. It is a question—How should the popular will be ascertained; what is the best mode of ascertaining it, and giving effect to it? There were some criticisms upon the existing law which my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow also passed, which were, perhaps, not very germane to this discussion. He made some remarks with regard to the case at Peterhead, in which he must have forgotten himself for a moment when he said that I had winked at shebeening, and refused to enforce the law. I am sure, on further consideration, my hon. Friend would not have wished to make use of such language.

DE. CAMERON: I did not wish to say anything offensive. What I wished to convey was that a breach of the law had been committed, and the law was not enforced.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I am quite sure my hon. Friend did not mean anything offensive; but if I recollect the case aright, it was by no means a case calling to be dealt with by the Criminal Law. It was not a case in which any crime had been committed. It was a question whether a particular licence had been duly confirmed—a question proper to be tried by a civil, not by a criminal, proceeding. In regard to the prevalent opinion in Scotland on this point, I should say that opinion is all in favour of having local control applied in this matter, probably even to the extent of total prohibition if a particular locality should desire it. At all events, the propriety of allowing total prohibition would be very fairly within the range of consideration in settling the provisions of the Government Bill. But, on the other hand, there is not a prevalent consensus of opinion in favour of the particular measure advocated by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire; and, therefore, on this occasion we would do well to adopt the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Perth, which recognizes very clearly the urgency of the call for legislation directed to give local communities an effectual control over the drink traffic, but declares that the House does not consider it expedient to proceed with a Bill which gives no other remedy than total prohibition.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had been much pleased by what they had just heard from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate, not only as to his intention to oppose this most unreasonable and absurd Bill, but as to the intention of the Government to bring in legislation of a more reasonable kind. At an early period of the day he had proposed to speak on this question; but at this time he only wished to make a few remarks, as he wanted to see the Bill voted upon. He wanted to see a measure so unreasonable as this not hung up before the country another year, and permit the fanatical section of the temperance party to say—"The Bill is quite a reasonable one, and the House of Commons has not ventured to oppose it." He wanted it to be shown that the House of Commons was not prepared to accept a measure of this kind at all. A great deal had been said during this discussion about 200 parishes in Scotland, and that this Bill was intended to do nothing more than what the landlords were doing for these 200 parishes. There could be no greater delusion than that. It was well known that grocers' carts travelled the country and delivered liquor at houses to whoever asked it; but if this Bill were carried they would be unable to do anything of the kind. The Bill compelled the Sheriff to draw a cordon of 10 miles around a district. After that cordon was drawn it would be possible for 10 per cent of the householders to compel the Sheriff to take a plebiscite. Now, in a population of, say 300, there might be only 60 householders, and 10 per cent of these 60 meant 6. Supposing the plebiscite was decided by a majority of 1—from that moment there was no more selling of liquor in the district or bartering or disposing of it. He would like to know what "disposing of liquor" meant? It could not mean selling it, because that was provided for already. It could not mean throwing it away in the streets, because that would be an infringement of existing laws. Under this Bill as at present drawn all measures and utensils used in the liquor trade could be immediately confiscated upon its becoming law. It would be possible, therefore, for a small population in that way absolutely to stop a great brewery or distillery. If the owner attempted to sell any of his large stock of stuff it would be immediately seized and confiscated under this Bill as it was drawn. That was a very different thing from what was done in the 200 parishes in Scotland which had been talked about. He would not go further into details, but he might say the Bill was very unjust in a great many matters. It drew a distinction in which the advantage was all on the side of prohibition and the disadvantage on the other side. But what he principally desired to point out was what the public opinion on the matter was in Scotland.

English Members of the English temperance party might be induced to vote for this Bill because they imagined the Scotch temperance party wanted it. He would tell them what took place last year when the Bill was before the House, but the day was never reached for discussing it. The promoters of the Bill, who were a fanatical section of the temperance party in Scotland, deluged the House with Petitions; they deluged Members with Memorials, with letters, and with post cards, he might say almost by the bushel—threatening Members that if they would not vote for this Bill, or if they ventured to vote against it, that no vote of theirs would be again given to them. They endeavoured in every way to convince Members that it was the wish of the people in Scotland to have that Bill. Well, after all this had taken place, and the public excitement had been got up about the Bill, no day was reached for discussing it, and the Bill was withdrawn. What happened then? The hon. Member for Linlithgow would do well to consider this. No sooner was the Bill withdrawn than a new deputation came up from the temperance party in Scotland, not for the purpose of singing Jeremiads over the lost Bill—quite the contrary—they came here to denounce the hon. Member for Linlithgow and all his works. They told Members that that Bill of the hon. Member for Linlithgow and the agitation that had been got up about his Bill had done immense harm to the temperance cause in Scotland. [Mr. M'Lagan: No, no.] They told him so; perhaps they would not tell the hon. Gentleman (Mr. M'Lagan). They would, no doubt, like to make things as pleasant as possible for the hon. Member for Linlithgow. They told him plainly that the hon. Member for Linlithgow had done great harm to the temperance cause in Scotland, and he believed the present Bill was calculated to do so. He, for one, did not want to do any harm to the temperance cause in Scotland, for he was as much in favour of it as any of the fanatical members of the party. All he wanted was a reasonable measure, and as the one now before the House did not come up to that standard, he was compelled to oppose the second reading.

Mr. ERNEST NOEL: I will not detain the House but for a very few moments, because I am very anxious to come to a Division. My chief reason for desiring a Division is because I think that if the Amendment which is now before the House be carried, it might have as strong an effect as if the Bill itself were passed. This is a Temperance Bill, and though I am not a teetotaler myself, I am one who wishes to see the temperance cause prosper, and I believe the passing of the Amendment would do a great deal of good, because the Resolution moved by the hon. Member for Perth is really a strong Temperance Resolution. If we are able to understand one single word in that Resolution, we must draw this conclusion from it, that it asserts that there ought to be given to the different localities an effectual control over the liquor traffic. Now, I want to ask, Sir, what is meant by an effectual control? Whenever we have to deal with the question of Local Option, I find everywhere the same haziness as regards what is meant by the term. Local Option, as I understand it, means giving to the inhabitants of a district the power either to control or withhold the sale of intoxicating drinks. That seems to me to be the ordinary meaning, and I am sure that is what the hon. Member who has moved this Resolution means. The hon. Member intends to give to the people of a district the power to say whether they will withhold altogether or only restrict the sale. That being so, I am perfectly content with the Amendment, for that is what I want to give them. I care not one fig for the Bill itself. My name is on it, and I shall vote for the second reading; but, at the same time, I do not care the least for the details of the measure if I can get something else which will carry out my views and give to the people a control over the liquor trade. I do not know whether I should not be prepared to vote for a measure brought in even by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) himself, if he would undertake to give to the localities an effectual control over the liquor traffic. I advocated at one time the appointment of Boards for that purpose, but that proposal was not accepted. People said—"We are boarded to death; we will try something else." I noticed that there was a certain vagueness in the speech of the Lord Advocate on the question of Local Option; but the hon. and learned Gentleman did say that it might be possible that, in arranging the Government measure, permission would be given to go so far even as prohibition. Let the Government say that definitely, and I, for one, will counsel my hon. Friend to withdraw this Bill and to accept frankly and fairly the Amendment of the hon. Member for Perth, it being always understood that effectual control means the power of the localities to prohibit the sale of liquor. That is, in fact, all we want. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing) has talked about the terrible nature of the proposal to give such a power to the majority, or of handing it over to the mob, as he terms it. I can only say that I was not aware that the majority of all the ratepayers could be called a mob. All we wish for is that a locality itself should have the real and effectual control, as regards prohibition as well as restriction of the liquor traffic, and if we gain this we do not care by what precise means our object is accomplished.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he considered the question was a very difficult one. He understood the Lord Advocate to say that the Government Bill would give to the existing local authorities the power of control, and even that he would go the length of giving them the power of total prohibition. There already existed in Scotland in the hands of the Justices some large measure of local control to the extent, he believed, of refusing to give any licence whatever. But if they gave to the local authority the power of going the whole length of total prohibition, they would upset the whole community in regard to matters of equal importance. If there was a question of total prohibition, what he might call liquor politics would run so high that they would overwhelm everything else. The man who did not take the popular view with regard to that question would not be allowed to serve his country in any other way whatever. He, however, thought the principle underlying the Bill of his hon. Friend was a good one, because it did not favour partial prohibition, but proposed to touch rich and poor alike; and he should therefore vote for the second reading as supporting the principle of the measure. At the same time, he admitted the Bill was open to a good many objections. In the first place, he did not think public opinion in Scotland was yet ripe for a measure like this, and even if it were passed he feared it would be some time before it came into operation. It would be totally impossible to deal with small localities under the Bill. Not only burghs, but whole counties, would need to be embraced to make it work efficiently. He could not help thinking that lodgers were liable to suffer an injustice if they were not allowed a vote in conjunction with the householders, and he also felt it was highly inconsistent to totally suppress public-houses, and at the same time to allow grocers to sell wine, beer, and spirits in any quantity. He was himself in favour of total prohibition, and was quite prepared to sacrifice his own glass of whisky for the benefit of the community.

MR. WARTON said, he was glad a Division would be taken, because, no doubt, the House would then throw out this ridiculous Bill. He disliked both the Bill and the Amendment; but the former was supremely absurd. The renunciation of intoxicating drinks did not appear to have had a very beneficial effect upon the mind of the hon. Member for Linlithgow, judging from the terms of this Bill. The word "district" was freely used in the Bill, and he should like to know what it meant? He feared that under this measure it would be possible to form the boundaries of the districts according to the localities in which the prohibitionists principally dwelt. They were to have some sort of chequered division—the black, the districts where drink was to be sold; and the white, the districts where it was not. It had never entered into the minds of the supporters of the Bill that there might be coterminous districts, and that an unfortunate man who happened to want a drop of whiskey would be unable to get it outside his own district because he would find that the districts overlapped one another. Whether they considered the geography or the unsocial propositions of the Bill, the case was supremely and ridiculously absurd. The important matter before them now was what was the policy of the Government? What had been the policy of the Government? They announced in the Queen's Speech their intention of bringing forward some grand scheme of Local Government, in which the regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors was to be included. But they had entirely changed their minds, and in the Address to the Throne they carefully eliminated any reference to this question. Then they found the Lord Advocate put forward to make excuses. It was cruelty on the part of the Government to use so good a man for making excuses on such a Bill. He was put forward to say that some embodiment of this Bill would be brought forward this Session. The Government knew that by bringing in a ridiculous Reform Bill and a London Government Bill they had blocked the way of bringing in a County Government Bill; and, in fact, that they never intended to deal with the liquor question at all. The Government had shown so many changes of front on this question that they would have a good many people to account to when the General Election came. He (Mr. Warton) had been charged in some mysterious way with being the advocate of the licensed victuallers. He was prepared to protect the rights of individuals, no matter to what class they belonged. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, just before the last General Election, wrote a letter in which he almost promised compensation to the licensed victuallers. He should like the right hon. Gentleman to recite that letter with the statement now made by the Home Secretary. The licensed victuallers had all along considered themselves entitled to the goodwill of their business, and the hon. Member for Linlithgow had shown that that goodwill was of considerable value. The licensed victuallers were as respectable a body of men as any in the country, and when they saw the course the Government were now taking they would consider the sort of Government that was to reign over them in the future. He was very glad in the meantime that the Lord Advocate had torn the Bill to pieces to a certain extent, and had said the Government could not support it. He regretted, however, the sanction the Lord Advocate had given to Local Option. The House had now to choose between two evils, and they must choose the smaller, and therefore he would support the Amendment.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I hope I may be allowed to say one word with reference to this Bill, especially as I am the first Englishman to take part in the debate.

MR. WARTON: I am an Englishman, am I not?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I beg the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon for forgetting his nationality. I was at the moment under the impression that I myself was the only English Member who had risen. I agree very thoroughly with the remarks which have been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ernest Noel) to the effect that what is wanted is that the inhabitants should have an effectual control over the liquor traffic. We do not care how this is brought about. We are not going to quarrel with the Government, or with anybody else, as to how it is brought about, so long as this effectual control is obtained by the people, and they are not compelled to have the traffic thrust upon them when they do not want it. Let me just point out how the case stands with regard to the Government. The House will remember that it has three times passed a Resolution in favour of the people being invested with the power which the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) desires to give them. The first of these Resolutions was to the effect that this was a desirable thing; the second was considerably stronger than the first; and the third was to the effect that the House considered the matter one of urgent necessity. This Bill is simply the supplement of those three Resolutions. The House has decided the matter to be urgent; but unfortunately the Government, who alone can carry a Bill of this nature through the House, have not yet seen their way to bring in a measure to carry that Resolution, and those which preceded it, into effect. I am not going to blame them on this occasion for their delay, although I think the country is very much dissatisfied to see that delay. No one can say that I have hurried the Government. I have not even asked a single Question about the liquor traffic all this Session, but I have left them alone to carry out their scheme for dealing with the liquor traffic. After I have waited so patiently, and after the country has waited so patiently, I think there will be considerable surprise that the Lord Advocate did not say he would support a Bill which would simply carry out the Resolutions I have referred to—

which would simply and solely and clearly carry out those Resolutions. [The LORD ADVOCATE dissented.] I see that the hon. and learned Gentleman shakes his head, but he cannot deny the propositions I have stated. We looked to the Government simply to support the principle of the Bill, leaving the details to be arranged as they liked in Committee; but the Government say they cannot find it in their hearts to do this. I am sorry for it, and I think the country will be sorry for it also when they read his speech. But, whatever happens, the friends of temperance in this country may be well satisfied, because if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker) is carried, the House will thereby declare it to be of the utmost importance that local communities should obtain an effectual control over the liquor traffic. The hon. Member for Perth asks for large and comprehensive measures. He wants something more than a Bill of this kind; he is a glutton. I do not blame him for that; only I think he is rather like a dog in the manger, in that he will not let us have our little measures because he cannot get his big measure. I shall certainly support my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan), who has brought forward the most honest and straightforward Bill on this liquor traffic ever introduced into the House of Commons; but even if the Amendment is carried, the friends of temperance ought to be satisfied, because the House will then declare that the localities ought to have that effectual control which has so long been asked for by the people of this country.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON observed, that the arguments against the Bill had been so conclusively put that he need not try to add to their force. But he wished to ask the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) to have the courage of his opinions, and to ask his constituents whether they approved his support of a Bill which, if passed, might deprive 487,000 of his constituents on the 1st of next September of all means of procuring liquor. The hon. Member had had his name on no fewer than nine Liquor Bills during the last few years. Would he go and tell them what he had done, and see whether they would give him their assent?

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 148: Majority 83.—(Div. List, No. 87.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, after the Division he hoped the House would not be asked to proceed further. The Amendment was a very objectionable one, as it was virtually the Resolution, or something like it, which was proposed on a former occasion by the hon. Member for Carlisle. It was impossible to ask the House to agree to it without discussion, and only five minutes remained before the hour at which the debate must stand adjourned. Under these circumstances, he had no alternative but to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Thomas Collins.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

And it being after a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCE—SARAKHS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I rise to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice. It is, Whether the Government are in a position to confirm or deny the report that a Convention has been concluded between Russia and Persia for the cession of Sarakhs by the Shah to Russia?

EARL GRANVILLE: Her Majesty's Government have no confirmation of this report; and, unless it should be confirmed, I can hardly believe it. Sarakhs is garrisoned by Persian soldiers, and as lately as last September our Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg assured us that Sarakhs would be always outside the Russian line. I do not like to make a guess about a thing I do not know; but I think it is very likely that some confusion has arisen from the fact that there are two places bearing the same name—Sarakhs.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—RELIEF OF GENERAL GORDON. QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to a telegraphic despatch to Mr. Egerton, dated Foreign Office, 23rd April, 1884, in which occur the following words:—

"That we do not propose to supply him (General Gordon) with a Turkish or other force for the purpose of undertaking military expeditions,"

Whether Her Majesty's Government are in a position to co-operate with the Government of the Porte in sending Turkish troops to the Soudan with a view to the relief of General Gordon and the Egyptian garrison of Khartoum, if the Sultan should be willing to do so? said, he had put the Question with no desire to obtain information which it might be inconvenient for Her Majesty's Government to supply, but only to draw attention to the fact that General Gordon, in his most recent despatches, more than once urged the sending of Turkish troops to the Soudan as an effectual means of putting down the insurrection. He (Earl De La Warr) noticed with some surprise that, in the Papers just laid upon the Table of the House [Egypt, No. 13], no mention whatever was made of any communication between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Porte. He was, therefore, at a loss to understand the meaning of the words—

"We do not propose to supply him (General Gordon) with a Turkish or other force for the purpose of undertaking military expeditions against the Mahdi, such expeditions," it was added, "being beyond the scope of the commission he holds, and at variance with the pacific policy which was the purpose of his mission to the Soudan."—[Egypt, No. 20 (1884).]

It was clear that Turkish troops could only be sent to Khartoum, or any part of the Soudan, with the consent of the Sultan; but they had not been informed whether any communication had been made to the Porte on that subject. In the despatch of the noble Earl it was stated that General Gordon was not to be supplied with Turkish troops for the purpose of undertaking military expeditions; but that did not necessarily imply that they might not be sent for other purposes, it might be of relief or defence. In a telegram received at the Foreign Office on April 9, from Sir Evelyn Baring, it was stated that General Gordon said—

"If you could get, by good pay, 3,000 Turkish infantry and 1,000 Turkish cavalry, the affair, including crushing of Mahdi, would be accomplished in four months."

Sir Evelyn Baring, in a telegram from Cairo, dated April 11, added—

"The only Turkish forces which would be at all possible to send are regiments of the Sultan's army."—[Egypt, No. 13 (1884), pp. 9, 10, 11.]

Those were the words of Sir Evelyn Baring. General Gordon repeated again his former telegram, dated April 8, and received at Cairo April 18, in which he said that 3,000 Turkish troops from the Sultan "would settle Soudan and Mahdi for ever." A telegram to the same effect was received at Cairo the following day, April 19, in which it was added—

"Do you think that an appeal to the millionaires of America and England for the raising of £200,000 would be of any avail?"—[Ibid. p. 13.]

Such being the views of General Gordon in repeated telegrams, he felt he was not putting a Question to the noble Earl which could be considered inopportune.

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, that on reading the Question as it appeared on the Notice Paper, it seemed to him rather doubtful whether it was one for more information about General Gordon's safety, or was of an argumentative character. But, after hearing the noble Earl's speech, he had only to say that the Government had no more information to give than they had already supplied. It was not opportune at the present moment, he considered, to go further into the matter.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS— HYDE PARK CORNER—STATUE OF THE LATE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether it is intended to remove the equestrian statue of the late Duke of Wellington from London before the proposed fund for another statue is collected?

LORD THURLOW, in reply, said, that the precise date for the removal of the statue was not yet fixed, but that it would be fixed as soon as the minor details connected with the matter had been settled. As to the subscription for raising the necessary funds for the new statue, it had been already set on foot, and several promises of large sums had been given, as well as several subscriptions actually received. In fact there was every reason to believe that an ample fund would be forthcoming before it was possible to remove the equestrian statue from its present position. No time, however, would be lost in carrying out the plans which had been decided upon.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, that as he had not an opportunity of addressing their Lordships when this subject was before the House on a former evening, he would like to make a few observations now, because his Father—the late Duke of Rutland—took an extreme interest in placing the statue upon the Arch, and for 10 years of his life it was his principal object. He (the Duke of Rutland) had sent some facts in a letter to The Morning Post, which might or might not have been read by their Lordships. One fact was, that the Duke of Wellington refused to sit for his likeness to Wyatt until he received the sanction of the Queen that the statue should be placed upon the arch. The second was, that the Duke did sit to Wyatt, and several times; and that he expressed to Wyatt that he (the Duke) would like him (Wyatt) to see him upon horseback, as he was naturally proud of his seat on horseback. The third fact was, that the Duke was annoyed at the idea of the statue being taken down; and the fourth was, that the Committee in their final Report—when the statue was placed upon the Arch—said that it was a likeness of the Duke of Wellington as he appeared at the Battle of Waterloo. He did not know whether he ought to trouble their Lordships by reading extracts upon which he based this statement. With their Lordships' permission, however, he would read them. The first extract was a Minute of the Sub-Committee, dated December 2, 1846, and it was as follows:—

“When Her Majesty the Queen was graciously pleased to approve of the Arch as the position of the intended statue, she was so good as to express a most ready acquiescence in the wish of the Committee, and even went so far as to say that she should consider that the statue on the summit of the Triumphal Arch would be an object of great ornament to that part of the Metropolis, and she should rejoice to see upon it the memorial of so great a man as the Duke of Wellington.”

The next extract was from a letter from the Duke of Rutland to Mr. Croker, dated June 1, 1847, detailing an account of an interview with Lord John Russell, and it ran thus—

“I said that I was not aware that his Lordship knew the Duke, who had hitherto avoided the expression of any opinion on the subject, had lately evinced the strongest desire that the statue should remain where it was, and that I and my Colleagues felt that if we did not follow up his wishes, by directing the artist to remove more of the scaffolding, we should actually offend His Grace.”

The third was an extract from a Minute of the Sub-Committee, under date of June 28, 1847, and was signed by the Duke of Rutland, the Chairman of the Committee. It was to this effect—

“And all these objections are fortified by knowing its removal to be distasteful to the illustrious individual whose achievements it was their object to commemorate, and whose consent to sit to the artist they obtained on the express statement that the Arch had been granted by the Queen in the terms before quoted for the site of the Statue."

The following was an extract from the final Report of the Sub-Committee, dated June 3, 1848:—

"They rejoiced at having completed their anxious labours by the erection of a memorial surpassing in magnitude every other equestrian statue in the world, and conveying to posterity a faithful similitude of His Grace as he appeared on the great day of Waterloo."

In the second volume of The Life of Bishop Wilberforce, at page 412, dated October 17, 1858, this passage occurs—

"I asked Lord Aberdeen—'Do you believe a story Brougham told me, that the Duke meant, if the equestrian statue were taken down, to resign his commission?' And that he said—'I fear I cannot the Peerage.' 'I do not believe that; but it might be true.'"

He felt wonderfully strongly about its being an indignity. A lady had informed him that, at the time the statue was put up, she was very anxious to know whether it was a correct likeness of the Duke, and she asked an old Peninsular veteran what he thought of it, and his reply was—"Well, mum, it is the likeliest thing I have ever see'd (sic). I have over and over again see'd the Duke in that attitude giving the word of command." He (the Duke of Rutland) was aware that a Vote for the removal of the statue had been agreed to in the House of Commons; but he implored Her Majesty's Government, and the country as well, before the final step was taken, to consider what it was they were really going to do. If they were to remove this statue, because they thought it was not of an artistic character, he wanted to know what statue in London would remain where it was? What statue was there that some critic or artist would not find fault with, and say that some blunder had been made in executing it? This statue embodied all the memories of the great man who had passed away, and was it to be removed merely because the artist had happened to have made a blunder? He did not doubt that Mr. Boehm would make a very fine statue, but it could not be the commemorative figure, showing the Duke on horseback, as he appeared at the Battle of Waterloo, that pleased the Duke, who did not wish it to be removed from its present position. Therefore, it should not be so removed; for even if it were, and even if Mr.

Boehm did make what might be called a fine statue now, and which should be put in the place of the old one, what security had they that some 20 years hence the Royal Academicians and the Art critics of the day might not arrive at the conclusion that it was not an artistic piece of sculpture, and that they could do much better. This was really a very serious matter, and it was one that should not be decided by a number of gentlemen upon a Committee; it ought to be decided by the feeling of the country. As yet, however, the public had had very little opportunity of expressing their opinion on the matter. He hoped, therefore, that even at that eleventh hour, the subject might be reconsidered by Her Majesty's Government. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales had taken great interest in this subject, and with that patriotism and loyalty for which he was distinguished, when he heard that this statue was to be melted down and done away with, he had come forward, and had proposed the plan which, at all events, saved the statue from destruction. The whole of the Correspondence had been presented by the Committee to his Father, and both His Royal Highness and the Government were ignorant of the facts he had then stated. In conclusion, he would appeal to the Government and the nation, whether, knowing the sentiments of the noble Duke, as he the (Duke of Rutland) had now explained them, they would still insist on removing the statue to Aldershot, because such removal would be an outrage on the memory of the illustrious dead?

LORD DE ROS said, he had not, during the discussion, heard a single word as to the opinion of the officers of the Army on the subject. He was certain that if the sentiment and feelings of the British Army had been consulted, it would have been in favour of preserving the statue, if not in the present locality, at any rate, in the vicinity of Apsley House, whether it was replaced on the Arch or not. He did not see where it could be placed at Aldershot, and he hoped the appeal of the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland) would have weight with Her Majesty's Government.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, that the matter had been discussed ad nauseam. This was the sixth or seventh time it had been brought before the House, and he wished to know how often these discussions were to take place? The noble Duke complained that public opinion had not been fully tested; but it had been so far tested that in both Houses the scheme had been approved by a majority in its favour. His noble and gallant Friend asked whether the Army had been consulted. The Army was well represented on the Committee, and it was understood that the officers at Aldershot had asked for its removal there. As to the expense of a pedestal for it, when it arrived there, the funds of the Prince of Wales's Committee would be ample to meet any expenditure. He must now protest against further discussion in the matter.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, it was very true, as the noble Viscount had said, that the subject had been discussed from time to time; but it had now come forward in quite a different phase, and information had been brought forward which had not come before their Lordships in previous discussions. The House having now been put authentically, and for the first time, in possession of the facts of the case, an Address to the Throne ought to be moved for at once in reference to it, the other House having passed a Motion on the subject without anything like a full knowledge concerning it. He denied that the House of Commons had decided in favour of the removal of the statue. They had been told that the statue was to go, and were asked whether they would vote the money for the construction of another equestrian statue to take its place, to which they assented.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he would not by one word prolong the argument. He rather agreed with the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Hardinge), that the subject was one which had already been pretty well ventilated both in and out of Parliament. It had been suggested by the noble and gallant Lord opposite (Lord De Ros) that an appeal should be made to the Army; while, as far as he (Earl Granville) could understand him, the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland) had suggested a plebiscite of the nation; but, in view of the fact that the question had already been settled in both Houses, he was at a loss to understand what machinery could be necessary for making the test. Her Majesty's Government were not yet so Radical that, after the discussions which had taken place in both Houses of Parliament, they would submit the matter to a plebiscite of the people.

SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in rising, according to Notice, to present a Bill for the reform of the Local Government of Scotland, said: My Lords, the House will not be surprised that Her Majesty's Government should again this year introduce a measure dealing with the Government of Scotland. Not to go further back in the history of this question than the Bill of last year, I may remind your Lordships that, at the end of last Session, a Bill dealing with the Local Government of Scotland passed through the House of Commons, with the support and approval of the great majority of the Scottish Members of Parliament, and came up to your Lordships' House. Your Lordships saw fit to reject that Bill on the second reading; but I may remind your Lordships that, with scarcely an exception, all the speeches that were made on both sides of the House agreed upon this—that, however faulty the measure might be, nevertheless some measure of the kind was urgently needed, and ought to be passed. The Bill of last year, so far as I could understand the facts, was thrown out, partly on the ground of detail, but partly because, as observed by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), there was not time then to consider the Bill, but partly, also, on the ground that the Scottish people were not sufficiently urgent in pressing for the Bill. Well, now, as regards the desire of the Scottish people to have a Bill of this kind, I need only refer to the great public meeting held at Edinburgh at the beginning of this year—a meeting presided over by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lothian), and at which my noble Friend opposite (Lord Balfour) and several other noble Lords attended and spoke. I also attended that meeting; but I attended it only as a looker-on, and chiefly in the hope of the profit and instruction that I expected to derive from the speech of the noble Marquess. Although I was certainly an interested spectator in one sense of the word, I was in another a perfectly impartial one, and I can only assure your Lordships that I was very greatly impressed by the magnitude and the character of that great assembly. In the opinion of many whose judgments are much more worth having than mine, such a meeting has rarely, if ever, taken place either in Scotland or any other country of the world. There were representatives of every class, representatives of every section of the nation, representatives of every shade of opinion, political and religious. The discussion lasted for some three hours, and I think there were some 30 or 40 speeches; and, so far as I recollect, there was not one single discordant note from beginning to end. After that, I think it would be impossible for any opponent of this measure to say that the Scottish people, as a nation, do not strongly and urgently require a Bill of this nature. The Government have also been anxious to meet the wishes and criticism of the noble Marquess opposite. They have, therefore, introduced this measure in the House of Lords at this early period of the Session; and though, of course, it is very possible that the ingenuity of the noble Marquess in discovering reasons for the rejection of measures proposed by Her Majesty's Government may not be baffled by this simple precaution, still, the noble Marquess will admit that, if this Bill is to follow the fate of the Bill of last year, it must be on some other ground than that of want of time. Then, as to the details urged by my noble Friend opposite (Lord Balfour), the Government have taken pains also to meet the objections which he raised last year, and I hope that when he sees this measure he will be of opinion that they have not been unsuccessful in their attempt. I ought to say that, in the Notice that stands on the Paper in my name, there is an error in the title of this Bill. Instead of "A Bill for the Reform of the Local Government of Scotland," it ought to be called "A Bill for appointing a Secretary for Scotland." This Bill appoints a Secretary for Scotland—not of a Scottish Local Board—who is to hold Office during Her Majesty's pleasure, and who is to have a permanent Assistant Secretary. The Secretary for Scotland, if he is not a Member of your Lordships' House, must, at all events, be a person eligible for a seat in the House of Commons; and he will be in this position—that if he be a Member of Parliament, on acceptance of the Office he will be required to vacate his seat, and seek re-election at the hands of his constituents. This Bill also transfers to the Secretary for Scotland all the powers and duties which are vested in the Secretary of State in relation to the Universities of Scotland; also, all rights of patronage relating to offices and appointments in Scotland which are vested in the Secretary of State; also, all powers and duties vested in the Secretary of State by certain Amendments specified in the Schedule. I will not go through the Schedule; because I think I should have an undue advantage over your Lordships in doing so, and some difficulty in making your Lordships understand my meaning if I attempted it. This Bill reserves to the Lord Advocate all the rights, powers, and privileges which he has hitherto enjoyed. The difference between the Bill and the Bill of last year, to put it very shortly, is this—that the authority to be constituted is that of a Secretary, and not that of a Local Board. Provision is made in this Bill, as in the Bill of last year, for the appointment of an Assistant Secretary—a permanent officer—and the powers and duties of the Secretary of State for the Home Department in relation to the Universities were not in the Bill of last year, but will, by this Bill, be transferred to the Secretary for Scotland. The administration of the Education and Endowments Acts is also transferred from the Education Department to the Scottish Secretary. My Lords, to give you a sufficient description of all the alterations this Bill will make would require a great length of time, and could hardly be satisfactorily made until the measure is in your Lordships' hands. I will, therefore, defer that to a later stage of the Bill, and content myself by moving that it be now read a first time.

Bill for appointing a Secretary for Scotland—Presented (The Earl of DALHOUSIE).

LORD BALFOUR: I do not desire to make any criticism of the measure which the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Dalhousie) has laid on the Table of your Lordships' House, for the simple reason that I have not been able from his explanation to really gauge the scope of the measure. I will not deny the necessity for the measure, and I am very glad indeed that he has introduced it at a much earlier period of the Session than was the case last year, and has, therefore, given us time to give it a fair and full consideration. I am glad to be able to corroborate almost entirely what he said in regard to the meeting which was held in Scotland, and I would add this—I do not think, between him and myself—in fact, between him and almost anyone who has spoken in public on this subject—that there is any difference in principle. This measure is obviously one the details of which require the most careful consideration; and I am quite certain that, if there is any point of difference, it will be on points of detail, such as, perhaps, can be best considered before a Select Committee, where arguments can be exchanged, and that without making set speeches. I therefore would venture to suggest that, as we have plenty of time before us, some time should be given before the second reading is taken; or an engagement should be entered into by the Government that they will not oppose the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee of your Lordships' House. In saying that I would like to add this—that I do not propose this course with any intention of delaying or obstructing the progress of the measure, because I know that there is a strong feeling in favour of something of the kind in Scotland. But I am sure anyone who has held high Office will corroborate me, when I express my opinion that, in changing the Department which has to conduct Business, and the details of Business, it is most necessary to be very careful as to the way in which that is done. It would be, in my opinion, a great misfortune if there was a separation in the management of those affairs which are regulated by the same statutory authority for England and Scotland. The noble Earl did not say whether such things as the regulation of factories and mines was to be transferred to the new Office. Now, that was one of the principal objections I urged—that those things which are regulated by the same statutes for England and Scotland should not be transferred from the Home Office. I shall not, however, attempt to criticize the measure further at this stage, but shall confine myself to asking the Government whether they can now fix a day for the second reading, or to express an opinion as to the proposal I make for the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I only wish to assure the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Dalhousie) that I am not in the least degree unfriendly to the object of this Bill. I should be very glad to see some such Bill passed, as I am convinced it is the wish of the people of Scotland; but, on the other hand, I concur with my noble Friend who has just spoken that the details should be carefully scrutinized, in order to avoid any inconvenience arising.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Dalhousie) stated that the Bill has come with an inexact title; but he did not say what the title was. He says there is to be a Secretary for Scotland. I presume he means a Secretary of State. As to the request of my noble Friend (Lord Balfour) that the second reading should be deferred for some time, I quite agree that that is desirable; but to ask Her Majesty's Government now to say that they commit themselves to refer the Bill to a Select Committee seems to me to be a strong demand. I think it would be better for us to see what the Bill is, and then, on the second reading, decide for ourselves whether it should go to a Select Committee or not.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: Perhaps I might ask whether the new Secretary is intended to be a Member of the Privy Council, like the Chief Secretary for Ireland?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: I must defer giving an answer to the question just asked by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Belmore). I am glad to be able to express agreement with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Galloway), that to ask, at this stage of the proceedings, that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee is rather a strong request. I thought of putting down the second reading of the Bill for the 20th instant; but I do not know whether your Lordships would consider that too early a period. As to the question whether or not the Secretary for Scotland is to be a Secretary of State, I have emphatically to say that he will not be a Secretary of State, and it is not so intended he should be. The Secretaryship for Scotland will be a Secretaryship altogether inferior to that of a Secretary of State.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (POOR LAW) (No. 4) (BELCHALWELL, &c.) BILL.—[Bill 150.] (Mr. George Russell, Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

CONSIDERATION AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now considered."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he entertained strong objections to this Bill on the question of principle; but he had had no idea that it would be brought on for consideration that day. He would, therefore, ask the hon. Baronet to consent to postpone it until that day week.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER intimated that he had no objection to postpone the Bill, and he would put it down for consideration to-morrow.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—THE GOLD CURRENCY—THE HALF-SOVEREIGN.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD gave Notice that to-morrow he would ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, after the passing of the Bill to reduce the intrinsic value of the half-sovereign by one-tenth, the Bank of England would be compelled to receive from bankers and others the half-sovereign now in circulation, whether heavy or light, in exchange for Bank of England notes; and, whether the Bank of England would be empowered to issue notes at the fixed value of the half-sovereign token?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I will reply to the Question now. A part of it I answered by anticipation in my Financial Statement, and the remainder will be dealt with by the Coinage Bill.

THE MAURITIUS—PUNISHMENT OF FLOGGING.

MR. HOPWOOD (for Mr. P. A. TAYLOR) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the punishment of flogging for prison offences has been introduced into the Mauritius; whether this was done in opposition to the feelings of the people expressed in Memorials; whether the authorities charged with the duty have neglected to observe the precautions laid down by the Secretary of State; and, whether it is now discovered that Indians have died from the effects of the flogging with the "cat" inflicted by the officials?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The punishment of flogging for prison offences was introduced by Ordinance in 1851. I can find no trace of any Memorials or other representations against it. The Secretary of State is not prepared to say that there has been neglect of the precautions directed to be observed; but he has under consideration proposals for securing greater caution. It has certainly not been discovered that Indians have died from the effects of flogging. In a recent case, which has been very carefully considered, the conclusion arrived at by the Secretary of State is, that the medical evidence does not point to the conclusion that death was attributable to the corporal punishment inflicted. I may add, that if only a new prison is constructed, which has been frequently pressed on the authorities in Mauritius, the necessity for any frequent use of the lash will, I hope, be greatly obviated.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. T. DOWLING, J.P.—HEAD CONSTABLE ROSS PARKES.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. MAYNE) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the constables who brought the charge against Mr. Thomas Dowling, J.P., on which he was convicted of drunkenness and fined, are being removed from the district; whether their removal is in pursuance of a threat made by Head Constable Ross Parkes that "he would scatter them like sheep through the country" as a punishment for their having brought and sustained said charge; whether, having regard to the relation of Head Constable Ross Parkes with Mr. Dowling and his treatment of these constables, the Government will consider the propriety of removing him from the locality; and, whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has decided to retain Mr. Thomas Dowling amongst the magistracy of Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN: The police on duty at the station referred to are, generally speaking, relieved about once a month. Such removal is by no means regarded as a punishment. No men were removed on any such grounds as are stated in the Question, and Head Constable Parkes denies having used such words as are imputed to him. He is a man of whom his superior officers speak in the highest terms, and they protest strongly against the unfounded accusation made against him. Mr. Dowling's case is still under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—MISCONDUCT OF "EMERGENCY MEN."

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. MAYNE) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a report in the The Clonmel Chronicle of April 5th, of a charge preferred against a man named Devine, an Emergency man in charge of an evicted farm, of presenting a revolver at a man named Maher; whether it appeared in evidence that Devine pulled out a revolver—

"Covered Maher with it, measured him, stepped back three paces, and said, 'I will shoot you quick;'" and, when arrested, was found in possession of a loaded revolver; whether Colonel Carew, R.M., although this evidence was un rebutted, discharged Devine, and ordered the revolver to be returned to him, observing to him—

"You have already admitted that you presented the revolver, and, undoubtedly, if you shot anyone in that place you would be on your trial for murder. . . . I will look upon this as a public-house brawl, and you may go away; you have got a very good character, and something may have been said that provoked you;"

and, whether he has observed that, at the Cashel Petty Sessions Colonel Carew, R.M., only fined fifteen shillings an Emergency man named Noble, who admitted that he was drunk and discharging firearms on the public road?

MR. TREVELYAN: The view of Devine's case taken by the magistrate appears to have been that he was recognized as an Emergency man, and had received some provocation, and eventually drew the revolver as a deterrent, but not with an intention of discharging it. In the case of Noble, a full Bench of Magistrates considered the penalties imposed sufficient. Since his conviction the Emergency Committee have ceased to employ him.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—PROCURATORS FISCAL.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the complaint by the Highland Commission of procurators fiscal holding other situations, he will be prepared to order that in future no procurator fiscal will accept the office of bank agent, or factor, or land agent for any landed proprietor?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): The views expressed by the Crofters Commission on this subject were before the Government when the discussion raised by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) on the 21st of April took place; and I have nothing to add to what I then stated in regard to the principles and considerations with reference to which, in the judgment of the Government, such appointments ought to be made. Along with the Report of the Crofters Commission there ought to be kept in view the very weighty and well-considered Report of the Law Commission, presented to Parliament in 1871.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSIONERS— THE EXAMINERS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, How many of the Civil Service Examiners in each of the following departments are selected from Ireland and the professional staff of Irish schools or colleges, viz. English Language and Literature, Scripture, Greek and Latin Languages, French, German, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, Hindustani, Sanskrit, Mathematics, Chemistry and Experimental Physics, Botany and Zoology, Moral Science, Law and Constitutional History, and Bookkeeping?

MR. COURTNEY: The Civil Service Commissioners inform me that they select as Examiners the best men they can secure, irrespective of their places of birth or education. A list of the gentlemen so employed will be found at pages 12 and 13 of the last Report of the Commissioners.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that only three or four out of 50 or 60 Examiners were Irishmen. These Examiners were Professors of English Colleges, and prepared students in the subjects in which they afterwards examined them, thereby handicapping Irish students, who got no such assistance, unfairly, especially in Political Economy and Jurisprudence, in which no special course was laid down.

INDIA (NATIVE STATES)—THE HYDERABAD DEBT.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any reliable information as to the alleged debt of the Hyderabad State; whether any inquiry has been or will be made as to its amount; whether a Report from Major General Glasfurd, Settlement Commissioner, addressed to the Revenue Secretary of the Hyderabad State on February 4th, 1884, and communicated to the Government of India, relating to rack-renting of the ryots and to cruelty and extortion practised in the collection of revenue by the native officials has been received at the India Office; and, if so, whether it will be laid upon the Table of the House; whether any action has been taken, either by the Government of India or by the Native Government, in consequence of this Report; whether the Talukdars of Dharasio and Bidur, whose cruelty and negligence were the subject of that Report, have been in any way punished; and, whether the superior officials, the Sudder Talukdars, through whose laxity of supervision this misconduct took place, have been in any way punished?

MR. J. K. CROSS: No official statement respecting the debt of the Hyderabad State has yet been received, though an inquiry is now in progress. I may say, however, that Mr. Cordery, our Resident at Hyderabad, who is at present in England, informs me that the debt is stated by Salar Jung to be about 150 Hali Sicca rupees, in addition to the railway debt—about 100 lakhs being due to Government officials. No Report from Major General Glasfurd had been received on the 9th of April, the day Mr. Cordery left Hyderabad.

MR. GORST inquired whether the hon. Gentleman would ask the Government of India whether any Report had been communicated to them?

MR. J. K. CROSS said, that if the hon. and learned Gentleman would give him any indication of such a Report having been made at all, he would communicate with the Government of India upon the subject.

MR. GORST said, he should be happy to give the hon. Gentleman private information as to the existence of a Report which was communicated to the Viceroy of India.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—AS- SAULTS IN A POLICE CELL.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the evidence given at Ballinasloe Petty Sessions on April 26th, from which it appeared that a young man named Goode, arrested on a charge of assault which was afterwards dismissed, was locked up from a quarter to twelve o'clock at night until seven o'clock in the morning in a police cell with a man named M'Donagh, who was in a state of furious drunkenness, and who made a series of savage attacks on Goode during the night, biting the index finger of his right hand through and almost severing the joint; whether it appeared that the orderly visited the cell three times during the night, and saw the men in conflict, but declined to separate them, notwithstanding Goode's shrieks for assistance; whether, notwithstanding the direction of Mr. Fowler, J.P., that M'Donagh should be prosecuted for the assault, he was allowed to leave Ballinasloe without being made amenable; if so, by whose default; and, whether an inquiry will be directed into the conduct of the police in the transaction?

MR. TREVELYAN: The facts appear to be that two prisoners named Goode and M'Donagh, who were being detained in a strong room of the barrack, quarrelled, and assaulted each other during the night. The injuries inflicted were not all on one side; but, on the contrary, Goode appears to have been the aggressor. The orderly heard quarrelling, and went to the strong room three times during the night, but saw nothing of a sufficiently serious character to induce him to remove one of the men. It is not the case that Mr. Fowler, J.P., directed that M'Donagh should be prosecuted for assaulting Goode; but he did direct that Goode should be prosecuted. A cross case was subsequently brought against M'Donagh by Goode, and both were convicted and fined. At the hearing of these cases there was a conflict of evidence between the barrack orderly and Goode, as to the latter having called for assistance; and, under the circumstances, a charge of neglect of duty has been preferred against the orderly. This charge is still pending.

POST OFFICE—WEIGHTS AND SCALES.

MR. GRAY asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will investigate the statement made by Mr. H. A. Bunting, of Didebury, Manchester, and reported in The Postal Telegraphic and Tele- phonic Gazette of May 2nd, to the effect that, on presenting at thirty-three post offices in the neighbourhood a test parcel certified under one pound in weight, three branch offices, ten town receiving offices, and two country sub-offices demanded payment of sixpence instead of the legal charge of threepence, owing to their scales being inaccurate, and wrongly representing the parcel as over one pound in weight; whether weights and scales used for postal purposes are exempt from the supervision of the ordinary inspectors of weights and measures; whether, if they are inaccurate, any person can be held responsible criminally or civilly; and, whether there is any system of inspection of such weights and scales, or any guarantee to the public of their accuracy?

MR. FAWCETT: It has been the practice to carefully test the weights and scales used in post offices before they have been issued by the Department, and periodically to examine them. Before the letter to which the hon. Member refers appeared, I considered the question of whether it might not be expedient to take some further steps to secure the accuracy of the weights and scales. I have been in communication with the Board of Trade on the subject, with the object of allowing the inspection of the weights and scales by the regular local Inspectors. If any person is overcharged through a letter or parcel being inaccurately weighed, the amount would, of course, be returned to him by the Post Office.

MR. GRAY: Will the arrangement apply to the whole Kingdom?

MR. FAWCETT: Oh, yes; certainly.

SALE OF POISONS BILL.

MR. WARTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, When the Government intend to introduce, into the other House, their promised Bill on Patent Medicines?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, he understood the Sale of Poisons Bill, which would deal also with the sale of medicines, would be ready in a few days, and would be immediately introduced.

JAMAICA — ENCUMBERED ESTATES COURT—CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM —THE FRANCHISE.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government has come to any decision with respect to the abolition of the Encumbered Estates Court in Jamaica, as recommended by the Royal Commissioners? The hon. and learned Member further asked, what was to be the new franchise in Jamaica, and how many electors would be created?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The Royal Commissioners have replied to the letter (presented to Parliament) of the Encumbered Estates Commissioners, and that reply will be transmitted to the Encumbered Estates Commission for their further observations. Besides, the Government, before coming to any decision, will have to consult the West India Governments. As to my hon. and learned Friend's further Question, the new franchise will be either occupation of house rated to poor rates, with payment of not less than £1 annually for rates and taxes, or ownership of property in respect of which not less than 30s. is paid annually for rates and taxes. It is estimated that about 15,000 will be the number of electors.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—THE LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether, having in view the efficient manner in which the local authorities have performed their duties under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, and especially to the fact that the authorities of the county of Hereford have been specially eulogized in a recent Privy Council Circular, it is the intention of the Government in any way to curtail the powers of the said local authorities?

MR. DODSON: I am sensible of the efficient manner in which many local authorities, that of Herefordshire among the number, have exercised the powers referred to in the Circular, and other powers intrusted to them. I am generally desirous of leaving the administration of these matters, as far as possible, in the hands of local authorities. The Privy Council, however, are bound to intervene from time to time to prevent conflict between the regulations of local authorities, and to meet emergencies or changes of circumstances. I cannot, therefore, give such an undertaking as an answer to the Question would imply.

IRISH LAND COMMISSIONERS—SITTINGS OF THE SUB-COMMISSIONERS ON GOOD FRIDAY.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the holding of a Court by the Sub-Commissioners in Ireland on Good Friday, which is a Bank Holiday, was legal; and, if legal, whether he could in future prevent the holding of a Court, which is contrary to usage, on a day on which the majority of the places of Public Worship in the United Kingdom are open for Divine Service?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Sir, there is nothing illegal in the Court of Sub-Commissioners sitting on Good Friday. It is for the Land Commission to regulate the days of sittings. On the particular occasion to which, I presume, the hon. Member refers, the Sub-Commission sat at the special request of the principal professional men, and for their convenience.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— COUNTY INSPECTOR FRENCH.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether County Inspector James Ellis French, Director of the Detective Department of the Royal Irish Constabulary, has been dismissed from that force; if so, if he would state on what grounds and on what terms?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. French, having been examined by a Medical Board, and certified to be both mentally and physically incapacitated for further service in the Constabulary, has, with the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant, been struck off the strength of the force. All other questions relating to the case remain open for further consideration.

MR. O'BRIEN: What time did Mr. French cease to hold his position as Detective Director?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not know the exact date.

MR. O'BRIEN: I am obliged to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he made personal inquiries in reference to the charges notoriously made against this man; and whether or not he satisfied himself as to the truth of these charges; and, if so, why he left to a private individual the substantiation of these charges, knowing that it must be difficult to prove them?

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member asked me a Question. I do not know the exact date that Mr. French was relieved from his duty. If the hon. Member wishes to put any Questions to me I will answer them. The Government have acted with their eyes open in this matter.

MR. O'BRIEN: The right hon. Gentleman surely can answer whether he himself instituted personal inquiries into the notorious charges against this man; and, if so, what was the result of his inquiry?

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member will, perhaps, give Notice of his Question. It is not my duty specially to institute inquiries. I have a general knowledge of the subject quite sufficient for me to know that from the moment there was any suspicion of Mr. French's conduct the Government at once made inquiries into the matter.

MR. O'BRIEN: I wish to know, then, whether it was upon the right hon. Gentleman's directions French brought the action against me?

MR. TREVELYAN: Certainly not; that is not the case.

MR. O'BRIEN: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I shall ask the Chief Secretary on what date James Ellis French was first removed from the position of Detective Director of the Royal Irish Constabulary; whether any official inquiry was made with respect to the charges against him before public reference was made to them; if so, why that inquiry was not followed up; and, whether there is any intention to bestow a pension upon him?

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—SENTENCES OF FLOGGING FOR BEGGING.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of George Wells, sentenced as an incorrigible rogue and vagabond under 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, in respect of convictions for begging, by Mr. William Hardman, the Chairman of the Surrey Sessions, on the 10th of April last, to twelve months' imprisonment and "twelve strokes of the cat-o'-nine-tails;" whether the same George Wells was in June 1881 sentenced by the same chairman for a similar offence to twelve months' imprisonment with "twelve strokes of the birch rod;" whether the same George Wells, in October, 1882, was sentenced by the same chairman for a similar offence to twelve months' imprisonment, with "twenty-five strokes of the birch rod;" whether the punishment of whipping under the above Act had been long laid aside, until revived at the Surrey Sessions; and, whether he will support a Bill to repeal, or will, by expressing disapproval, repress this punishment now three times inflicted upon the same individual?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have made inquiries into this case, and the man appears to have been a bad character. If the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to have my opinion, I will say that I do not consider flogging an appropriate punishment for offences of this character.

LAW AND JUSTICE—DENIS DEASY, A CONVICT.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Denis Deasy, at present undergoing penal servitude in Chatham Prison, is in a condition of health so dangerous to his life as to warrant his discharge from prison? I would specially request the attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to a letter from the Governor of the gaol to the unfortunate man's sister on the 1st of May, in which he says—

"I regret to have to inform you that his present condition is calculated to cause the greatest anxiety;"

and again—

"Your brother is rather worse, and is not expected to live more than a few days."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I regret to state that the condition of this prisoner is a very critical and dangerous one, and I should be very happy to consider the question of his being removed to the care of his friends. But since the Question was asked me some time ago I gave injunctions that I should be informed when he was fit for removal, and the information I received was that he was incapable of being removed.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE MOUKA-BALAH.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign

Mr. O'Brien

Affairs, with reference to the Memorandum on the Finances of Egypt, contained in "Egypt," No. 17, Whether the £150,000 per annum assigned by the Law of Liquidation to the cultivators and landholders who had paid the Moukabalah, and which Lord Dufferin's Report showed to have been wholly unpaid up to that time, has been paid up, or whether it is now several years in arrear, though the European creditors, under the same Law, have been punctually paid; and, whether the recognition in the official Memorandum of a debt of £3,950,000 balance of the Indemnity awards is an admission of liability to pay the whole if the money can be raised?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: A full Memorandum, showing the progress made towards refunding the sum paid for Moukabalah, will be found in "Egypt," No. 13 of last year, page 35. The statement of the amount of the awards in the Memorandum cannot affect in any way the question of liability referred to.

EGYPT (ADMINISTRATIVE REFORMS).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he proposes to lay upon the Table further Papers regarding the administration of Egypt proper; the working of the autonomous institutions devised during Lord Dufferin's mission; the reforms of Mr. Clifford Lloyd; and his alleged high-handed promulgations of laws and orders in spite of both the Legislative Assembly and the Prime Minister; whether he will, in the meantime, say who is now responsible for the internal administration of the country; and, whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd acts in real effective subordination either to Nubar Pasha or to Mr. Egerton, or whether he has any independent mission from the Khedive or from Her Majesty's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Any despatches which may be received relating to the administration of Egypt, the working of the autonomous institutions and the reforms of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, will be laid on the Table in due course. The Egyptian Government are responsible for the internal administration of the country. Mr. Clifford Lloyd is Under Secretary for the Interior, and is, therefore, subordinate to the Minister of the Interior and the head of the Egyptian Government. He has no independent mission from the Khedive or from Her Majesty's Government.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—ZEBEHR PASHA.

GENERAL FEILDEN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether General Gordon, when he accepted his present mission and stipulated that "Zebehr should be carefully watched," gave his reasons for this request; whether General Gordon required that, if he went to Suakin, as at first intended, Zebehr should be sent to Cyprus; and, whether the Government ordered or directed General Gordon to go to Cairo instead of Suakin; and, if so, how such desire was communicated to him?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: General Gordon's reasons for desiring that Zebehr Pasha should be watched are given at page 2 of "Egypt," No. 13, in his own language. General Gordon, before arriving in Egypt, suggested that Zebehr Pasha should be sent to Cyprus; but he did not make it a condition of acceptance. It was at Sir Evelyn Baring's request, as stated in "Egypt," No. 2, page 4, that General Gordon went to Cairo instead of Suakin. He was not expressly ordered or directed to go; but he received a telegram on his arrival at Port Said informing him of the request, and expressing the hope that he would agree.

BRAZIL—CLAIMS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the British claims against Brazil, as adjusted by Mr. Clare Ford, are yet approaching settlement; or if some further delay is being interposed by the Brazilian Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: These claims are still under consideration. Mr. Corbett, Her Majesty's Minister at Rio, is about to visit England, and the matter will be further discussed with a view to its settlement. Her Majesty's Government are not aware that any delay has been interposed by the Brazilian Government.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)— — SULLIVAN, A PRISONER IN CORK PRISON.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that a prisoner named Sullivan, who is alleged to have been stabbed and beaten by the police, was committed by Mr. Mitchell, R.M., on remand, to the Cork Male Prison, and was subsequently transferred from the prison to the Cork Workhouse Hospital for treatment; whether a prisoner named Leahy was also recently transferred from the same prison to the workhouse hospital; whether the Government will recoup the ratepayers of the Cork Union for the support and maintenance of such prisoners; whether the gaol authorities cease to have control over prisoners so transferred; and, why they are not treated in the gaol hospital?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am not aware who made the allegation to which the hon. Member refers, that Sullivan was stabbed and beaten by the police; but I am informed that the statement is the opposite of the fact. The police were attacked and assaulted by Sullivan, who was remanded in custody, and while trying to escape from arrest fell down and hurt himself on board a ship. On account of this circumstance, the Resident Magistrate admitted him to bail pending his trial. The Governor of the prison states that it is not the case that either Sullivan, or any prisoner named Leahy, was transferred to the Union hospital from the prison, and that all prisoners, when ill, are treated in the prison hospital. I am advised that there is no ground upon which the Government could be called upon to recoup to the ratepayers any portion of the cost of maintenance incurred in the case of Sullivan.

HIGH SHERIFF OF DROGHEDA.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 68, which enacts, in the 13th section, that no sheriff or sub-sheriff in Ireland shall be capable of holding a licence to sell beer, cider, or spirits by retail, to be drunk on the premises, is the Act under which all publicans' licences are granted in Ireland at the present date?

MR. SEXTON asked, whether there was a case in which the Act was put in force?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Sir, the 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 68, is an integral part of the present Licensing Code, and may, I think, rightly be described as the principal Act for the purpose mentioned in the Question.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Well, as every subject of the Queen is now supposed to know the law, will the High Sheriff of Drogheda be prosecuted for holding a public-house?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I fully explained the circumstances under which His Excellency selected Mr. Mangan as High Sheriff; and it is obvious that, under those circumstances, no blame could attach to Mr. Mangan for a want of acquaintance with the law, which was shared by the Irish Government.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask if the Irish Government will point out to Alderman Mangan the course which he should take?

MR. TREVELYAN was understood to say that the Irish Government could not undertake to do so.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—SHILLELAGH UNION.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that the conduct of Mr. James Hopkins, the returning officer at an election of Poor Law Guardians for the Shillelagh Union in 1883, was censured by the Local Government Board, and the election declared void, on the ground that he illegally refused to receive the nomination paper of a National candidate; whether, at the late election of a Guardian for Ballinglen Electoral Division, he allowed a greater number of votes to Earl Fitzwilliam than he was entitled to, and thus returned Mr. James, the Conservative candidate; whether the election has, consequently, been declared void by the Local Government Board, and a new election ordered; whether the election for the Tinahely Electoral Division, when Mr. Haydon, the National candidate, was defeated by allowing a greater number of votes for Earl Fitzwilliam than lawful, has also been declared void, and a new election ordered; whether, as President of the Local Government Board, he will take steps to have the National candidates declared duly elected; and, whether he will adopt some way of having elections of Poor Law Guardians in the county Wicklow impartially carried out?

MR. TREVELYAN: On the 18th of June last I fully explained to the hon. Member the result of the sworn inquiry held with regard to the disputed election of last year—namely, that the election was declared void; but that the Returning Officer was absolved from any graver charge than want of care. It is the case that at the Ballinglen and Tinahely elections this year the Returning Officer allowed to Earl Fitzwilliam a greater number of votes than he was legally entitled to, and that the result of the elections was affected thereby. The Local Government Board have, therefore, declared these elections void, and new elections will be ordered; but they have no power to comply with the suggestion that the defeated candidates should be declared duly elected. In these cases the Returning Officer acted under a misapprehension as to the law on a somewhat complicated and difficult point; but there is no reason to believe that he did wrong intentionally, and the Local Government Board do not think the circumstance shows any sufficient cause for placing the election in other hands.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—RATHDRUM UNION.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to the censure which, in 1882, was passed on Mr. Bernard Manning, who had presided as returning officer at the election of Poor Law Guardians in Rathdrum Union, by the Local Government Board, in the following terms:—

“You will see from the enclosed letter that the Board have arrived at the conclusion that Mr. Crofton (the Conservative candidate) did not obtain a majority of valid votes, and was not duly elected, and that an order for a new election will be issued; in making this communication to you, the Board cannot avoid expressing their regret that, after having acted for so many years as returning officer, you should have exhibited such ignorance of the Law governing the election of Poor Law guardians, and the Board trust that what has occurred will cause you to discharge your duties as returning officer more correctly, and with greater efficiency, in future;”

whether at the recent election Mr. Manning failed to perform his duties correctly by omitting to issue voting papers to two, if not more, National voters in the Kilcoole electoral division; whether in the Altidore electoral division he received a number of votes on the Conservative side, the signatures or initialing of which did not correspond with the rate book, and decided that the objections raised on the part of the National candidates were valueless; whether such ruling is correct; and, whether, in future, some competent and impartial person will be appointed to preside at elections of Poor Law Guardians in the county of Wicklow?

MR. TREVELYAN: More than a year ago I fully explained to the hon. Member the views of the Local Government Board with regard to the election of 1882, to which the first three paragraphs of his Question refers; and last week I stated that the Returning Officer admitted that by an oversight—which, however, had no effect on the result of the election—he had omitted to issue voting papers to two voters in the Kilcoole electoral division. The Local Government Board now inform me that in the Altidore electoral division objections have been lodged on behalf of the defeated candidate to some votes recorded for his opponent, and that they are investigating the complaint; but are not yet in a position to arrive at a decision about it. At present the Board do not see sufficient cause to supersede the Returning Officer in the discharge of his duties.

SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—WORKING MEN'S INSTITUTE, BELFAST—MR. ROBERT BARKLIE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether his attention has been drawn to the description of the conduct of Mr. Barklie, in the Fifteenth Annual Report of the Science and Art Department,

“Not only have the candidates copied from, and been assisted by, one and another, but in many cases they seem to have been aided and abetted by the teachers, who have systematically sent into the examination room answers to the questions, to be copied by the pupils, and passed from one to the other;”

and the comment of the Inspector,

“The foregoing, however, may be considered but trifling irregularities, when compared with the extensive and organised system of fraud which afterwards came to light in connection with some of the Belfast examinations ; ” and, if so, is he prepared to allow Mr. Barklie to have his present amount of influence over the distribution of public money granted for the School of Science and Art in Belfast ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I answered a Question of the hon. Member’s substantially the same as the one now asked on the 3rd of April. The first quotation to which the hon. Gentleman now refers is from a Minute of the Committee of Council on Education, dated October, 1867, and related to what had taken place in two schools in Belfast—one in Carrickfergus, and one at Clifden, in County Galway. The second quotation is from a Report, dated July, 1868, and the word “foregoing” in it did not refer to any of these schools, or to what had occurred in them. Mr. Barklie was, no doubt, one of several teachers inculpated by the Report of 1867, and he suffered severely for his fault. As I explained on a former occasion, he is an excellent teacher, and has done good service since ; and I cannot understand with what object his early fault is thus persistently raked up against him. So long, however, as the Committee of the Science and Art School of Belfast, to whom all payments are made by the Department, choose to employ Mr. Barklie, we have no power to interfere.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—BOARD SCHOOL DISTRICTS.

SIR MASSEY LOPES asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether a Board School district, which has already provided both sufficient and efficient school accommodation for the whole of its population, can be compelled to provide additional school buildings within one and a-half miles of the existing schools, in order to supplement the defective educational provisions of other adjoining parishes ?

MR. MUNDELLA : The Education Department may require additional public school accommodation to be provided in one school district for the use of children living in neighbouring school districts when such accommodation cannot be otherwise conveniently provided. The Department have power to make the requirement, notwithstanding the existence of schools within one and a-half miles of the place named for satisfying the requirement. But, at the same time, they would propose a proper contribution from the adjoining district or districts.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCE— SARAKHS.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information with respect to Sarakhs ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : I presume that this Question is prompted by a report, in The Times of the 6th instant, that Sarakhs has been acquired by Russia. Her Majesty’s Government have no information in confirmation of this report. Sarakhs is a Persian fortress, garrisoned by Persian soldiers ; and if the right hon. Gentleman will refer to the Blue Book “Asia,” No. 1 of this year, page 92, he will see that as late as September last Her Majesty’s Chargé d’Affaires at St. Petersburg was informed at the Russian Foreign Office that it would always be outside of any Russian line of frontier. I may remind the right hon. Gentleman, without, I hope, entering into matter of debate, that there are two places of the name of Sarakhs, Old and New Sarakhs, and that in the telegram referred to there may be some confusion between them.

MR. BOURKE : Are they not both on Persian territory ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : One is on one bank of the river ; the other is not on the same, but on the opposite bank.

MR. BOURKE : But they are both Persian.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : The one to which I have referred is undoubtedly Persian. Its position is quite clear ; but the position of the other is not quite so clear.

LORD JOHN MANNERS : Will inquiry be made at Teheran ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : Yes ; inquiry will be made.

JAMAICA—CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM —THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies,

Whether it is to be understood that the full number of members on the Government side of the Council of Jamaica would be nine, of which some would be ex officio and others nominated; but that the Government undertake not to appoint more than six of such members at present, nor to complete the number except when the Governor should declare the matter under discussion to be one of paramount Imperial importance?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The answer to the first two portions of the Question is, Yes. The hon. and gallant Member, however, misunderstood what I said the other night, if he gathered that the Governor will not be empowered to nominate the full number of Members on the Government side unless he declared that there is at stake some matter of paramount public or Imperial importance. This provision applies only to the use of the official majority existing at the time in certain cases of opposition by elective Members. The Governor can at any time proceed to act under the powers given him by the Order in Council by nominating the full tale of Councillors; but it is hoped that forbearance and friendly co-operation on both sides may indefinitely postpone the completion of the full number of nominated Members.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— GENERAL GORDON.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have cognizance of any telegrams or messages from General Gordon to Sir Evelyn Baring, or to any other Government official, bearing upon his ability to defend Khartoum from attack or to escape therefrom, besides those contained in the Papers already furnished to Parliament; and, if so, whether they can communicate them to the House before next Monday?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have already stated in the House that Her Majesty's Government do not propose to produce Papers containing confidential information, which, if published, would be a source of military danger to General Gordon; but the further Papers, which will be very shortly in the hands of Members, will contain information of the character described by my right hon. Friend.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I will give the reason why I ask this Question. ["Order!"] On April 3 the Khartoum correspondent of The Times—["Order!"]—I am only giving the necessary explanation, and I am not going into any argument. The correspondent of The Times telegraphed, on April 3, that it was reported that the Mahdi was sending artillery to Khartoum to render powerless General Gordon's steamers. I wish to know whether the Government had any information on the subject; and whether they had heard that one of General Gordon's Krupp guns had been taken?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not think that the very detailed Question of the right hon. Gentleman can be said to arise exactly out of the Question upon the Paper, and I think he will not complain if I ask him to put his Question down on the Paper for tomorrow.

MR. CHAPLIN had given Notice to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in reference to his statement on 24th April, that the Government recognize an obligation in regard to the safety of General Gordon, Whether he is aware that he is made to say, in some of the reports of that answer, that "the Government will be careful to put themselves in a position to fulfil those obligations," and, in others, that "the Government have been careful to put themselves in a position," &c.; and, which of these reports correctly represented the statement which he made on that occasion?

MR. GLADSTONE: Although the hon. Member is not in his place, I might as well give an answer. His Question is as to which of two reports is correct. To the best of my belief neither of these reports is inaccurate. The true report is to be found by combining them. I believe my words were that "we had been and should be careful to put ourselves in a position," and so on.

SIR HENRY TYLER gave Notice that on Monday next he should ask the Prime Minister, with reference to his answer to the effect that the Government have been and will be careful for the safety of General Gordon, whether they had taken any steps with regard to the safety of General Gordon; and, if so, what steps?

MR. GLADSTONE: We shall have an excellent opportunity of discussing that matter on Monday, without the hon. Member putting his Question.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE: Is there any truth in the report that the King of the Belgians proposes to send an expedition to Khartoum so as to withdraw General Gordon from the isolated position in which he is placed?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have not heard of any such intention.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS— POLLING DISTRICTS.

MR. F. J. FOLJAMBE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether orders of Quarter Sessions, which have been made affecting alterations in polling districts, apply to the registers in force for the present year, or will come into operation after the termination of 1884?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that all such orders made in the present year would have no effect until the new registers should come into operation, and, therefore, would not apply to any elections during the current year.

POST OFFICE—THE IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. MOORE asked the Postmaster General, Whether he can yet state what arrangements have been made for the acceleration of the Irish Mail Service, and when such accelerated service is to begin?

MR. FAWCETT: The new time table for the accelerated service between London and Holyhead is so nearly arranged that, without giving a positive pledge, I quite hope that the accelerated service will commence on the 1st of July.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— INDEPENDENCE OF THE SOUDAN.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is within his knowledge that the Mahdi is aware of the readiness of the Egyptian Government to evacuate the Soudan, and of the decision of Her Majesty's Government to recognize the independence of that country; and, if not, whether it is intended to take any steps to ensure his being put in possession of this information, and to enter into friendly relations with him?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Mahdi is probably aware of this intention, at least as far as Kordofan is concerned, since General Gordon offered him the title of Sultan of that Province; but Her Majesty's Government have not entered into relations with him.

ARMY—THE QUEEN'S REGULATIONS— POLITICAL MEETINGS.

MR. NOEL asked the Secretary of State for War, On what principle Officers of Her Majesty's Household Troops are apparently exempted from that Clause of Her Majesty's Regulations for the Army (Section vi., Clause 9) which strictly prohibits Officers on full pay from taking any part whatever in political meetings or demonstrations; and, whether it is the case that an Officer commanding a Regiment of Household Cavalry, on full pay, and lately returned from Abroad, has been recently engaged in political demonstrations; if so, whether such action is in contravention of the Regulations above quoted, or is a privileged exemption therefrom; and, if the latter, on what grounds?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In reply to this Question, I must refer the hon. Member to an answer which I gave in this House on the 21st of February last to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). I said—

"The meaning of this Order seems to me to be that officers or soldiers on duty should not attend political meetings in which they have no local interest beyond being quartered in the vicinity. It could never have been intended that an officer or soldier should be altogether deprived of his civil rights, which would be the case if the word 'elsewhere' was interpreted literally."—(3 Hansard, [284] 1595-6.)

As I adhere to that interpretation of the Regulation, I am not aware of any case of recent occurrence in which an officer of the Household Cavalry has infringed the Rules. I may add that I propose to alter the wording of the Article in question in the new edition of the Queen's Regulations, so as to make clear what I consider to be its true intention.

ARMY—STORES ESTABLISHMENT— CONDUCTORS OF STORES.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will consider the case of those conductors of stores appointed before 1880, who now find themselves excluded from promotion by reason of the limitation of age to 45, these warrant officers having had every reason to expect more rapid promotion when they accepted their present position?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Although these conductors were technically eligible for promotion by selection, without limit of age, prior to 1881, it is very improbable that any of them over 45 years of age would have been selected for an appointment from which retirement was compulsory at 55 years of age. It was, therefore, thought desirable to make the limit of age a matter of regulation. At first the limit was put at 40 years of age; but it was subsequently raised to 45 years. These Warrant officers had no vested right to promotion; and I cannot admit their claim to be compensated as a result of changes, made for the good of the Service generally, which only indirectly affected them.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND —EXAMINATIONS FOR THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any objection to place the Royal University of Ireland on the same footing as the Dublin University, as regards the lectures of its Fellows as an educational qualification for the final examinations for the Civil Service of India?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Royal University of Ireland does not stand precisely on the same footing as the Dublin University with regard to the particular matter referred to in this Question. But any application of the Royal University to be placed among the Institutions approved for the residence of probationers for the Indian Civil Service will be duly considered upon its merits. I may say, however, that no such application has been received.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—INTEREST OF THE DEBT—SAVINGS BANKS.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he proposes to reduce the rate of interest upon Provident Savings invested through the Savings Banks and the Post Office Savings Banks, rateably with his proposed reductions of interest upon Consols, or, while reducing the interest on Consols, to keep up the interest on Provident Savings?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to my hon. Friend's Question, I can only refer him to the answer given on Monday last by my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General, to the effect that the Question was altogether premature. The proposal I have made will not at present involve any necessary change in the Savings Banks arrangements.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SITTINGS AT VIRGINIA, CO. CAVAN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether tenant farmers residing at Portanure Scrabby, county Cavan, are summoned to Land Sub-Commission Court at Virginia, a distance of twenty-one miles, for Friday next, while the Court sat in Cavan on 2nd April last; and, whether he will have arrangements made to lessen the inconvenience to parties who require to attend the Land Courts?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Legal Assistant Commissioner of the Cavan Sub-Commission reports that he will be able to make arrangements for hearing the cases alluded to in the Question at Kinnaleck, which is as near to Scrabby as is Cavan.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— NATIVES OF UPPER EGYPT.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are aware that more than eighty per cent. of the male population of Upper Egypt, from Assiout to Wady Halfa, are, unlike the fellaheen of the Delta, very efficiently armed; and, whether, in view of the threatened extension of the Mahdi's rebellion northwards, the urgent expediency of disarming those people, the most fanatical and warlike of all the population of Egypt proper, has been considered?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: These Questions involve military considerations, which cannot be conveniently dealt with in an answer to an inquiry in the House.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—PEN- SIONS—SERGEANT INSTRUCTOR LYNE.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to the case of Sergeant Instructor John Lyne, recently discharged from the 3rd Volunteer Battalion of the South Staffordshire Regiment, who, after sixteen years' service on the permanent staff of the battalion, has been awarded a pension of only 6½d. a-day, although, under Art. 1,305, on page 211 of the Volunteer Regulations, he is entitled to a pension of 8d. a-day; and, what is the reason of this diminution?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The non-commissioned officer in question belonged to the Royal Marines, and consequently Article 1,305 of the Royal Warrant did not apply to him. He has been pensioned under Article 1,803. Under a recent decision some addition is made to pensions of this class from naval funds, and the case will be submitted to the Admiralty.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM said, that, as it appeared that this unfortunate man did not receive his full pension simply because he had once the misfortune to serve in the Marines, he should again call attention to the case.

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE RAJAH OF TENOM—THE CREW OF THE "NISERO."

MR. STOREY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as the Foreign Office has no funds at its disposal available for the relief of the families of the captive crew of the Nisero, he will make application to the Treasury for a reasonable sum for this purpose?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I regret to inform my hon. Friend that it would be altogether contrary to precedent to make the application which he suggests.

POST OFFICE—TELEPHONES—THE SUNDERLAND TRUNK WIRE.

MR. STOREY asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware that great public inconvenience is caused, in consequence of the trunk wire between Sunderland and Newcastle not being handed over to the Northern Telephone Company; whether this Company received a promise, on 3rd December 1883, that the trunk wire should be handed over to them; whether the new Agreement, which the Post Office authorities insisted on, was finally settled many weeks ago; and, what are the causes which prevent this trunk wire from being handed over immediately?

Viscount Lewisham

MR. FAWCETT: As I believe the public have suffered inconvenience from the trunk wire to which my hon. Friend refers not being handed over to the Northern District Telephone Company, I regret that there should have been delay. It has arisen from difficulties having occurred in coming to a decision about the terms of the agreement. I am glad to say, however, that the new agreement was sent to the Company for signature yesterday; and so soon as it has been returned signed, and the terms of the subscription are finally settled, the trunk wire shall be handed over—probably on Monday next.

POST OFFICE (CONTRACTS)—THE WEST INDIA MAIL SERVICE.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government are yet able to say when they will come to a decision upon the tenders for the new West India Mail Service, commencing on 1st January 1885, seeing that the said tenders were sent in on 1st December 1883, and only seven months remain in which contractors may complete their arrangements?

MR. COURTNEY: I am conscious of the expediency of bringing this matter to an early termination; but it involves many questions of difficulty which require to be considered by several authorities, and I am afraid I cannot name a date when the decision of the Government will be announced.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)— INSOLVENCY BUSINESS—DUTIES OF THE LATE CHIEF CLERK.

MR. FINDLATER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is not a fact that, since the death of the late Mr. Farmer, the chief clerk in the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency, on the 20th of February 1881, that portion of his duties which consisted of insolvency business has, by direction of the Judges, been satisfactorily performed by Mr. David Connellan, first clerk Town and Country Departments in Insolvency, in addition to his own duties; whether the efficient discharge of such additional duties entitles Mr. Connellan to extra remuneration, under the 37th section of the Act 35 & 36 Vict., c. 58, and have not the Judges of the Court recommended that he should receive such additional remuneration; and, will the Treasury comply with such recommendation?

MR. COURTNEY: I answered a Question on this subject on Monday. I have only now to add that Mr. Connellan had no claim under the section referred to.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART— THE FARNESE HERCULES.

MR. R. POWER asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, For what reason and by whose direction the statue of the Farnese Hercules, in the Museum of Practical Geology, has been recently mutilated?

MR. MUNDELLA: What has been done in this case was by the order of the Director of the Geological Museum, and on his sole authority. As soon as it came to the knowledge of the Department he was admonished.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY AND QUEEN'S COLLEGES (IRELAND) — CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is now in a position to inform the House as to the composition of the Commission to inquire into the present state of the Royal University and Queen's Colleges, Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have much pleasure in answering this Question, although I am afraid the information is not very new. The Chairman of the Commission under the Lord Lieutenant is Mr. R. P. Carton, an eminent Queen's Counsel. The other members are — Rev. Gerald Molloy, D.D., Rector of the Catholic University in Ireland, Natural Philosophy Fellow of the Royal University of Ireland; Mr. George Johnstone Stoney, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S., late Secretary to the Queen's University, a Vice President of the Royal Dublin Society, a Trustee of the National Library of Ireland; Professor William Jack, once of Owen's College, Manchester, Fourth Wrangler Cambridge, 1859, Professor of Mathematics Glasgow University, formerly Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools; and Deputy Surgeon-General J. A. Marston, head of the sanitary and statistical branch of the Army Medical Department. They will go to work at once, and I believe they will be able to give their attention to the work continuously.

MR. SEXTON asked the name of the gentleman who had been appointed Secretary to the Commission?

MR. TREVELYAN: No one has as yet been absolutely appointed to that post, and I do not think I could give the name to any certainty.

EGYPT—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

MR. BOURKE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can now give the House any further information with respect to the proposed Conference; and, whether, considering the Law of Liquidation came into force without the intervention of a European Conference, what necessity is there to invite such a Conference to consider its alteration?

MR. GLADSTONE: There is no further information with respect to the Conference at present, no definitive answer having been received from Turkey. With respect to the latter part of the Question, it appears to me to be rather in the nature of an argument than of an inquiry as to a matter of fact; but, still, I may perhaps say this—that it is open to the right hon. Gentleman to question the proceedings if he thinks fit. But the necessity for this Conference having arisen mainly out of the calamities at Alexandria, in which all the Powers of Europe were interested, and the alteration of the Law of Liquidation being a different matter from the original framing of it, it appeared to Her Majesty's Government to be the most expedient course of proceeding to resort at once to the highest authority—namely, the assembled Powers of Europe.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Are the Government going to invite every Power in Europe?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; they are not; they are going to invite what are known as the Great Powers.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (for Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is intended by Her Majesty's Government, in discussing the question of Egyptian finance at the proposed Conference, to introduce or admit the question of the administration of the Suez Canal, and the amount now paid by the Government of Egypt to Her Majesty's Government in respect of the shares purchased in 1876?

MR. GLADSTONE: To that Question, Sir, I have to answer as follows:—Her Majesty's Government have no intention to introduce any other matter except that which is described in the invitation they have addressed to the Powers; and, as I have already said—this is also an answer to the following Question of the hon. Member for Eye—the introduction of any other matter would be the introduction of a new subject, and would be equivalent, in fact, to calling together a new Conference. That is an entirely distinct matter; but it might be embraced, of course, if it were the will of the Conference; but it is not included in the purview of the Conference.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked whether, in case the majority of the Conference endeavoured to introduce other important political matters in which British interests were paramount, Her Majesty's Government would distinctly decline to discuss them?

MR. GLADSTONE: It would be highly inexpedient, against usage, and exceedingly disparaging to other Powers as well as to ourselves, to enter upon these matters.

MR. BOURKE: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman I should like to ask this further Question. The right hon. Gentleman stated that Turkey had not at present accepted the invitation.

MR. GLADSTONE: Not finally accepted.

MR. BOURKE: Are we to understand that all the other Powers have sent final acceptances to the invitation?

MR. GLADSTONE: I conceive so. I am not aware that their answer depends upon the answer of Turkey. At the same time, it is for them, of course, to construe their own answer.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO TREATY.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the declaration of Lord Granville, in his Despatches of 15th

March and 1st June 1883, that a merely dual arrangement between Great Britain and Portugal would be futile, Her Majesty's Government will defer asking this House to express an opinion on the Treaty of 26th February 1884, until it can put this House in possession of the steps taken to obtain the concurrence of the other Powers interested?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government are in communication with the Government of Portugal as to the best means of obtaining the acceptance of the Congo Treaty by other Powers; and, until they are in a position to give to the House some further information on this subject, they feel that a discussion, as my hon. Friend suggests, would be premature. Under these circumstances, I would appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Wenlock not to proceed with his Motion at present.

MR. A. H. BROWN: In view of the appeal of the noble Lord, I cannot proceed with the Motion which stands in my name.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Prime Minister, whether the House could be assured that the Treaty would not be ratified until the House had had an opportunity of discussing it?

MR. GLADSTONE: The original engagement will be adhered to. We shall be careful to inform the House when the communications referred to by my noble Friend have been brought to a conclusion.

SPAIN—COMMERCIAL NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. MAC IVER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What has been the result of the "Agreement on Commercial Arrangements with Spain," which formed the subject of a paragraph in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech, delivered by the Lords Commissioners to both Houses of Parliament on Tuesday February 5th, 1884; and, whether it is the fact that, notwithstanding such Agreement, Spain continues to maintain the attitude described in the Correspondence, "Commercial, No. 10," and declines to allow Great Britain to trade with the Spanish Possessions in the West Indies on terms as favourable as those accorded to the United States?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Owing to the elections in Spain, the coming Session of the Cortes will be so short that the Agreement cannot be discussed; the earliest date, therefore, at which it can be laid before the Spanish Legislature will be during the Session beginning in December next. It thus appears that the Agreement of December 1 last is not yet in force, and can, therefore, have had no effect on the duties levied on British merchandise in the Spanish Antilles, which remain unaltered.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he proposed to take Committee of Ways and Means; and when it was likely that the National Debt Bill and the Coinage Bill would be in the hands of Members?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): We hope to take the Committee of Ways and Means on this day week; but I do not say so positively, as it may not be possible to bring it on for two days later. There shall be no delay in laying the National Debt Bill and the Coinage Bill on the Table, though I am not able to fix a day. They will be printed and circulated as soon as possible.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked what would be the first Business to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE: In the event of our not being able to close the discussion on the Bill of the Attorney General with respect to Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections this evening, it will be taken to-morrow before the Representation of the People Bill.

POST OFFICE—ACCELERATION OF THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. LEWIS: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I shall ask the Postmaster General, Whether any arrangements for the acceleration of the through Mail Service to Derry, Belfast, and other places in the North of Ireland have been matured, or will be matured shortly?

MR. FAWCETT: I shall answer that Question at once. We cannot come to any final arrangement with regard to the acceleration of the mails from Dublin until the time table between London and Kingstown has been finally settled. I hope that will be settled in a day or two, and then we shall immediately take the question of the acceleration of the mails generally throughout Ireland. The new time table cannot come into operation before the 1st of July; but I hope it will then.

MR. GRAY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the proposed acceleration will involve the earlier starting of the night mail train from Euston, as proposed by him in a communication to the Dublin Chamber of Commerce?

MR. FAWCETT: Directly the thing is settled I will give the hon. Member, or any other hon. Member who is interested, any information; but as there are two parties to the arrangement, I think it better that I should not make any further statement now.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY.—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £870,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of Victuals and Clothing for Seamen and Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885.”

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it was understood that the discussion upon the Statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty should be taken upon the present occasion; and I think it will be for the convenience of the Committee if I refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. Gentleman in introducing the Estimates some weeks ago. I do not propose to occupy a very great deal of the time or the attention of the Committee; but there are some points which I should like to refer to in detail; and I must ask for the indulgence of the Committee if I go into questions of figures, which are always exceedingly uninteresting, and require a certain amount of explanation in order to make them intelligible. I will refer, first of all, to the comparison between the Estimates of the present and last year which was made by my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend has shown that the Estimates of 1884-5, as compared with 1883-4, show an increased charge, owing to an improvement in the position of certain officers—certain warrant officers and petty officers in the Fleet. I make no objection whatever to an improvement in the position of those men; but I regret to find that this increased charge is accompanied by a decided diminution in the strength of the Navy. There is an increase of charge; but with that increase there is a diminution in the strength of the Navy. That is a matter of some moment, because this reduction has been going on, more or less, from year to year for some time. I find no fault whatever with the Estimates as far as the charges are concerned. The practice which now prevails of re-commissioning ships abroad necessitates there being two crews for the same ship afloat at the same time. I believe it is the fact that ships are re-commissioned now at Malta and other foreign Stations; and the necessity for having two crews for the same ship gives us a smaller reserve of men to draw from in the event of any sudden emergency arising. My hon. Friend will correct me if I am wrong; but I suppose there never was a time in which our actual reserves were lower than at the present moment. I pass from that to a grave question to which my hon. Friend referred, and that was the insubordination among some of the seamen. The hon. Gentleman has done justice to the general improvement that has taken place in the efficiency, character, and general demeanour of the blue jackets as a whole. Everyone must have observed that during the last few years; but, unhappily, amongst the younger men there has existed a greater disposition towards insubordination than formerly existed. Whether this is due to the withdrawal of the fear of punishment, to which they were formerly subjected, or to any other circumstance, it is not for me to say; but I must repeat the objection which I strongly hold to the punishments which are, of necessity, inflicted upon young men who are sent to prison for considerable periods of time for the commission of offences which in themselves are exceedingly inimical to the preservation of good order and discipline, and must be punished when they occur on board ship in a service like that of the Navy. But, at the same time, I think they ought to be punished by some other punishment than imprisonment in company with persons of bad character. In many cases there are no other punishments available, under the orders of the present Board of Admiralty; and the result is to condemn men, simply for a freak of temper, for insubordination, or want of discipline, to become criminals for the greater part of their lives. I hold that those who have felt it necessary to withdraw from the Penal Code one punishment ought to find some other punishment which would not carry with it the stigma and disgrace and injury to a man's character which imprisonment among criminals for a long term involves, altogether unfitting a man for future employment who might otherwise have served his country faithfully and well. Reference has been made by the hon. Gentleman to an exceedingly valuable change which has taken place in the character of the sick berth staff, of which I desire to express my most cordial approval. I come now to the larger and more important considerations to which my hon. Friend referred. We had a discussion on the comparative strength of the French and English Navy; and I do not propose, on the present occasion, to re-open that discussion. It would be impossible to convince hon. Gentlemen that the view which some of us hold upon that point is an inaccurate one, or that it cannot be sustained by facts which ought to be accepted as convincing by the hon. Gentlemen we address. Therefore, I will satisfy myself with leaving, as I did on the last occasion, the whole responsibility of the building programme for the British Navy, as compared with its necessities and duties, to rest upon Her Majesty's Government. The House will always be prepared to give to the Government sufficient Ways and Means to keep the Navy at such a strength as, in their judgment, is required; and the whole responsibility of making adequate provision for the Navy must rest upon Her Majesty's Government. I wish now to say a few words upon various topics connected with the efficiency of the Navy; and, first of all, I will notice the Marines. I observe that the Marines are still deficient in their full strength. The events which have occurred during the last year have shown how exceedingly valuable the force of Marines is. They have done admirable service; and that service has been warmly and generously acknowledged not only by the Admiralty, but by the country at large. They are now the only available force for services such as those which have been undertaken by the Government on the Coast of the Red Sea. There is, apparently, no other military force there which could be used at Suakin; but a Marine force may be one half afloat and the other ashore, and may in this way be maintained in a state of efficiency. I have always regretted the recent reductions in the strength of the Corps; and circumstances have proved that it is a most valuable force, and one which ought not to be neglected. It is one on which the country can place entire reliance, where they would not be equally able to place reliance on some other military nominally effective force; and it is the duty of the Government to keep it up at least to the strength which has been voted. As to the question of tonnage, my hon. Friend quoted a definition of a ton weight, given some time ago by the present Secretary to the Treasury. I think there are probably not three men on the Benches opposite who would understand and thoroughly appreciate the explanation then given, and which was given as a full and complete explanation of the practice of the Admiralty. If I may be permitted by the Committee to repeat the exact words used by my hon. Friend, and as I have extracted them from the expense account of the Navy, I should like to do so, rather than run the risk of not conveying to the Committee the official explanation of a ton weight of shipping—

“A ton is the standard of measurement of the proposed construction, and the word is used to arrive at a certain estimate of the cost of an assumed quantity of work. When a ship is designed the number of tons weight is estimated, and the total labour required in her construction is also estimated. The money value of that labour, divided by the number of tons, gives the cost per ton of the labour. This forms the measure of the progress of the ship, and, according to the amount expended for labour upon her, she is said to have added to her so many tons. In fact, what is called a ton is not, strictly speaking, a ton at all, but merely a convenient form of expressing the amount of money spent, or to be spent. It is impossible to say what money may necessarily have to be spent, and the figures given are, therefore, only approximate.”

If the Estimates for last year are taken, I think it will be found that by dividing the amount provided for wages by the number of tons intended to be built there would be a cost of something like

£33 or £34 a ton, and therefore it may be taken that every £33 10s. expended realized a ton weight of material built into a ship; that is, that for every £33 10s. we add really a ton more or less to the strength of the Navy and to the size of the ship under construction. Well, Sir, I am bound to say that, although I believe it was intended to be a fair and reasonably just expression used by my hon. Friend opposite and by the able servants of the Admiralty, or rather of the Constructive Department, in perfect or complete good faith, nevertheless I think that the Estimate or statement is completely and absolutely fallacious. My hon. Friend admitted that when he said that a ton weight of material built into a ship did not give an accurate idea of the amount built, but was only more or less approximate. I have examined the ton weight of hull estimated to have been completed on the first page of the Estimates during the last three years, and I have compared them with the Estimates for this year on page 191. There are two sets of figures. There is a statement of the total armoured tonnage expected to be completed in 1883-4, and when the Estimates were framed, and there are the previous Estimates which purport to be the actual amount of tonnage completed in 1883-4. The Estimate of the amount of armoured ships intended to be built in the Dockyards was 10,299 tons, and in this year's Estimates it is shown to be 11,490 tons. That was built at a cost for wages of £383,000. Well, Sir, there is another page in these Estimates—page 204—which shows the tons weight of hull built by April, 1884—that is this year—and the tons to be built in 1884-5; and in order to identify the two we must compare the tons to be built in 1884-5 on page 204, and we shall find they correspond exactly with the tons to be built in 1884-5 in the Estimate on page 191. It is, therefore, clear that the tons intended to be built are precisely the same on one page as those referred to on the other. I hope my hon. Friend will follow me, and will admit that I am not making any mis-statement of the fact, that the ton on page 191 is the same ton intended to be built on page 204. I think that is a fair statement of the case. Well, the real fact of the case is, that the results have in no instance agreed; the particulars are absolutely and entirely fallacious as far as the work is concerned. Now, I make no charge against anybody with regard to these fallacious figures. Figures appear to have an irresistible charm for some persons, who deal with them, and put them together in such a way as to be entirely satisfactory to themselves, while, at the same time, they expect them to be satisfactory to everybody else. I have examined for three succeeding years the Estimates in the way I have stated. I have examined the amount intended to be done in the first portion of the Estimate—that is to say, at page 191 in the Estimates of 1881-2, and at page 197 of the Estimates of the same year. In order to understand the matter accurately, I was obliged to refer to the Estimates of the preceding year, so as to find what was the amount of the tonnage actually built into the ships according to the Estimates themselves in that year; and I found that, for the ships named on page 197 of the Estimates of 1881-2, 16,700 tons had been built in. The promise was to build in 10,816 tons in the Estimates of 1881-2, at pages 191 and 197. The two figures entirely agree one with the other; but in the Estimates of 1882-3, instead of 10,816, the Government proposed to add 207 tons, making 11,023. Adding to the 16,700 tons already built the 11,023 to be built, there should be a total of 27,723 altogether; but it is shown on the Estimates of 1882-3 that only 26,510 tons had been built into the ships named, showing not an excess, but a deficiency, amounting in 1881-2 to 1,213 tons. Therefore, this reduced the actual tonnage built into the ships to 9,810 tons (11,023 proposed, and 12,013 not built), instead of 10,800. I hope the Committee will forgive me for going into details, which I am afraid are not interesting; but they certainly seem to me to be of very considerable importance. In 1882-3, the tons built into the ships named on page 201 of the Estimates for the year were 26,510; and the number of tons to be built in 1882-3 was 11,016, as shown on pages 195 and 201 of the Estimates for 1882-3, making a total of 37,526 tons; but, by a reference to the Estimates, it appears that only 36,243 had been completed, including the Ajax, 5,900; the Agamemnon, 5,900; and the Polyphemus, 1,690, making 13,490, which, added to 22,793, gives a total of 36,253 tons actually built in 1882-3, showing a deficiency of 1,283 tons, or only 9,733 tons actually built in 1882-3. I can give my hon. Friend the names and tonnage of the ships themselves if he wishes it. I will now take 1883-4, because that is the year which has been spoken of as the evidence of the successful building programme of the Government and the Admiralty during the past year. In 1883-4 it was proposed to build in the Dockyards 11,224 tons of armoured ships. The iron-clads into which this tonnage was to be built is shown on page 204 of the Estimates for 1883-4. The number of tons built into them was 22,753 by April, 1883. The Estimates of 1884 withdraw the Mersey and the Severn from armoured ships, and this reduced the original Estimate of armoured ships to be built to 10,299 tons; but the previous Estimate of the tonnage to be built in 1883-4 and the tonnage asserted to have been actually built is 11,490, and I think that is the tonnage claimed by my hon. Friend as having been built in the Dockyards up to the 31st of March. Now, if we take the work done on these ships by April, 1883, as shown on page 204 of the Estimates, it was 22,753 tons; and if we add 11,490 tons claimed to have been completed, we have a total of 34,243 tons; but the actual condition of the ships shown at page 204 was that 27,878 tons were built, and if we add the Conqueror, 4,200 tons passed away and said to have been completed, the total would be 32,078 tons, showing a deficiency of tons weight of hull of 2,167 tons, or quite 20 per cent of the 11,490 tons claimed to have been completed, and leaving only 9,225 as having been shown to be added to the weight of ships. Here, again, I have the figures, and I should be glad to give them to my hon. Friend if he wishes to have them. I have spoken now of the apparent increase in the armoured strength of the Navy during the past year; and I contend that the Estimates themselves show that if it had been the practice—I am making no complaint against my hon. Friend—but if it had been the practice to take the actual tonnage weight of the hull built into the ships, and ascertained to have been built into the ships, and put into the programme in the first instance as having been built, we should have been able to see the actual result, rather than that other result which my hon. Friend would wish to say has been accomplished. My hon. Friend and the Admiralty had these facts before them, because they have given them to the House; and, therefore, instead of saying that there were 11,490 tons built into the ships, I contend they ought to have said there were 9,220 tons. But what are the wages taken per ton for the cost of the total tonnage? The total cost was £383,000 for, say, 11,490 tons at page 191 of the Estimates for this year, 1884-5. That would come to about £33 10s. per ton; but as there have only been, as is shown by the Estimates at page 204, 9,225 tons built, the labour has cost £41 10s. per ton weight of hull, irrespective of all their expense and charges. I have spoken of two sets of figures in the same Estimates which differ widely. The expense accounts shows a third set of figures, and I wish to call attention to it. Take the case of the Conqueror in the accounts of 1882-3, as shown in the expense account, it had had 3,049 tons weight of hull built by April, 1882. In the expense accounts for the year ending April, 1882, at page 14 it is shown that 3,052 tons were built at that time, so that the Estimates and the expense account agree within three tons, which is altogether an inconsiderable amount not worth referring to. That shows that the Estimate, as far as page 204 is concerned, giving the actual statement of the amount of work done on the ships more nearly approaches accuracy than the first page of the programme to which I have referred, and on which my hon. Friend claims a larger performance. In the expense accounts for 1881-2, at page 14, it is shown that 3,052 tons were built at that time; but in the expense accounts for the year 1882-3, at page 14, the tons built prior to the year are shown to have been only 2,518, so that in a simple case of bringing forward from one year's account to another 534 tons weight are lost without note or comment, and other ships show a similar loss. There is, therefore, no reliance whatever to be placed upon this information as to tons built, or the cost as far as wages are concerned per ton. We do not know from any Return in the possession of the House accurately what has been obtained for so large an expenditure. Now, if, instead of 11,490 tons having been built, the figures shown on page 204 of the Estimates are correct at present, and only 9,225 tons weight of hull are claimed to be built as upon page 204, there is every reason to fear that, as in the case of the Conqueror, Colossus, and other ships these figures will shrink again very materially when brought into the expense account, and the ultimate result for the year will be some 15 per cent less than 9,225 tons, or probably some 7,800 tons, at a cost for wages alone of £50 per ton. Now, to what is this due? I have confidence that the original Estimates made by the Controller and Constructor of the Navy were framed in perfect and complete good faith; but I think I have shown that there is a great probability that instead of our obtaining the actual tonnage which we hoped to get, and the increase on the actual strength of the Navy which we hope to obtain, we have got considerably less. I think my hon. Friend will recognize that the amount of the deficiency is very considerable indeed; 11,400 tons would represent two very large ships of war, and the deficiency between 11,400 tons and the possibility of having only 7,800 represents, at least, one-half of a very large ship, and it brings it down to the production of less than one first-class ship, instead of one and a-half in the course of the year. Now, to what is this due? I said just now that I believed the Estimate had been framed, in the present instance, by the Controller and Constructor of the Navy with the greatest possible care, and that there was no intention whatever to deceive the Admiralty or the country as to the cost of the ships intended to be built, and that probably £33 10s. per ton in respect of the building of a ship was a very fair and full estimate. The result is due largely to the alterations made in the construction of the ship after the design has been settled, while the ship has been in the stocks after she had been launched, and before she came into the Service. It is due largely to a conscientious desire to carry out those improvements to which my hon. Friend referred in the course of his speech. He said—"I think that it would be utter folly to shut our eyes to improvement." I entirely believe that that would be a correct and a wise policy, and that it would be the height of folly to shut our eyes to improvement; but it would also be the height of folly to wait for the perfection which hon. Gentlemen sometimes desire to see attained in any particular thing with which they have to deal, and which has a special and fascinating interest for persons whose reputation is supposed to be concerned in turning out a ship, or a gun, or any other article of mechanism. And if they had the entire and absolute control of the work to be done, they would, undoubtedly, commit a folly even greater than that of shutting their eyes to improvements, if they looked forward to effecting such improvements in the process of building a ship, or completing a great piece of mechanism which was not contemplated when the original design was settled, and which would result both in serious delay and a considerable increase of cost. Her Majesty's Government, when they took Office, promised, as compared with their Predecessors, to put these ships out of hand with far greater rapidity than had ever before been attained; and I am sure that no one in this House, and no one in the country, welcomed that decision on their part more cordially than I did. After having myself been two years at the Admiralty, I at last came to see some of the difficulties with which the Board of Admiralty had to contend; so also had my Colleagues. I had been a shorter time at the Admiralty than they had been; but I came to see some of the difficulties after two years' service there, and I feel that no greater service could be done to the Navy than to resolve that after the design of a ship has been settled, to push forward the completion of that ship with all the energy possible for a great manufacturing establishment to give to its work. Now, the Colossus was laid down in June, 1879, and it is said that it will be completed this year—that is to say, after five years. The Conqueror was laid down in April, 1879, and it is called completed, but it is not yet finished; and I shall have a little more to say upon that point by-and-bye. The Edinburgh was laid down in March, 1879, and it is only to be advanced to 73-100ths this year. The result is that we have no really completed ship either last year or this year. The Conqueror is spoken of as completed, and is removed from the building programme of the Navy. I venture to say that it is nothing less than a farce to call the Conqueror complete. She may be complete as far as her hull is concerned; but she has not got at the present moment the breech-pieces to her guns, and it has not yet been determined what breech-piece shall be fitted to them, nor are her loading arrangements yet determined upon, the loading machinery not having been settled yet. Many thousands of pounds will still be required to be expended upon her; and it will take many months after her breech-pieces and loading arrangements have been decided upon to complete her. Then, for my part, I think it is most unwise to call a ship completed until it is ready for sea. There is only one condition of completeness, and that is the condition of being ready to receive her crew. I am convinced in my own mind, as far as I could see with my own eyes at Chatham last year, that the Conqueror will not be ready during the course of the financial year, or, if so, it will be quite as much as she can do. I think we ought to have an alteration in the practice of the Admiralty, and I hope my hon. Friend will admit the justice of the claim to an alteration of the system. When ships are called complete they should be absolutely ready for service.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Undoubtedly with their guns, as my hon. and gallant Friend remarks. At present the guns are furnished; but the breech-pieces, without which the gun is only a tube of iron, are not ready; indeed, it is not settled what loading apparatus these 43-ton guns should have, and experiments have to be made to determine what the breech and loading apparatus shall be. I do not complain of care being taken that the guns should be as absolutely perfect as they can be made; but it must be remembered that this has been going on for six years. The design of the gun was settled when I was in the Admiralty in 1878; and it is at least unfortunate that now, in 1884, the Admiralty is unable to use some of their most powerful ships, by reason of the fact that at the present moment the breech-loading apparatus of the gun is not complete—has not been decided upon, in point of fact—that the loading arrangements are not even designed, and cannot be designed until the other arrangements have been completed. The complaint is not only with regard to the Conqueror. I only mention the Conqueror as an instance of the condition of things I regard as unsatisfactory, in order to save the time of the Committee. I think myself the Leander class ought to be rendered complete, according to the arrangements undertaken by the Board of Admiralty, without loss of time. I know it is said that the Leander should be completed first; that then a trial of the Leander should be made; and that then it should be ascertained what improvements or alterations ought to be effected in the Arethusa, and the other ships of the same class. It is said that the other two are built and are almost complete; and I can only say that it is not only the cause of great delay, but of great extravagance, to effect improvements that were not contemplated in the first design. I have said that £33 10s. was the estimated cost per ton, in the first portion of the Estimate for its tonnage, which it was assumed would be realized—I mean £33 10s. per ton for wages. But in these Estimates, 13 pages later, it is shown that only as many as 2,000 tons were actually built; therefore, the wages go up to £41 10s. per ton. I think I have shown to the Committee that the wages are liable to be increased still further by the breaking down of the work contemplated; and then, after the final adjustment of expenses takes place, we may find that it amounts to £50 per ton for wages alone for the building of war ships in Her Majesty's Dockyards. I do not see any ship-builder present in the House who has experience in the building of ships in private yards. I am not going to compare private yards with Her Majesty's Dockyards; but, still, some reference may be made to the cost of building ships of war in private yards, in order that we may be able to form some estimate as to the economy and results of the labour and expenditure in the public Dockyards. I have not been able, from the inquiries I have made, to ascertain that in the yards of the most experienced and capable private builders it would cost to get a ship completed, even as ships are completed in Her Majesty's Dockyards, anything approaching £50 a-ton for labour, exclusive altogether of establishment and fixed charges. Now, Sir, there can be no doubt whatever that the Dockyard work is as good as it can possibly be, and perhaps better than the work of even the best private yard. [Sir EDWARD J. REED: No.] I have a very high opinion of the work of private shipbuilders; but I am coming back to the suggestion I made a few minutes ago, that there must be some mode of carrying out the work in the public Dockyards, which would enormously reduce the cost of building, and yet give as good ships as under the present system of expenditure. I must say that I believe the excess which has been growing larger and larger in these Estimates is greatly due to alterations after the approval of the design, and also to new mechanical appliances. I am afraid that I am wearying the Committee, but I have consulted a gentleman of great commercial ability and intelligence, and also of great scientific attainments, in the matter. I asked him his opinion as to some of the new and most delicate discoveries and improvements adopted in connection with Her Majesty's ships. His answer was that while 10 years ago the Navy was, undoubtedly, slow to admit improvements, and slow to avail itself of that mechanical assistance which science was ready to afford it, he thought that now—and he had very good reason for making the assertion—there was a tendency to go a great deal too far in that direction; that there was a disposition to provide mechanical appliances for works which could be well and cheaply done by manual labour. He added that where manual labour already existed on board ship it certainly would be far better, where the work could be done by the men without placing too great a strain upon their strength, or adding too largely to the number employed on board ship, it should be done by manual labour instead of mechanical means. There was always the danger that a mechanical apparatus might at some time or other when in action get out of order and be strained, and consequently become useless. Now, I do not wish to insist too much upon this point; but I have no doubt myself that we are far beyond Foreign Powers in regard to the adoption of mechanical means for working our guns on board ship; and probably some of this increased cost is due to the additional heavy expense of mechanical appliances. I have, therefore, a grave doubt whether we have gained in absolute efficiency, as many people suppose, by the employment of mechanical appliances. Somehow or other, our expenditure seems largely increased; but the numbers and the efficiency of our ships have not. We have not obtained 11,400 tons of shipping in the year, or the rate of progress which we ought to have had according to the Estimates placed before us; but, on the contrary, the actual amount of tonnage built into the ship has been reduced to 9,200, and may be reduced still further. The practice is, undoubtedly, this—the hull is laid down and the ship half built when the guns are altered, her magazines are altered, and her weights are altered, by which the trim of the ship and her immersion are affected. Other things are changed; and the result is that you have a very costly and a very beautiful machine, but one that is very disappointing, for there are very few cases in which a ship entirely realizes the estimate formed of her by her constructor and designer in the first instance. If you ask why this is, the designer will tell you that he is really not responsible for the changes which have been effected, and the improvements which have been introduced into the ship during the progress of her construction. I venture again to say that if we wish to have economy and efficiency the design should be definitely settled, and that nothing less than a revolution should be allowed to change it. If that course were adopted by the Admiralty one half of the time occupied in building the ships, and one-third of the cost of building the iron-clads, would, I believe, be saved. In saying this, I am in no way attacking, politically, the Admiralty of the day. I am speaking of facts as I find them; and the course which I strongly recommend is in the interests of the country, and not in those of any political Party. Let the design be fully considered before it is settled; spend any amount of time beforehand in changing it backwards and forwards; appoint any Committee you please in order to settle the design; but when it is settled nothing on earth should be allowed to interfere with it. Only one person should be responsible, and that person should be the First Lord of the Admiralty. There is only one other person who would have to carry out the final orders, and that person is the constructor of the ship, and I would hang the constructor if he allowed alterations to be made after the design had been settled. I believe that if this course were taken the ship would be a better ship, a cheaper ship, and a more successful ship in every sense of the word. There would also be this advantage—that instead of taking seven or eight years before it is completed and ready for sea, instead of becoming an obsolete ship, as many of our ships are now, it would be at sea in three or four years, and we should then have the experience afforded by a complete ship carried out according to a complete original design. So that if future improvements be necessary they could be decided upon without doubt or hesitation. I read in the papers the other day that a ship laid down by a private shipbuilder, who has, I believe, built ships for Her Majesty's Service—an armoured ship built for the Brazilian Government—was completed in two years and five months from the day on which the contract was signed. There may have been reasons for the rapidity with which this ship was completed; but she is a powerful ship of about 6,000 tons, and such a result has never been obtained in Her Majesty's Service—such a result has never been obtained by a Government Dockyard. If we could do that—if we could complete a ship and send it to sea within three years of the time it was first laid down, we should make real progress and advancement. I will not trouble the Committee with the evidence which I have obtained myself as to the cost in past years; but I cannot help giving some figures, which are really remarkable in themselves, which have been furnished to me by a shipbuilder who has done good work for the Admiralty. I have been told that the cost of labour in the Nelson was only £18 per ton, delivered as she was to the Admiralty in 1876-7. I am aware that there has been a great increase in the cost of labour since; but the difference between £18 a-ton and £50 a-ton is very great indeed, and this difference is not due to the cost of labour in the Dockyard itself. Probably the labourer in the Dockyards is not paid so much as the artisan in the Clyde; but, somehow or other, better results are got on the Clyde, and I believe it is due entirely to the fact that an order is carried out in the one case, and that an order is not carried out in the other, but is varied and altered time after time and day after day. I must again apologize for having troubled the Committee at so great a length; but the subjects which I have felt it necessary to discuss are of the greatest importance, and touch the strength of the country. I earnestly hope that the Admiralty will, in future, have but one set of figures in their Estimates, and that they will see, as far as possible, that the figures themselves are correct. I trust, also, that attention will be given to the most important considerations which I have ventured to put before the Committee—that a successful effort will be made to stop these endless alterations in ships; that ships will not be returned to this House as complete until they are quite ready for sea, instead of requiring, as at present, several months' work, and an expenditure of several thousands of pounds, in order to render them available for service. It is quite useless to say that we have a large Navy if that Navy is laid up in our Dockyards, incomplete and unable to move by reason of bad boilers, or in consequence of being altogether out of repair. Any Report of the strength of the Navy under conditions like these is completely fallacious; and it is the duty of the Admiralty to maintain Her Majesty's Navy in a state of complete efficiency. I believe it could be done even within the Estimates which are now before the Committee if that discretion is exercised which I have shown to be necessary. It would be thus alone that we can feel that the Navy of the country is equal to the duties which it may be called upon to discharge. A noble and gallant Friend of mine in "another place" has referred, in fitting and just terms, to the services rendered to the country recently by the blue jackets in the Navy; and my noble Friend remarked that as long as we had such men as those we now possess it matters very little what ships we provide for them to fight in. Now, I am not of that opinion. I do not think it is either fair or just to our officers and men that we should place in their hands anything but the most complete weapons, or that we should place them in anything but the most favourable condition for doing their duty to the country and the Queen. It is painful for me to be obliged to say it; but I do not think the Admiralty have fully realized the importance of keeping the ships which are now at sea in such a state of complete efficiency in all respects as to enable them to move at full speed, if they are required to do so, as well or better than any ships that may be sent out against them. Certainly that is not what they are now. I refrain from saying any more at the present moment; but I reserve to myself the opportunity which is always afforded in Committee of taking part in any further debate that may arise.

SIR EDWARD J. REED: The right hon. Gentleman opposite has made a speech, the importance of which it is well to recognize. When the Speaker was putting the Question this evening that "I do now leave the Chair," I heard an hon. Member near me say—"You will now see the House go out almost to a man before the discussion of the Navy Estimates is proceeded with." That prediction was so far verified that to-night I observe that the whole Conservative Party in this House, or those who are so anxious for our foreign policy to be bold and efficient, and so ready for the country to exert itself against foreign nations, has been represented in the course of this discussion by six Members upon the whole of the Benches opposite; and the great Liberal Party, with all the intense interest it takes in naval economy, has been represented by not more than 12 Members. Now, I venture to think that we have, in this state of things, and in the condition of the Committee at the present moment, the true reason why it happens that Her Majesty's ships are seven years in building, and why, at this moment, the country has millions of money taken from its taxes and invested in ships of war, which millions of money might have been available for the defence of the nation and the assertion of its power, if a reasonable amount of efficiency had been put into the naval administration of the country; whereas these millions of money are absolutely useless for all the purposes of the country in any war which may arise, either this year or next. The right hon. Gentleman has incidentally mentioned the fact that the ships, in which this country has been investing its money so freely since 1879, are still lying useless, and must continue to remain as useless for this year and next as if the country had never voted 6d. for them. If we could only see the time arrive when the House of Commons took one-half the interest in its Navy which it constantly takes in miserable pettifogging personal questions, we should see a very different state of things arise, which I, for one, should not be sorry to see. I do not discern in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman any indication of the desire which I feel in my own mind—namely, a desire to place the whole responsibility for these shortcomings upon those Noblemen and Gentlemen who assume to manage our great Departments. I hold that Lord Northbrook and the noble Marquess who represents the War Department in this House are responsible for the non-completion of our ships, and the non-efficiency of their armament; and I do not wish to hold anybody else responsible. It is all very well to talk about hanging a constructor; but the constructors have no more to do with the matter than the House. It is because of divided responsibility and distributed authority that this state of things is allowed to go forward. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the case of a ship which has been recently built, an iron-clad ship of 6,000 tons, which has been completed in about two years and five months. I drew the specifications of that vessel; and really it seems to me but the other day when I was discussing with the representatives of the Brazilian Government the type and the description of ship we should build. I do not know whether her armament is quite complete or not; but, at any rate, she is so far complete that she has passed through her steam trials; and I think I am correct in stating that the builders have received the final instalment of her price. But this ship now built was not thought of until many years after some of the ships which are still remaining incomplete in Her Majesty's Establishments, and which we are told are to remain incomplete for this year and the next. I must say that this, to me, casts a very serious slur upon the administration of our Public Departments. There is a ship now known as the Edinburgh which has been another name i

hon. Friend has told you, it is the intention of the Admiralty to advance her by the 31st of March, 1885, to about 75-100ths of her building. Well, if this House is willing to accept that state of things, and to pass it by without remonstrance, of course there will be little chance of this Imperial Parliament obtaining any reasonable result from the investment of the public money. If the House is willing to agree to such a course, the only wonder is that the Admiralty ever finishes anything at all. If Parliament itself will not insist upon having the money voted properly employed, it is not reasonable to expect that statesmen, who have so many other things to think about, will care whether the ships are completed or not. As to the armament of the Conqueror, I have known the Conqueror for some time. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that so much of the gun as consists of a big tube is ready; but that the breech-piece is still under the consideration of the Department. I do not see any Representative of the War Department on the Bench below me; and I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty is prepared to accept the whole responsibility for the delay in completing the Conqueror, including the breech-piece. If he is not, I think it is a pity that no Representative of the War Department is here to-night to hear the opinions I am going to express, and to learn the objections which some of us cherish in regard to these matters. I say that such delay is a discredit and a disgrace to the country, and to any Government, and especially to the productive skill of the nation in mechanical constructions. The more discreditable it is to a great nation productive of ship-like England, and it is deplorable, as well as discreditable to the country, that such a state of things should be allowed to go on. Attacks were made upon the Government for the delay which the Navy Estimates of last year disclosed, but I then believed, and I still believe, that the Government, within the limits they recognize are acting up to the obligations they imagine to fall upon them in making efforts to get the ships finished. I believe the only pressure which can induce the Government to complete the ships and guns more quickly must come from this House. I really do not know how it is to be put in force; but it is impossible to know such men as Lord Northbrook and the hon. Members now upon the Treasury Bench—the Secretary to the Admiralty, and the hon. Member for Hastings (Sir Thomas Brassey)—without feeling perfectly sure that, unless they are subjected to some influence they cannot master, or do not recognize, they would not submit to this state of things. The right hon. Gentleman has raised a very interesting, but I may say, and I am sure he knows, a very old, discussion about tonnage. In that discussion about tonnage in every point, as far as it has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman, I entirely agree. What the right hon. Gentleman said about measuring progress by tonnage indicates the ease with which the House can be bamboozled. The Navy Estimates themselves have shown for years the absolute nonsense of the distribution of the cost of a ship over the tons weight of hull. But I am sure that the alteration which the right hon. Gentleman proposes would not remove the defects of the present plan. What the right hon. Gentleman proposes is to have a column put in the Estimates, giving the actual weight and material built into the hull; but in building an armour-clad ship, as he is perfectly aware, a great deal of labour is spent upon parts that weigh very little. When we get a ship approaching completion and ready to receive her armour, weights might be put in which would disrupt all your figures and make matters even worse than they are at present. The fact is, if we will only accept it, the words “tons built” in these Estimates mean nothing at all, and it is a waste of time to expend any pains upon them. If all the information we really received from the Admiralty were how much they proposed to spend on the ships; how much they have spent; and how much more they propose to spend, then we should know just as much as we know now. But I must say this on behalf of the Admiralty and of the form of the Estimates—that I think there would be considerable inconvenience even to this House in modifying the present arrangements, because it would sweep away all the old comparisons; and there is nothing worse in considering the National Estimates than to find the basis of them continually changed. The Admiralty—I do not remember whether it was the late or the present Admiralty, and I do not discriminate much between the different Boards of Admiralty—but I think it was the present Admiralty, who, in deference to remarks which were made from time to time, did introduce a different and better column in the programme of the works, giving us a percentage of the ships to be built in a somewhat improved form. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has laid down another proposition to-night, which I think is not only a very true, but a very important one, and that is that in the present state of Parliament, looking at those things which Parliament itself recognizes to be of importance, it would be useless to attempt here to make any change, or to fix the responsibility for the state of the Navy upon anybody but the Government. I am speaking now with regard to the number of ships we have. I see the right hon. and gallant Member for Wigtown (Sir John Hay) present. He has made many efforts, and exercised no small portion of his high faculties and great experience, in securing certain advantages for the Navy. Sir Thomas Symonds also has devoted great care and labour to similar improvements; but what can any individual do if all the time my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Sir Thomas Brassey), and my hon. Friend below me the Secretary to the Admiralty, are ready to come down to the House and paint to us a coulour de rose picture of the state of the Navy? We can do nothing. There are one or two minor matters in the right hon. Gentleman's speech which I should like to refer to. I could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman, and I was obliged to express audibly my dissent from him, when he said that the work done in Her Majesty's Dockyards is infinitely better than that done in private yards. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman intended to put it quite as strongly as that; and I do not think it is necessary to introduce any question as to the relative excellence of the work done between private yards and the Government Dockyards, because the length of time taken in building a ship is in no degree due to any considerations of that kind. The right hon. Gentleman has not, I think, had any experience as to completing war ships in private yards. I have had great experience. Since I left the Admiralty I have been supervisor of a number of iron-clad vessels, or men-of-war, which have been built in private establishments; and I must say that I do not experience any difficulty in getting them completed within a reasonable time and with all necessary excellence. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept that statement from me as having some weight. There is another point on which I wish to ask a question of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, and it is about the Royal Corps of Naval Constructors. No one here will suppose, for a moment, that I could possibly witness any improvement in the position of the naval constructors, who have been a very depressed class, without satisfaction; but it seems strange to me that we are told in the Estimates that certain Votes are to be given for a Royal Corps of Naval Constructors without being told anything about the Corps itself. I do not know whether the Government, in these days, can undertake to establish any number of Royal Corps without reference to Parliament; but in this case, as far as I can make out, the Crown has not sought any kind of approval for the establishment of this Corps. As I have said, I do not know whether the Crown claims the right to establish any number of Royal Corps without reference to this House; but I should have thought that, in taking such an important step, some pains would have been taken to obtain the approval of this House, and to furnish it with all necessary information. It is to me highly gratifying, however, that this Corps has been established; and I think the present Administration deserves extremely well of the country for having made the change, and for having elevated a mechanical class into a higher and more recognized position. I believe, Sir Arthur Otway, I shall be in Order in saying a word in reference to the naval engineers?

THE CHAIRMAN: That question will come on more properly for discussion under Vote 6. The present discussion has been largely developed altogether, and it would certainly not be admissible to discuss items which will come on again under other heads.

SIR EDWARD J. REED: I thought the Committee were to understand that this was a discussion on the general question. All I was going to say was, that I wished I could say something to-night that would induce the Admiralty to take into consideration the propriety of giving the engineers of the Royal Navy something like the improved organization which they are now giving to the constructors. There is nothing more lamentable to me in connection with the whole of the Navy than the fact that actually the engineers of the Navy are allowed to remain in such a degraded position—degraded as regards rank, and degraded as regards pay. I will not make any comparison between the class of naval engineers and the ordinary active class, because I am aware that a great variety of opinions might be held as to the relative importance of the engineers in the Royal Navy, and of the other executive branches; but I do not suppose that any Member of the Committee would not wish to see the naval engineers, considering the way in which they have been trained for their profession in order to acquire skill, and incur the tremendous responsibility they are intrusted with—I do not suppose anybody would think the naval engineers are inferior, for instance, to the paymasters, who are nothing more than clerks. Will it be credited that the Government of the country has continued to go on keeping its naval engineers not only in a position of inferiority, but in a position of marked inferiority to the mere clerks—the paymasters, and the clerical officers of the Royal Navy? I do not suppose there would be any difficulty in inducing clerks to go to sea in Her Majesty's ships. I presume it would be, at least, as easy to get a naval clerk as a naval engineer; yet I am sorry to say it is nevertheless, a fact that the naval engineer, both as regards pay and rank, is, by comparison, in a position of great disadvantage. In deference to what the Chairman has said, I will not go into figures as to this class. It may be possible to refer to them when we come to the Vote for that Department of the Service, and as another occasion will arise, I will content myself with what I have said. I think a great discrepancy exists between the pay and rank, and other hon. Gentlemen who are familiar with them may feel it their duty to make remarks upon them. I hope that nothing I have said will be supposed in any way to be directed against the Admiralty. The remarks I have made to-night are a continuation of those which I made in the last Parliament, and which I am bound to continue to make, because the Naval Service is one of primary importance. Another reason why we should be perfectly free in our remarks is this—that Her Majesty's Government must do the House the justice of saying that whatever topics they are ready to convert into political questions they are never ready to make the Navy a political question; and the right hon. Gentleman who has spoken to-night set an admirable example by indulging in free criticism without being animated by Party bias. I hope my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty will feel that the only object I have had in making these remarks has been to get Her Majesty's ships quickly built, and to see that they are promptly rendered fit for service.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he thought the discussion that night might be looked on, to some extent, as an adjourned debate upon the speech made by the Secretary to the Admiralty in introducing the Navy Estimates the other night. He believed that was the general understanding; and he wished to make a few remarks upon that speech, some parts of which had not yet been touched. He was very glad to hear the Secretary to the Admiralty the other night state that he was in a position to give some increase of pay to a very important branch of the Naval Service, or, as he called them, "the backbone of the lower class of the Navy"—he meant the petty officers. He understood that some increase was to be made to their pay immediately, and also prospectively. They were, he believed, after having served four years, to get an increase of 3d. per day. That was satisfactory as far as it went; but he should like to ask the hon. Gentleman why it was that the increase of pay was confined to the seamen class of petty officers, and why it should not have been extended to some of the non-combatants? For instance, to some of the ships' stewards and police, both of them important classes in reference to a man-of-war, and whose pay had not increased for a number of years—in point of fact, since 1867 he believed. Complaints had been made, as hon. Members might have seen, in the papers within the last few years of the want of honesty which was supposed to have existed among the class of ships' stewards. He would not go into that matter now. He did not know whether the complaints were well founded or not. He thought that some of the cases had been magnified; but he would suggest that an excuse, if excuse was possible at all, might be found in the fact that these petty officers found themselves at very considerable disadvantage compared with other classes on board ship. He presumed that was the one cause which had led to the cases of peculation which had originally been found to exist. He thought himself that the increase of pay ought to have been extended to them for another reason also, because they did not participate in that deferred pay which was now given to petty officers of the seamen class, and they were not allowed good-conduct stripes. In many ways they were at great disadvantage compared with their messmates on board ship of the same rank. He also wanted to know, because it was not made clear the other day, whether this increase of pay to the petty officers was to be extended to the Coastguard? He did not think it was; and the Coastguard also would be at considerable disadvantage. They constituted our First Class Naval Reserve, and were the first Reserve we could call upon in a time of war. He was glad to hear that improvements were to be made in the hospital staff, and that thoroughly trained nurses were to be obtained—both boys and also lady nurses being provided. He thought it was a step in the right direction; but in connection with matters of hospital treatment he should like to call the attention of the Secretary to the Admiralty to what he believed to be a real grievance. He was afraid that very few Members of the House were aware of the matter. The case was this—when an officer went into hospital—say a retired officer, in order to make an exact comparison—he had a sum of money, ranging from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. a-day stopped, out of his pay, or pension, as the case might be, for board, lodging, and medical treatment in the hospital. That might possibly amount to something like one-fifth or one-sixth of the pay or pension; but in the case of a pensioner who was obliged to go into the hospital the whole of his pay was stopped if he was a single man; but if he was married then 3s. a-week was allowed out of his pay to his wife and family. If he was not married the whole of his pay or pension was entirely stopped. Now, he thought that was hardly fair treatment. In the case of an officer, one-fifth or one-sixth of his pay was stopped; but in the case of the man four-fifths or five-sixths of his pay or pension were stopped altogether. He did not know whether the matter had been represented to the Admiralty; but he could assure his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty that it was looked upon as a very great grievance at sea-port towns, and it was thought that something might be done to remedy it. He had been very much astonished, in listening to the very interesting speech of the Secretary to the Admiralty the other evening, to find that from first to last no mention whatever was made of the steam branch of the Navy. He thought he was right in saying that from first to last, in the course of that speech, not a single word was said in reference to that important branch of the Service. His hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) had called attention to this matter; and he (Captain Price) would, with the permission of the Committee, make one or two remarks upon it. He did not know whether the omission was accidental, or whether it had been made on purpose; but he was afraid that the Admiralty were tired of listening to the grievances of those who were connected with that branch of the Naval Service. He had himself, as well as many other Members in that House, in the last few years brought the matter forward. He did not intend to repeat what he had said before. The grievance was well known at the Admiralty; but there was one particular point in the case which he wanted to refer to. No doubt, he had referred to it before, and he would ask the leave of the Committee to refer to it again, because it was a very important matter—namely, the way in which the officers were allowed to count their time. The present system was one which bore very hardly. Hon. Members would know that he referred to what was called the "11 years' Clause"—that was to say, the arrangement effected in the year 1870, by which officers of the engineer class and officers of other classes also were not allowed to count the whole of their junior time until they had served 11 years in the higher ranks. Well, that was fair enough when the scheme first came out in 1870; but he was afraid that those who invented the scheme at that time did not look forward, nor did they seem to have availed themselves of the experience of the actuaries, who would have told them what was likely to occur. They did not seem to have availed themselves of the information which they might have obtained if they had done so. He could only say that they had deliberately inflicted an injustice upon a large class of men. To show the way in which the scheme acted in reference to the engineer class, he would point out that in the year 1877, for he would not go further back than that—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I have already pointed out to hon. Members, and the hon. and gallant Member himself has given Notice of a Motion upon this point, which, as the hon. and gallant Member admits, was not referred to in the Statement of the Secretary to the Admiralty—that it will be irregular to discuss upon the present Vote items which are contained in Vote 6. The proper time for discussing these items is when Vote 6 is reached. No doubt, there is an understanding to discuss the general policy of the Navy upon this Vote; but it would not be in Order to refer to specific items in subsequent Votes which are to come on hereafter, and in regard to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has himself already given Notice of a Motion.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood him. What he was trying to discuss was the question of the Vote for the pay of the men. That had nothing to do with Vote 6. Vote 6 was for the Dockyards; and the question of the engineers' pay could not, he took it, possibly be discussed under that Vote. The Dockyard engineers of the steam branch would come under Vote 6; but it was the engineers of the Royal Navy that he was now referring to. He knew it was somewhat irregular; but he thought it had generally been allowed to discuss the whole question of pay upon Votes 1 and 2. Vote 1 was passed the other night, because it was important that the Government should get the men; but the discussion was cut short, and tacitly allowed to stand over and be discussed on Vote 2.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN asked to be allowed to explain what the misconception was. The artificers in the Dockyards were provided for under Vote 6; but the class of men called engineer artificers were men connected with the Navy, who were provided for in Vote 1. The engineers and engineer artificers had always been provided for in Vote 1, and provision for victuals and clothing was made in Vote 2; so that the engineers of the Navy were, so far as this Vote was concerned, in the same position as the men of the Navy. The artificers who came under Vote 6 were not in the same class.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the class of engineers to which the hon. and gallant Member refers is included in the Vote for Victuals and Clothing in Vote 2, he will be in Order in referring to it; but I understood that he was referring to the artificers included in Vote 6; and it would not be regular to discuss any of the items which come under that Vote until the Vote itself is reached.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he did not propose to allude to any body of men for whom provision was made under Vote 6. He desired now to call attention to the peculiar way in which the engineer officers were allowed to count their time, and which, of course, affected their pay, their half-pay, and their pension also. In 1877 no fewer than 55 chief engineers, out of a rota of 220, were able to get the higher rates of pay, or over 17s. a day, and half-pay and pensions were in proportion. That was, perhaps, a very fair allowance—namely, 55 out of 220; but this scheme, called the “11 years’ Clause,” acted in this way—that in the following year, 1878, instead of 55 officers out of a total of 220 getting the maximum rates of pay and pensions, only 44 got them; and from that date the number had decreased with remarkable regularity, from 44 down to 39, 32, 30, 22, 17; and in the present year, 1884, down to five. So that, practically, there were only five chief engineers this year who could receive the higher rates of pay. When they discussed the question of pay in regard to the engineer officers they might be told by the Government—“These officers may get 22s. a-day, which is very favourable, compared with the pay received by other classes of officers in the Navy;” when the real truth was that this maximum of pay was almost purely imaginary, or, at all events, was so seldom attained that it might fairly be called imaginary. The real maximum was 17s. a-day, which the officers were able to attain. When he complained of the matter, he was told very naturally—“If we invented any other means of counting the time for the engineers; if we allowed them to count the whole of their junior time after they have served only eight years, we must do the same thing for officers in other classes.” That was quite true; but there was just the same grievance attached to other classes, such as the accountant branch, and the assistant paymasters. It might not affect them to the same extent; but it was a real grievance with them as it was with the engineers, and it all arose out of that unfortunate Order in Council of 1870, which suited that time well enough, but certainly did not suit the present. As far back as 1867, an assistant paymaster served in that rank seven and a-half years before he was promoted; and if he was promoted after serving that time, he very soon got into the higher grades of pay, and counted the whole of his junior time. But, owing to the block of promotion, it was found in the following years that the average time of seven and a-half years in the lower grades was increased to nine years, and it went on increasing with the same regularity as in the case of the engineers. In 1869 an assistant paymaster had to serve 10 years; and in the following years 10½, 11, 12, 13, 14, 14½, 15, until in the present year it had reached 15½ years. The average time an assistant paymaster had to serve now in that rank was about 15½ years. He had to serve that length of time before he got promotion, and he had to serve 11 in the higher ranks before he could count the whole of his junior time. Now, he contended that such a result was not dreamt of in 1870, or they would never have had such a scheme as this. He could not help thinking that the Admiralty had been very badly advised, and really did not see what the thing was coming to. As an illustration, in order to show the perfunctory, hap-hazard way in which the scheme was prepared by the Admiralty in 1870, he might mention the rate of pay a paymaster got if he were able to put in his 11 years, and if by some accident he failed of that period. A paymaster who had had 15 years' service as an assistant paymaster might be obliged, say by ill-health, to retire after having completed 10 years and 11 months' service as paymaster. The consequence would be that he could only count six years of his junior service, not having been able to serve the whole of his time. That gave him a pay of 19s. a-day, or, if he took the retired pay, £191 a-year; but if his health would allow him, or the Admiralty would allow him to serve one month longer, instead of having 19s. his pay would have gone up to 31s. 6d a-day, and his retired pay, instead of being £191, would be £350. He thought that fact showed the haphazard way in which the scheme was prepared in 1870. The Admiralty knew the ins and outs of the matter very well; and he did not think he could persuade them to do anything in regard to it. It was not for him to suggest what was to be done, nor was the Admiralty responsible for what was done in 1870. After all, they were only the inheritors of the legacy left to them; but they ought to see that the mistake was now remedied. The only thing he would suggest, if he might do so, was this—that the Admiralty should appoint a Departmental Committee to examine into the matter. He knew that Departmental Committees were not altogether satisfactory; but there would be no use in his asking for a Select Committee of the House. The grievances were so real and extraordinary that he was satisfied if any Committee of gentlemen were to look into the matter, it would be impossible for them not to declare that a most unsatisfactory state of things prevailed which ought to be remedied at once.

Mr. STEWART MACLIVER said, he gathered from the ruling of the Chairman that he must not refer to one of the subjects which had been raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Devonport (Captain Price). Something appeared to have been done on behalf of the naval engineers; but when they examined into it, it was found, in reality, to be very trivial, and he could not understand that it could have been done with any real intention of improving the position of that class. The addition of 2s. a-day was given to certain chief engineers;

but owing to its restrictions the addition only applied to the chief engineers on board five ships—that was to say, that an increase of 2s. a-day had been given to five men. The arrangement was, therefore, perfectly illusory, and would only apply to the Inflexible, the Téméraire, the Polyphemus, and two other ships. Reference had been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) to the "11 years' Clause." That clause had been so frequently discussed in the House that it would be a waste of time to refer to it again; but what he would venture to suggest in the way of remedy, and to put before his hon. Friends who sat below him, would be this—that an engineer should be allowed to count one-eleventh for junior service for each year of his full pay as chief engineer. That, practically, would settle the whole of the "11 years' Clause." No doubt, it would entail a certain amount of increased expenditure; but that increased expenditure, as far as he could calculate, would not exceed £4,500, and it would remove a great grievance from a most important part of the steam branch of the Navy. Perhaps he might be allowed to show how the present system worked. Some allusion had been made to it by the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport. The rates of pay laid down for the men after 17, 20, 21, and 22 years' service varied from 18s. to 21s.; but the whole thing was fallacious; and he would suggest that different ranks should be introduced which should be allowed to carry with them all the advantages given, and which could be so arranged as to provide for a periodical revision of the position of all officers, from sub-lieutenants up to captains. Some reference had been made to the engine-room artificers. Strong complaints were just now being made by men of that class, who contended that they had to serve far too long a time in order to gain a pension. They were now called on to re-enter for 12 years, after having served 10, putting two years more to the service which entitled men to pension. The result was that the Admiralty found it extremely difficult to get the best men, and they were obliged to accept others of an inferior class. They could not induce the men to re-enter. He would suggest that the men should be somewhat differently dealt with; and that if they were called on to serve an additional number of years until they got a pension they should have some advantage from it. He would also like his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty to inform the Committee why Dockyard men who had served in the Navy should not be allowed to count their servitude for a pension, the same as men regularly in the service of the Navy? With regard to pensions, he had to complain that, while the age pension was given to Naval Reserve men at 50, it was withheld from the Marines, and that the enrolled Marine Reserves did not get it till 55. He hoped that his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, when he rose to reply, would be able to give them some information as to what was intended to be done for the men in the Dockyards, who were anxiously expecting the improvement which had long been promised.

MR. GRANTHAM said, they had already discussed the position of naval constructors, paymasters, and engineers; and he was desirous now of calling the attention of the Committee to the position of the naval schoolmasters, which was a very anomalous one compared with that of the schoolmasters of the Army and the Marines. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that schoolmasters of the Navy had only been appointed during the last 25 years. Up to that time education on board Her Majesty's ships was conducted by seamen schoolmasters, who proved themselves so thoroughly inefficient that 25 years ago an application was made to the Privy Council on Education to provide some better system of education. It was then decided to provide a certain number of schoolmasters, who should devote themselves to the work of education in the Navy. Unfortunately, the teachers first appointed found the life and the emolument so different from what they had expected that almost the whole of them soon afterwards left the Service, and it became necessary for the Government to educate their own teachers specially for the Navy. Those teachers entered the Service under the impression that they would be treated similarly to the schoolmasters in the Army, and in the Marines; but in a short time it was found, both in reference to pay, pension, and promotion, that they were in a far worse position than their confrères either in the Army or in the Marines. Their exceptional treatment was a great grievance to them; and there could be no doubt that, both in regard to pay and pension, they were in an inferior position. He found that the pension of a naval schoolmaster was only, on the average, £31 18s. 9d.; whereas that of the Marine schoolmaster was £63 17s. 6d., and that of the Army schoolmaster £63, or, in point of fact, rather more than double the sum which the schoolmaster got in the Navy. Then, in regard to pay, there was not so much to complain of, because within the last two years the pay had been improved; but, still, the naval schoolmaster only got £95 2s. 3d., as against £101 in the Marines, and the same sum in the Army, including rations. The difference was not so very large in that case, being under £6 a-year; but both in the Marines and in the Army the schoolmaster had the sum of £31 allowed him for quarters, unless he had quarters actually provided, to say nothing of the value of his uniform, which the naval schoolmaster did not receive. That made a considerable difference; so that as regarded pay and pension the naval schoolmasters were in a far inferior position to the schoolmasters and teachers of the Army and Marines. They felt that they were not dealt with fairly, considering that when they were appointed there was an honourable understanding that their position would be similar to that of schoolmasters in the Army and Marines. Then, again, they were at a disadvantage with regard to promotion in the Service as compared with the schoolmasters in the Army, who could become Warrant officers after 12 years' service. He believed that out of 250 Army schoolmasters 27 were Warrant officers; 17 had obtained the rank of lieutenant; and three had retired with the honorary rank of major. Now, there were only seven head masterships which teachers in the Navy could hope to obtain, however long their service might be; and it was only natural that, under these circumstances, they should feel that their merits had not only been unrewarded, but unacknowledged. And, therefore, he thought that in asking to be put on an equality with their colleagues in the Army they were not seeking more than they were entitled to. He trusted this question, which excited a good deal of interest in the Navy, would be taken in hand by the Admiralty.

MR. GOURLEY said, there were some points with regard to the present condition of the Navy which called for explanation at the hands of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty. They had placed before them annually the fact that the Admiralty intended to build a certain number of tons of armoured and unarmoured ships; but although, of course, his hon. Friend was not responsible for the programme laid before the House, the Secretary to the Admiralty could never inform them how much the maximum cost of the armoured and unarmoured tonnage would be. From the statement of the hon. Gentleman he found that the programme of last year had been fairly carried out, there being only about 125 tons less than the quantity of new tonnage promised in that programme; but the work completed had cost £13,000 more than what was contemplated—that was, however, always providing that the money set aside for repairs had not been devoted to new work. Under the present system, however desirable it might be that the number of tons intended to be built by the Admiralty should annually be laid before Parliament, the result in the long run proved that the Estimates were entirely misleading, the reason being that the Admiralty, building ships morsel by morsel, lost the power of adhering to the original Estimates. Now, he wished to place clearly before the Committee the mode in which the Estimates that were laid before the House year after year were carried out, and, by way of example and proof, he might be allowed to call attention to the case of the Inflexible. They were asked, at the time the vessel was laid down, to vote £401,000 for her construction; but that had extended ever seven years, and the result was that the total cost of the ship when complete amounted to £800,594. The reason why the Estimate was so much exceeded was that the Admiralty had lost all control over the original Estimate, in consequence of the long period during which her construction was going on. He thought it would be far better that the Admiralty, instead of adding bit by bit to a number of ships, should state to Parliament that they intended to construct such and such a ship in the course of the financial year. And not only did heavily increased cost of construction result, but there was this fact also to be borne in mind—that ships became obsolete by the time they were completed under the system he had described. Anyone might see in our Dockyards numbers of huge hulks which were utterly useless for fighting purposes, and which were so many examples of the bad results of that system. The Estimate placed before Parliament in the programme of last year showed that 7,143 tons of unarmoured and 12,281 tons of armoured vessels would be produced, and that the total cost would be £1,979,443; and here he had to complain that the cost of producing this new tonnage was jumbled together with the cost of repairs, the result being that it was impossible to distinguish the cost of either. However, the cost which, in round numbers, was to have been £102 15s. per ton, had actually amounted to £103 15s. per ton. It appeared that the money voted for repairs was very often transferred to other work; and he would take that opportunity of asking on what grounds the Admiralty applied money that had been voted for one purpose to another? The money to be expended in repairs in the current year was £419,840; and he thought the Committee had a right to know upon what it was to be spent—upon what ships, and at what places, and how much would be expended upon the hulls and machinery respectively? The right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay), on the occasion of the Secretary to the Admiralty making his annual Statement, asked for a Select Committee to inquire into the condition of the ships; and he (Mr. Gourley) apprehended that, in asking for that Committee, the object of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was that the House of Commons might not only have more control over the ships themselves, but also over the mode in which the money was spent upon them. Lord Northbrook, however, probably not understanding the question, had arranged to have a Departmental Committee to inquire into the subject rather than that advocated by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He agreed with the wish expressed on the opposite side of the House that evening that if a Departmental Committee were appointed there should also be a Committee of the House of Commons to deal with the matter, because the former would, in all probability, be composed of Gentlemen educated in the traditions of the Admiralty, so that, so far as responsibility and the ultimate results were concerned, the House would be no wiser after the Committee had reported than they were at that moment. He said, also, that the appointment of a Departmental Committee, inasmuch as it implied that there were no hon. Members capable of dealing with naval questions, was an insult to the House of Commons. He remembered that, when Mr. Ward Hunt, who was at the time First Lord of the Admiralty, objected to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question of the designs on which their ships were being built, on the ground of want of technical knowledge, the hon. Member for Hastings (Sir Thomas Brassey) was all in favour of its appointment. He knew his hon. Friend had the courage of his opinions, and he believed he would not refrain from expressing the same views now as he had on the occasion referred to. Now, with regard to vessels like the Mersey, the Admiralty officials were so enamoured of ships of this type that they were going to lay down five of them. He believed the whole thing was an experiment, and he could not perceive what object the Admiralty had in view in constructing these ships. Were they to be used as broadside fighting ships, as rams, or as convoys? Perhaps the Secretary to the Admiralty would give the Committee some information upon that point; but, whatever the explanation might be, he certainly held that until they had more experience of these ships it would be wiser to lay down and finish one instead of working upon five of them; and when it was proved that the one vessel was a success they could very well come to Parliament and ask for the money to build the remaining four. To build five ships of one kind without knowing whether any benefit to the country would result was, to his mind, something beyond experiment. He would ask, also, whether they were to be armed with iron, steel, or compound plates?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: They will have no armour at all; no side armour.

MR. GOURLEY: Then that made it all the more desirable to know for what purpose they were intended. If, as he apprehended, they were for convoy or cruising purposes, he would like to know what fuel they were to carry—whether they would be built to take five, six, or ten days' supply? Certainly, for the purposes he had indicated, they should be able to carry enough fuel to cover long distances. Again, at what distance would torpedo boats of the Scout class be able to discharge torpedoes? He understood they were specially intended to carry the Whitehead torpedo, and he would ask what was their consumption of fuel at 16 knots; because unless they could discharge their torpedoes at a safe distance from the enemy, and also steam at great speed, they would be rather an element of danger than otherwise. Then, he would ask, with what object were the Admiralty going to build two despatch vessels, a class of ships that, to his mind, had become totally unnecessary, and could be regarded as neither more nor less than yachts attached to ~~the~~ Squadrons for the use of the Admiral and officers? All their ships now carried steam launches, which, as well as torpedo boats, could be utilized for despatch purposes, between the ships of the Fleet; and for service abroad in time of war, he was quite certain that the Merchant Service would supply vessels of greater speed and at less cost than those upon which the Admiralty were going to spend so much money. He now came to the subject of guns, with reference to which he would put this question to the Secretary to the Admiralty—What progress has been made in supplying breech-loading guns to vessels that are now, or have been, armed with muzzle-loading guns? He found that the work at Woolwich was almost at a standstill, as the result of the transition that was taking place from iron to steel in the manufacture of guns; and he contended that the Navy ought not to be dependent upon Woolwich for its armament, the consequence of which was that their ships were always kept waiting for their complement of guns. The Navy, in his opinion, ought to have its own Ordnance Department, separate from, and independent of, the Army Ordnance Department. Passing from that subject, he desired to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that it was proposed to increase, during the current year, the number of boys, which stood at 4,800 last year, to 4,950, of whom 2,450 were for service in the Fleet, and 2,500 in training ships. He would ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how many boys on an average were annually transferred from the training ships to the Navy; how many boys there were actually apprenticed on board the ships of the Navy; and where, and on board what ships, the 2,450 boys described as for service in the Fleet had been distributed? He believed it was generally understood, after the lamentable disasters that befell the Eurydice and the Atalanta, that instead of being kept so much on board training ships, as was then the practice, it would be in future for the benefit not only of the Navy, but also of the boys themselves, that they should be distributed amongst the ships of the Flying Squadron and those engaged in the Coastguard Service. It would, he thought, be wise on the part of the Admiralty to place the boys where they could learn the duties they would have to perform in actual warfare; and, therefore, he would like to know how far that policy had been carried out? He should also be glad if the Secretary to the Admiralty would state how many boys educated at Greenwich Hospital School entered the Navy; and how many went into the Merchant Service? The primary object of that Institution was education for the Naval Service; and yet he believed that a very small percentage of the boys entered the Navy, and the reason of this was not very far to seek. It was that, although the boys at Greenwich Hospital School received an education almost as good as that given to the boys on the Britannia, they had nothing before them in the Navy but the position of steward or petty officer; whereas the boys trained on board the Britannia had before them the rank of midshipmen and upwards. The two systems required to be carefully looked into. Last year the Lord Warden and another vessel were sent to the Shetland Islands for the purpose of recruiting boys; and he would like to hear from the Secretary to the Admiralty how many boys were obtained. He held that, instead of having so many boys trained on board ships of the Navy, where the cost in wages and provisions was £80 or £100 a-year, it would be wiser for the Admiralty to recruit their boys from the training ships on the Thames and other rivers, from which they could be supplied prepared for sea at the very much smaller cost of £30 or £40 a-year. Then with regard to the Britannia. Many discussions had taken place, and many promises had been made, with regard to that vessel; but his own opinion was that, as a training ship, she ought to be abolished. In these days of equality of education she was totally unnecessary as a means of providing officers for the Navy, the higher ranks in which ought, in his opinion, to be open to every boy who entered the Service; no matter how poor he might be, he should have an opportunity of distinguishing himself as an officer; and he held that, so soon as the common sense of the country had grasped this question, public opinion would demand what he was now advocating. In concluding his observations on naval affairs, he desired to refer to a subject of considerable interest. The gallant conduct of Admiral Hewett at Suakin had already been the subject of commendation in that House. He was also bound to add his testimony to the admirable conduct of the officers and men of the Naval Brigade, who fell defending their guns at Tamanieb; at the same time, he thought it only right that the cause of the breaking of the square, which led to the men being placed in their unfortunate position, should be the subject of inquiry.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member that as the proceedings he was then referring to occurred on shore, they could not be discussed in connection with the Vote before the Committee.

MR. GOURLEY said, he had been under the impression that the conduct of the Naval Brigade could be discussed on the Navy Estimates. He would, however, take another opportunity of referring to the subject.

SIR JOHN HAY said, as he had already had an opportunity of addressing the Committee, he should be very brief in the remarks he was about to make. He could not agree with that part of the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down in which he recommended that there should be a separate Establishment for the manufacture of naval guns. He regretted exceedingly that there was no person in the House responsible for Ordnance affairs. He did not know whether the Secretary to the Admiralty would be able to answer the questions put to him with regard to the guns required by ships of the Navy, and also with regard to the want of guns for ships in process of completion. But with regard to guns made for the public service, circumstances might arise—such, for instance, as the retirement of a disabled ship upon a fortress, such as Malta or Gibraltar—in which it would be desirable that naval and other guns should be interchangeable. With regard to the Committee alluded to by the hon. Member, he entirely agreed with the remarks made by him upon that subject; and, having moved for the appointment of a Select Committee, he regretted to find that a Committee not of that House had been appointed elsewhere in its stead. There was no Naval Officer belonging to the Admiralty in this Parliament. The House wanted to have before it the First Sea Lord and the Naval Officers who were responsible for the advice given to the Admiralty. It was to be feared—and he believed his hon. Friend would not doubt it for one moment—that the strength of their Navy was far below that which was necessary for the national defence. This was the first year in which a French Minister of Marine had ever been reported to have said that the assertion that the French Navy was inferior to the English Navy was untrue. He entirely agreed with the French Minister of Marine that the French iron-clad Navy had increased with immense rapidity. The old fable of the hare and the tortoise was being repeated by this country and France in the case of their Navies. The gallant officer to whom he had previously alluded was reported to have said on a recent public occasion—

“It does not signify whether our ships are built of paste-board, iron, or steel; the Navy will continue to maintain its own reputation.”

He could not possibly conceive that the gallant Admiral could have really meant what he said. It was impossible to suppose that any officer in these days could say that without iron-clads the country was in a safe condition; and yet what he had quoted was the only public declaration as to the condition of the Navy which had been made by the First Sea Lord of the Admiralty. That declaration was now before the public, and many people believed it. It was most unfortunate that a gallant officer, who must know better, should in public, in returning thanks for the Navy, make such a declaration. [A laugh.] His hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) laughed; but it was no laughing matter that a person who was responsible for the condition of the Navy should make the assertion that it was of no consequence whether their ships were made of paste-board, iron, or steel. He knew his hon. Friend would say that the speech in question was an after-dinner speech, and one had no right to take notice of it. But the country had read the statement of the First Sea Lord; it was made in a public place; and his right hon. Friends below him, and, indeed, right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, who had endeavoured to make the country aware of the inferiority of the Navy, of the terrible condition to which the Navy had been reduced, were deprived of the credit which was due to them for their exertions by the observations, made by the most responsible officer in the country, which he (Sir John Hay) had just read to the Committee. The only means by which the First Sea Lord would be able to explain his words would be by being examined before a Committee of the House. No doubt, if he were examined before a Committee, it would be found that the gallant officer was of a very different opinion to the one he had given utterance to. It was only by means of a Committee that the country could obtain the information it ought to have as to the condition of the Navy; but his hon. Friends at the Admiralty took good care that there should not be a Committee. They would not even let the country know what the condition of the boilers was; they refused to give a Return of the iron-clad ships of the Navy, which contained such rubbish in the shape of boilers that no one dared send them to sea. He would not, however, go into that question again. His right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith), in introducing the subject to the notice of the Committee, had spoken of the programme of the iron-clad shipbuilding, and had pointed out that, although the Admiralty claimed that the programme had been completed, the programme had not been completed. His right hon. Friend was quite correct in the statement that the tonnage built was greatly below what was promised, and what had been paid for. The very Return which hon. Gentlemen had in their hands just now showed that the deficiency in the tonnage completed compared with that promised was still greater than was at first supposed. By that Return alone it was clearly shown that the credit which his hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had taken to himself was not deserved. He (Sir John Hay) had received, as many other persons had received, from that distinguished officer, the Admiral of the Fleet—Sir Thomas Symonds—some comparisons between the Navy of this country and the Navies of other Powers. He was sure the Admiral of the Fleet deserved the thanks of his countrymen for the pains he had taken to awaken the country and the House of Commons from the lethargy which had overpowered it with regard to naval matters. There was no cruising Squadron for the men and boys of the Navy to be exercised in—there was no Squadron of instruction; and yet his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith), and right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, had constantly said such a Squadron was absolutely necessary. The fact of the matter was that the Navy was starved; the Estimates were not large enough to provide for the building of ships or the training of the men; and the result was that the men and boys of the Navy were not now being trained at sea. His right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith) and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) had alluded to the condition of the Marines. The Marine Forces, who had done their duty so gallantly recently, were decreased in numbers; and yet we were about to occupy Suakin with a considerable force of Marines. That was an extra duty imposed upon them; and it seemed to him to demand that that force should not only be kept at its old strength, but that it should be increased by the number who were to be used as the garrison of the Red Sea ports. He trusted it was not true, but if it were true he regretted exceedingly, that no Vote of Thanks was to be proposed in the House of Commons to those distinguished and gallant man—soldiers, Marines, and seamen—who did their duty so well in the Soudan. It had been said that the force engaged in the recent military operations was so very small; but that was not a valid reason why their gallant services should not be recognized by the House of Commons. He was persuaded it would be felt by the country most unsatisfactory that because the numbers were limited to 4,000 men the House was not to be called upon to vote, as he was sure they would vote unanimously, its thanks to the men who fought so well in the two desperate actions at Téb and Tamanieb. He desired to confirm what had fallen from two or three of his hon. Friends as to the assistant paymasters and naval engineers. The engineers of the Navy were men of the highest education, and their services were absolutely essential in the complicated condition of the present ships of war. The duties of the naval engineers were far more onerous and responsible than the duties which had to be performed by engineers some 20 years ago. The complicated machinery of particular ships required skill in working, which ought to be well paid for. The system by which pay was given appeared to him to be quite unnecessary and complicated. A Committee was appointed by the Admiralty some years ago which recommended an increase in the pay of these gallant officers. The suggestion in the Navy Estimates, that some improvement was to be made in the pay of the engineers, was of a very slight and limited character. Two shillings a-day was to be given to five gentlemen under certain conditions. It was throwing dust in the eyes of the country to say that this was attending to the claims of the engineers. There were some 200 odd of them, and their skill and very necessary services demanded for them the respect of the House of Commons. He hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would be able to give some promise that the position of the engineers would be improved. He had looked into the question as well as he could; and he believed the expenditure of a sum of £4,000 a-year would be quite sufficient to secure the retention of the services of men who were invaluable. The other class of public servants who had been mentioned in the course of the debate—the assistant paymasters—also required the consideration of the Admiralty. The scheme of 1870 had broken down. Instead of being promoted after 10 years' service, as he suggested, the assistant paymasters were 16 or 17 years in the Service before they got their rank. These gentlemen had enormous responsibility—responsibility for large cash transactions. Their accuracy—and he was going to say their honesty, but that no one doubted—their accuracy and their rapid performance of their duties were of the greatest consequence to the House and the country; indeed, the Estimates would swell with great rapidity if these gentlemen were not of the highest character. He, therefore, urged upon his hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) to bring their case before the Board of Admiralty, and to see that officers whose duties were so necessary to the well-being of the Naval Service, and who had lost so much by the failure of the Order in Council of 1870, should be established in the position which that Order in Council suggested, and which the men had a right to expect.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he had no intention of speaking of the state of the Navy—that was not his province. He desired to refer to matters of which he had some knowledge. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had spoken very strongly in regard to the importance of having ships of war completed as early as possible; and during his speech the right hon. Gentleman, of course, argued that no ship of war could be completed unless the guns were laid in or on board. But the responsibility for providing all the naval armaments was laid on the War Office; and the cost thereof, fully £500,000 a-year, was included in the Army charges; and though several hon. Gentlemen had contended that the Admiralty should be entirely independent of the War Office, yet it was contrary to all experience to suppose that the Secretary of State for War should add largely to his outlay to meet the many changes in patterns of guns and equipments that had been made in the naval armament during the last 25 years. He could conceive nothing more objectionable than the system they had at the present moment. The War Office had naturally failed to provide guns for the Navy. He, therefore, earnestly entreated the Committee to use its influence to get rid of such a scandal. It was not to be expected that the Army should incur large and unlimited expenditure, so as to provide proper and fit guns for the Navy to meet the frequent changes proposed by Naval Officers. The Navy ought, no doubt, to be permitted to decide upon the pattern of the guns it required; but it should bear the cost of the armament if permitted to do so. It would be found that Woolwich Arsenal was quite capable of turning out the requisite guns; or, if dissatisfied, then let the Admiralty try to obtain supplies from private firms. Last year the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) asked whether the Navy might not go to Newcastle for its guns? By all means it ought to go to Newcastle if it could not get proper guns from Woolwich. The present system involved the bandying of words between two great Departments—the War Office and the Admiralty, and the result was the asserted inefficiency of the Navy. He could not conceive why it should be expected that the Army should add £1,000,000 to its Estimates every year in order to supply new kinds of guns to the sister Service. He had hoped to see a change this year. A transference of duty from the Army to the Navy had already taken place in regard to the carriages and mounting of guns by the Navy paying for their equipments out of funds estimated for in the Naval Estimates; and the result, he understood, had been most satisfactory. In like manner the cost of ship transports, kept up for the movement of troops, ought to be transferred from the Navy to the Army Estimates. Further, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster, when he was First Lord of the Admiralty, finding that the War Office was not supplying torpedoes in sufficient quantity, went into the market, and for two years a charge for these appeared in the Navy Estimates. He (Sir George Balfour) noticed that the War Office was about to supply the torpedoes again at the expense of the Army. Perhaps the Secretary to the Admiralty would explain the reason for the change. He had now earnestly to urge that the gallant Corps of Marines—and a more serviceable corps the country did not possess—should be more carefully looked after than it had hitherto been. In the matter of depôts, the Marines had an excellent system, well deserving of imitation by the Infantry of the Line, but were very badly off as respected establishment of officers and men, who were mainly borne on the strength of the Divisions instead of being supernumerary, and in sufficient numbers to meet all the demands for service, he was afraid that just now they were being overworked. They were now being called upon to do more than their fair share of service; they were being wearied by repeated calls for battalions for service which the Infantry of the Line ought to perform. Nothing was more likely to disgust the corps than to be required to go on service very often, and in large numbers, at a moment's notice, for unpleasant Stations such as Suakin. Sudden and extraordinary demands could be made occasionally; but when they were made with great frequency, the efficiency of the Corps upon which the demands were made was greatly impaired. He entreated his hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) to give his earnest attention to this subject; because when once soldiers were disorganized it was difficult to restore them to their proper condition.

MR. T. C. BRUCE said, that on a recent occasion he had an opportunity of expressing his views upon the general state of the Navy, and those views remained unchanged. He did not mean to repeat them; he only rose to endorse what had fallen from some hon. Gentlemen during the debate in reference to two classes of men in the Naval Service, and particularly with reference to the engineers. He did not think it had ever happened to him to be present at a debate on the Naval Estimates when the case of the engineers had not been raised; and he thought that alone showed there was something in the condition of the men that was not very satisfactory. The reason was not very far to seek. Not long ago a Committee of the Admiralty, presided over by the First Naval Lord, made certain recommendations with reference to the status of the engineers. The recommendations made were not at all in excess of the merits of the men, or of the important duties the engineers had to perform; but the recommendations had only been carried out piece-meal, and, indeed, a good many of them were unfulfilled. If the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) really wished to give satisfaction to the corps of engineers, he ought at once to endeavour to soften the heart of the Secretary to the Treasury, and to get him to grant to the men what was their due. He (Mr. Bruce) would not repeat what had been said by different hon. Gentlemen with respect to the assistant paymasters; but he was bound to say that the position of those officials was really one of great hardship. Surely the Admiralty were not going to leave a very respectable class of men in such a position that they had to complain of hardships committed on every side. He hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would devote his attention to the matter; and that he would be able so far to alter the scheme of 1870 as to carry out the intention with which that scheme was drawn up, and to place the assistant paymasters in a more satisfactory position than they now occupied.

ADMIRAL EGERTON wished to accentuate, if possible, what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) with regard to the length of time occupied in the construction of their ships of war. The Colossus, for instance, was not even yet ready for sea; but he thought that what the right hon. Gentleman had said in respect to the guns rather explained the difficulty, not only with regard to the Colossus, but all other ships. The great difficulty with regard to the guns was that the new ones were totally different to the old ones. They were different in length, and they required to have different platforms and various new arrangements affecting the whole plan of the ship. Such was the reason why the ships were not ready as soon as they ought to be. He quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay), who said they ought not to have two separate establishments for the construction of guns. It seemed to him quite unreasonable that there should be two gun factories, one for the Admiralty and one for the War Office. He was of opinion, however, that the Navy ought to have a little more control over the sort of weapons furnished to them. He remembered that when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) was in Office he (Admiral Egerton) asked whether the guns to be supplied to a certain ship were, first of all, to be tried by the naval authorities? He had reason to believe that the right hon. Gentleman was extremely anxious that the guns should be tried by the men who had to use them; but owing to some influence or other the guns were not so tried. When the guns came to be used they were at once condemned. He had no accusation to make against the Woolwich authorities; but he could not help thinking that there was some sort of influence at work which went against the construction of guns other than those which came from one or two favoured factories. He endorsed what had been said by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Bruce) with regard to the position of the naval engineers. For a long time past his impression had been that there ought not to be so many engineers on board ship, and that they ought to occupy a higher position than they now occupied. He thought a great portion of the duties now performed by engineers might be performed by a class of warrant officers. The overcrowding in ships of engineers, which was partly the reason why they did not occupy a higher position in the Service, might thus be prevented. A further opportunity would be offered of referring to some of these subjects; therefore, he would say no more.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he had a very few words to trouble the Committee with; but he should be glad to endorse what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Admiral who had just sat down, and from other hon. Members in the course of this discussion, with reference to the naval engineers. It was impossible to say too much of the great services these engineers were now rendering the Navy, and how essential they were to our Naval Forces. At the present time, they undoubtedly suffered considerable grievances in respect of both rank and pay. One great grievance which he had heard from them was a very just one. It was that the retired pay they received was only £130 a-year; whereas it was shown by an official Report that it should be £170. It was also complained that they were unable to count the full amount of their time until they had passed 11 years in senior rank. He would press upon his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty how necessary it was to satisfy the just demands of these officers. Not only should their position be improved for their own sakes, but by doing that the Government would attract many valuable men into the Service who were now deterred from entering it. Then there were questions with regard to rank and uniform which should be considered—questions which some people might laugh at; but which, at the same time, were of great importance to the officers, as a great deal of the comfort and happiness of their lives depended upon them. He would urge the Secretary to the Admiralty to take into consideration the necessity of improving, all round, the position of the Royal Naval Engineers; and he would also ask him to give attention to the complaints of the paymasters in regard to the 11 years' senior service. They were not allowed to count more than a certain time as full paymasters until they had passed 11 years as full paymasters. The promotion of the assistant paymasters was getting gradually slower, and something should be done to quicken it. As to the naval schoolmasters, he fancied they were on a less favourable footing than the Marine Forces. Many hon. Members had taken up this question with great interest at different times. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had, he believed, pressed this matter on the attention of the Government; and he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) trusted the Committee would receive some assurance that night that the claims of these persons would be favourably considered. He hoped that the hon. Member (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who always paid so much attention to everything pressed upon him with regard to the Service—in the administration of which he took such a distinguished part—would pay some attention to the remonstrances brought before him that night.

DR. CAMERON said, he also had a great number of schoolmasters and engineers in his constituency; but he did not wish to detain the Committee with claims for any amelioration of their position. What he wished to urge on the Government was the desirability of abstaining from incurring expense, and not the desirability of incurring increased expense. He wished to direct attention to the absurd use to which gunboats had been lately put in the Islands of Scotland—to their being employed in services which should be relegated to policemen and process-servers. The Committee might have heard of the Glendale crofters' case. It appeared that some of the crofters had allowed their cattle to graze on a certain hill. An action was raised against the crofters, and they were interdicted from allowing their cattle to graze there; but they broke that interdict—that was to say, they allowed their cattle to graze on the hill after they had been ordered not to do so. A civil officer was sent to serve summonses on these people for contempt of Court; he was mobbed; the police were afterwards sent, and there was some rioting. He should not have complained if the gunboats had been called on by the Civil authorities to suppress rioting; but they had not been. A gunboat had been sent down with a Commissioner on board to say that unless the persons who had broken the civil interdict were given up Heaven knows what would happen. The poor crofters believed they were to be bombarded; and under fear of Her Majesty's Navy they gave up the offenders—the crofters, who had allowed their cattle to stray on this particular hill, as they thought, to save the Island. The men walked off without even the escort of one of those over-worked Marines, of whom hon. Members had heard so much, to the nearest important town—namely, Greenock, and there they wanted to give themselves up to a policeman. But, as they had committed no crime, the policeman would not take them. The lawyer who had conducted the civil process, however, sent a messenger, who took them in charge, and brought them to gaol in Edinburgh; but the officials there said—"We cannot take you—you are not qualified;" and the result was that the messenger who had the care of them had to keep them for a week at an hotel, where they feasted more sumptuously than, according to their own statement, they had ever feasted before. If rumour spoke truly, they had to be replenished with whisky toddy to keep them from bolting until, at length, they were tried for the civil offence, contempt of Court. He protested against the employment of gunboats in such a service; and the case he had quoted was not altogether an exceptional one, for in the Report of the Commission on the Islands and Highlands of Scotland the hon. Member (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would find another case of this kind which arose out of some evictions. A threatening letter had been sent to the proprietor—a letter written in a schoolboy's hand—and a search was made amongst the copy-books in the school to see whose handwriting could be identified with the petty crime. The Sheriff of the county and the Procurator Fiscal—that was to say, the Public Prosecutor—and the Chief Constable went to the Island in a gunboat and there prosecuted their inquiries. Nothing came of it, and he only referred to the matter because of the employment of the gunboat. This was not the sort of work in which Her Majesty's vessels should be employed in the Islands and Highlands of Scotland—which should be a nursery for their seamen. It had been mentioned that a vessel had been sent to the Shetland Islands to pick up recruits; but he would put it to the Government whether, if they sent one ship to the Shetland Isles to pick up recruits, and another to the Orkneys with Sheriffs, Procurators Fiscal, and policemen, to prosecute such a paltry case, they would not be neutralizing the one with the other? It was unworthy of the Navy to have to do such dirty work, he might almost call it, as he had described; and if the hon. Member was asked for naval assistance of this kind in the future he hoped that the matter would be looked into, and that care would be taken that the importance of the inquiry about to be instituted, or the disturbance to be suppressed, was in some measure commensurate with the demand made upon the Service.

SIR MASSEY LOPES corroborated what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) as to the present unsatisfactory method of estimating the cost of ships which were built in our Dockyards. There was scarcely an armoured ship built in our Dockyards which did not cost, before she was completed, a sum enormously in excess of the original Estimate. After a ship was commenced in the Royal Dockyards improvements and alterations were continually being effected, so that the basis of calculation in the original Estimate was bound to be erroneous. He did not hesitate to say that the system of computing by tonnage was altogether worthless—he would almost say fictitious. He was glad to find they had the authority of the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) against the system. The hon. Member the Secretary to the Admiralty had, last year, expressed himself averse to the system; but had pointed out that, so far as the present Government were concerned, their proposals were honest, inasmuch as they adopted the same method of calculation as that which had been practised for some years, and as the same persons had for years been engaged in making the calculations. But if the system was a bad one, however much it might have been practised in the past, the Government were not justified in continuing it. The hon. Gentleman had given them to understand that he had adopted the principle—and they thought he was going to carry it out—of commencing a ship and finishing it as rapidly as possible. If that system were adopted they would have no difficulty in ascertaining the real value and cost of a ship. There was no reason why any ship, however large, should not be completed in our Dockyards in three years. This was done in our private years, where ships were built for the Admiralty by contract; and if the Board of Admiralty showed some disinclination to adopt the constant alterations projected by their officials, the same results might be attained. With regard to the Marines, he was sorry to hear from the hon. Gentleman, when he moved the Estimates, that the complement was not full. If one thing more than another could have bettered the position of the present Board of Admiralty, it would have been the reversal of the decision which they arrived at two years ago. They reduced the number of the Marines by 600 men and 35 officers, and by that means saved £25,000. It was quite true they gave that amount in increase of pay to both commissioned and non-commissioned officers; but it was quite unnecessary that the reduction should have been made in order to give that increase. Bearing in mind how much the Royal Marines had signalized themselves of late, it seemed to him that it would be a very fit and proper compliment if the Admiralty would reverse the decision they came to some years ago. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay) had made some allusion to a speech delivered the other night by the

First Sea Lord of the Admiralty at a public dinner. Well, there was another portion of that speech to which the attention of the Committee might be called—a portion very much to the purpose. He said—

“During the past year an important step has been, taken which I cannot pass over in silence. Our great Australian Colonies, in the vigour of their youth, desiring to maintain the same affection for and confidence in their parent, which they know full well their parent feels for them, are alive to the necessity of aiding in their own protection; and with this object the Colony of Victoria, already possessing an iron-clad ship of considerable power, has, during the past year, fitted out a small squadron of ships of war of the latest type, which are well built, well armed, well equipped, and well officered and manned, and has sent them out to Melbourne. The Colony of Victoria has intimated its desire of placing these ships at the disposal of the Admiralty; and, should the occasion arise, our officers will be proud to serve under the same flag, and to be associated with the Colonial Navy for the defence of the commerce and shores of the Colonies. I trust the day is not far distant when the Australian Colonies may unite their squadrons in one compact Service under one command for defensive purposes.”

If the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) could corroborate that statement it would be very satisfactory, not only to the Committee, but to everyone in the country. There was nothing like good feeling between the Mother Country and the Colonies—a feeling that in time of need, or when assistance was wanted, they would be willing to give it, the one to the other.

MR. JENKINS wished to draw attention to the training of the seamen in the Navy. It was said that the training of seamen and boys had been neglected, and he hoped to hear from the hon. Gentleman that such was not the case. It was as essential to the maintenance of the efficiency of the Navy that their seamen should be properly trained as was the construction of iron-clads. With regard to the construction of ships, no doubt the expense of construction in their own Dockyards was greater than in private yards, and a much longer time was occupied in completing a vessel. This, however, was not altogether an evil. Improvements were continually taking place, both in gunnery and naval construction, and were adopted from time to time whilst the ships were being built. In the case of private yards, however, specific contracts were entered into and were carried out, no matter what developments might be made in the art of shipbuilding before the vessel was completed. As to the personnel of the Navy, no doubt there were grievances in the various departments of the Service. The engineers were a class who considered themselves very much ill-used; but what he wanted to know was, whether the supply of these naval officers was equal to the demand? Could any better men be got than were to be found in the Navy to-day, even if the pay were increased? His own opinion was that the supply was quite equal to the demand. No doubt, however, there were grievances in this matter which ought to be considered. He was inclined to think that if the scale of pay of the assistant paymasters was altered it would tend to the efficiency of that part of the Naval Service.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, it must be admitted that the present was not a very encouraging atmosphere, or a very encouraging state of the Benches, for anyone to get up and discuss such—apparently in the opinion of Ministers, not one of whom was present—an uninteresting question as the maintenance of their naval supremacy and the protection of their coasts, Colonies, and commerce. He was sorry the matter was not of sufficient importance to induce a single Minister or Under Minister to be present on the occasion when he (Lord Henry Lennox) addressed the Committee on a subject of which even his worst enemy would admit he knew something.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that, by the favour of the hon. Member (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), he had got a House to listen to the observations he was about to address, not alone to the Committee, but to the country. On a former occasion, when the Estimates were brought forward at the small hours of the morning, when it was too late to go into details—and it must always be so under the new Rules of Procedure—he had stated that the Estimates were not only insufficient, but misleading. He should have been glad to have spared the Committee the trouble of hearing his remarks had it not been that he felt bound, after having made such a decided charge as that, to try to prove the truth of his words. He could only say that the more he had looked into the matter from that day to this the more was he convinced that the remarks he had made were justified. It was more pleasant to him to praise the Admiralty than to blame them—it was always more pleasant, because it was so rare that it was possible to do it. It had not happened more than once in the past four years. Now, however, he was bound to say how pleased he was that the Admiralty had been able to increase the pay of the lieutenants in the Navy. The increase had been given not one day too soon. He was glad, also, that the Government had seen their way to effecting an improvement in the position of Warrant officers; but he regretted that, in order to do it, they had reduced the number of those officers. The Committee knew very well that when an improvement was made in the position of the Marines the increased expense consequent thereupon was met by reducing the number of the force by 600. Now that there was this new departure on the part of the Admiralty, now that they seemed to be anxious to do justice and to meet the claims of every class of officer, he hoped that they would persevere in this course, and see their way to very much improving the position of the engineers. So far as he had been able to master their complaint—and he had had many documents sent to him with regard to it which he had read with the greatest attention—he thought it was unanswerable. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) had referred to another claim—namely, that of the assistant paymasters, to whom he had referred in terms which he (Lord Henry Lennox) had very much regretted to hear. Certainly, this class had every right to the consideration of the Admiralty. So far as he could make out, the block in promotion amongst the assistant paymasters was a sort of perennial, permanent complaint which the Admiralty could not escape from. Reference had been made to improvements which were going to be effected in connection with the nursing staff of the Navy. Last year, if the Estimates had come on at a reasonable hour at night, he had intended to ask the Admiralty if they purposed appointing some sort of a Committee to consider whether the Navy could not be placed in some respects in a similar position to the Army in regard to nurses? Why could they not have, in connection with the Navy, an establishment like that at Netley, where there was an admirable staff of nurses and under nurses, as he could testify from his own observation, having visited the place when the troops came back from Egypt after the battle of Tel-el-Kebir? Could they not establish in connection with the Navy something on the same lines as the Netley Hospital? When he went through the hospital used for the Navy he was received with the greatest courtesy by the authorities, Sir William Reed and Admiral Hoskins; but all he could make out from them was that when there was an unusual influx of sick and wounded into the hospital, the only means they had of meeting it was by sending out and gathering in, to act as nurses, the old Navy Pensioners, who had no more idea of what a bandage was than a man who had never been wounded, or had never been to sea. The medical staff were dreadfully annoyed, and were anxious to get someone to bring the case before Parliament. They could not meet the difficulties of the case unless they were supported by the Board of Admiralty, which, he was thankful to say, since that time they had been. His complaint against the Estimates, as he had said, was that they were insufficient and misleading. He would go further, and say that no Estimates that were brought into the House of Commons could be anything else but insufficient and misleading, unless they contained a settled programme—a settled line of naval policy to be carried out for the defence of the country. He saw no sign or symptom of that either in the present or in any other Estimate that had been submitted to Parliament for years past. The Estimates this year were, he must say, most carefully and cleverly arranged to make ends meet with the small sum of money dealt out to the Admiralty. Nowhere in the Estimates did he see any sign of a great naval policy, and still less did he see in any part a sign of their being adequate for maintaining the supremacy of England at sea, although the Admiralty might believe they were based on what was right for the welfare and security of the country. The Estimates were simply what the Admiralty could screw out of the Treasury by one means and another. That was the only justification for them; and he should be sorry to think that any Member of the Board of Admiralty would be a party to such Estimates unless he felt that what he wanted he could not get, and that it was not his fault that things were as they were. If the Committee would allow him to detain them he should like to go into that which was the real question to be considered—namely, the policy of the Admiralty for the year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had dilated, with his usual ability, on certain deficiencies in the tonnage; and, as an enlargement of that point, he (Lord Henry Lennox) wanted to know what the programme for the year was? What did the Admiralty propose to do in the way of ships and guns—which subject he would deal with later on—to defend the country in case of need, and in the event of a storm arising? As he understood the naval programme it was this. It was intended to construct 10,500 tons of iron-clad in the Royal Dockyards, and 2,114 tons by contract, making a total of 12,614 tons of iron-clad; and of unarmoured ships 5,555 tons in the Dockyards and 2,510 by contract. This would represent a very large sum. So far as he could make out, this represented wages in the Dockyards to the amount of £541,220 on the advancement of ships, and £309,750 for contract, labour, and materials. What were they going to get for this large amount of money? It was hoped that they would get two iron-clads—the Colossus, a first-class iron-clad, and the Impérieuse, a second-class iron-clad. When they talked about the Colossus not having been completed by the time they were told it would be completed, it was said that the delay was owing to difficulties respecting the conning tower and mode of loading guns. Last year they heard it said, in jubilant tones, that the breech-loading guns had actually been sent safely, and had been got on board the Colossus. But what was the use of these guns if there was no possibility of firing them—no means of lowering them to the necessary extent? The statement which had been made was, in fact, nothing more nor less than an attempt to blow over the state of things. Unless they could rapidly find an improved method of loading the guns, the Colossus would be no more completed this time next year than she was now. The other ships to be completed were two small protected ships, virtually second-class cruisers—namely, the Camperdown and the Anson. They, he thought, ought to have been a little nearer completion than they were at the present moment. They were only to be advanced to 34-100ths; and as this was the third year of the Estimates he thought they ought to have been brought a little nearer completion. The Collingwood was to be advanced 421 tons, bringing her near completion to 83-100ths. Several hon. Members that night, and especially the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed), had dwelt on the length of time the vessels were in hand before they were completed. He remembered that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster was First Lord of the Admiralty the hon. Member for Cardiff complained of one of the ships—namely, the now celebrated Inflexible, having been eight or nine years in course of construction, declaring that in consequence of the delay the country had had to pay a third more for the vessel than it had originally consented to pay. Another remarkable case was the Edinburgh. It was promised that she should be completed in 1883; but she was not even to be finished this year. She was to be advanced, 254 tons, to 73-100ths. Even if the proposed arrangements were carried out she could not be completed until 1885, instead of 1883 as promised. He should like to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty for an explanation as to the treatment of this ship beyond his statement. She was brought from Pembroke two years ago; but nothing had been done on her of any kind or sort from that time to this. He was told—and he believed it to be true—that even her turrets were not put in. He would like to know if any steps—and if any steps what—had been taken to provide proper armaments for the Navy? He was not at all clear that the line of policy adopted by the Admiralty was one which would be adopted in any private yard where prompt replies to the charges brought against them had to be made. The Committee were aware of the delay in the completion of the Colossus. He was afraid the Edinburgh and the Camperdown were being delayed, because if the guns were made they were not on board, and if they were on board they could not be fired. He hoped his fear was not well-grounded; because if it was in the case of one of those ships it must be equally true in the case of every one of that class which was to be similarly armed. He should be very happy, indeed, if the Secretary to the Admiralty could give him some little comfort about the Edinburgh, because the sum spent upon her was an enormous sum to lie idle in the Dockyard for years without some attempt to turn it to good account. The next point he had to touch upon was the same he felt it his duty to allude to on a previous occasion. He desired the Secretary to the Admiralty to tell the Committee that night when the gun-fittings would be completed, when the country would see the end of the controversy about guns. For years and years the authorities were unable to arrive at a settlement upon the question of the pattern of gun; then the House were told, with a flourish of trumpets, that the pattern was decided upon; then it was a long time before the pattern was completed; and then, when the guns were got on board, they could not be fired. The controversy concerning guns had been most painful and ignominious. If the guns could not be fired, the whole strength and utility of their fighting Fleet was paralyzed in the event of sudden war. They might as well not have built any ships at all if they had not got guns to put on board. There was another point to which he wished to advert, and it was one on which he was very much snubbed last year by the hon. Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance (Mr. Brand), who did not seem to take much interest in naval matters; for he had not been in his place at any time during the present debate. The hon. Gentleman took him very severely to task for having said something, and then not having been present to hear the answer. He had taken much trouble to go through the figures respecting the guns; and, of course, he entirely agreed with all that had been said as to the absurdity of one Department ordering stores for another Department, unless there be ample and full account taken of the stores. He saw from the Army Estimates that the total expenditure for the Navy in respect of guns in the last four years was £899,137. There was spent on guns in 1881-2, £137,799; in 1882-3, £322,109; in 1883-4, £249,997; and in 1884-5, £189,232. Upon gun carriages there was spent in the same years, £78,989, £117,327, £66,404, and £84,980 respectively. On machine guns there had been spent in the last two years, £14,701 and £15,843 respectively; the total for the various stores in the last four years being, in 1881-2, £433,715; in 1882-3, £690,715; in 1883-4, £528,176; and in 1884-5, £522,691. It was curious that these vast sums should be voted in the Army Estimates for the guns and stores of the Navy, and that it should be impossible to find any account of them. The Committee knew nothing of any value; they only knew what sums had been voted, but they did not know how they had been applied. There ought to be an Audit Account submitted to the House by the Comptroller and Auditor General, if hon. Members were to have anything like a clear and proper idea of what was going on. But the reverse was the result; hon. Members knew nothing. He would give an example of the plight in which hon. Members found themselves. The other day he moved for a Return—a very simple and innocent Return—of the iron and steel guns that had been supplied to the Navy by the War Office within a certain cycle of years. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, with his usual courtesy, allowed his secretary to write to him (Lord Henry Lennox) to tell him he might have the Return. When, however, he came down to the House, he was told that the Surveyor General of the Ordnance would not allow him to have the Return unless he would alter the wording of it by omitting the words “supplied to the Navy.” They might just as well attempt to play Hamlet with the part of the Prince of Denmark struck out. What he really wanted to know was, what guns were supplied to the Navy; and whether, if they were supplied, they were supplied in such a condition as to be of use? That was only one of many instances of the way the affairs of the country were administered. He believed it was his right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) who moved for a Return of the condition of the boilers. It was quite true the Secretary to the Admiralty stated that the boilers of the ships were never in so good a condition; but if they were in a good condition, why was information refused? One would have thought it would have been a pleasure to the Secretary to the Admiralty to have given the Return, and to have allowed the House to participate with him in the satisfaction he experienced on the subject. Complaint was made last year that they had not a sufficient number of iron-clads. Over and over again the Committee had been told there that the number of iron-clads was large enough, and that the Naval Service was quite able to maintain their supremacy at sea; and yet, shortly after the House of Commons broke up last autumn, another iron-clad was laid down, showing that the protestations of himself and Friends were perfectly right and valid, and that the Admiralty, in their protestations that no more iron-clads were required, were mistaken. There were some people who really believed that what was called the new ship proposed to be built this year was an iron-clad. There were scores of hon. Gentlemen in the House of Commons who believed that a ship could be called a ship which was only to be advanced 338 tons in the year. What did an advance of 338 tons in a year mean? He challenged the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey), or the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), to deny that 338 tons to be worked on an iron-clad meant nothing but one of those paper ships which the First Sea Lord of the Admiralty described at the banquet at the Royal Academy; it meant nothing but payment for the drawings and for the expenses preliminary to laying the ship down. He could not understand how any Board of Admiralty could seriously announce an iron-clad which was only to be advanced 338 tons in the year. It was only recently that the hon. Member for Hastings (Sir Thomas Brassey) descanted upon the strength of their Fleet abroad as well as at home, and he particularly referred to the Scorpion, Wivern, Viper, and Vizen, which, he said, were at Bermuda. He (Lord Henry Lennox) hoped Bermuda would never find itself confronted by a serious foe; if it did, and had only such vessels to rely upon, it had better retire at once. In addition to the new ship, it was intended to advance the Mersey

67-100ths, and the Severn 48-100ths, and to begin three new protected ships; but neither of the five was to be completed this year. One was only to be advanced 61 tons. It was to appear in the Estimates, and the country were to believe it was an addition to the Navy. He thought the time had come when the Admiralty should ask for the money they wanted, and not to offer paper or phantom ships. He could not help contrasting the present state of things with that which prevailed two or three years ago. The then Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan) came down to the House and promised, not one, but four new iron-clads. All they had got this year was one iron-clad laid down. There was a somewhat extraordinary circumstance about the Mersey and the Severn. Last year, he ventured to draw a comparison between the Iron-clad Navies of France and England. To his great surprise, as he mentioned at the time, he found included in the English iron-clads or armoured ships the Mersey and the Severn. He could not understand on what principle the Mersey and the Severn could be counted as armoured ships. The Estimates of this year, with remarkable naïveté, contained a note stating that these ships were no longer to be considered iron-clads. He could not help noting and being amused at the circumstance. He was very much surprised indeed to read the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty in regard to the protected ships. He had not the slightest doubt that the protected ships would be very useful vessels in their way, and do very good service; but they were not iron-clads; and he was perfectly startled when he read that the Secretary to the Admiralty had said that—

Did he suppose that the Mersey or the Severn would be a battle-ship of a match for any of the iron-clads of other Powers? Another subject had been touched upon in the course of the debate; and were it not that he really considered it of very great importance, he would not refer to it. It was the subject of what tonnage was, and what it was not. Last year, in the House of Commons and in The Times newspaper, he produced a statement showing the amount of tonnage that had been built, and the amount that was supposed to have been built; and he must do himself the honour to think that the Secretary to the Admiralty must have been impressed with what he stated, or he would not have made the observations he did. He did not make any charge against the Secretary to the Admiralty, or against anyone; but he could not refrain from remarking that there must be something radically wrong when so honourable and so straightforward a Minister as the Secretary to the Admiralty could come down to the House and tell hon. Members that he had not only carried out his pledge as to the building of iron-clads in the year, but he had exceeded the amount promised to be completed by 267 tons. In the face of the Estimates, it was extraordinary that such a statement could be made. As a matter of fact, he had made it out that, instead of their being an increase of iron-clad tonnage built over that which was promised to the amount of 267 tons, there was a deficiency of no less than 2,147 tons—1,249 tons in Dockyard, and 898 deficient on Bonbow, building by contract. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to explain this discrepancy, which, however, appeared from the Estimates themselves. There was one other matter to which he desired to allude; and he trusted that if he was wearying the Committee they would bear with him, as he did not often address them. He saw there was to be expended this year, on repairs and refits, £415,432; and the number of men to be told off for the work was to be 6,291. He noticed that, amongst the repairs at Chatham last year, the celebrated Polyphemus was to be fitted with new boilers; and for the purpose, in conjunction with the repairs of the Orontes, £18,000 was voted, and 250 men were told off. It was very curious that when he looked at the head “Portsmouth,” he found, this year, £61,631 and 892 men voted for “Emerald, Cormorant, and refit Shah, and complete new boilers for Polyphemus.” He did not suppose for one moment that the Polyphemus had new boilers at Chatham last year, and that this year they were to pay for new boilers for her at Portsmouth. That was another discrepancy to which he hoped the Secretary to the Admiralty would direct his attention.

Lord Henry Lennox

That was not all, because he saw that at Devonport, in 1883-4, the large sum of £129,726 was voted, and 2,016 men were told off, "to complete the repairs of the Bellerophon, Raleigh, and other ships;" and then he noticed that, this year, £130,773 was voted, and 2,036 men were told off, "to complete repairs of Raleigh and other ships, and to advance repairs of Bellerophon and other vessels." He would dearly like to know where the money which the House of Commons had voted had gone? The next question on which he had to touch—that of the Marines—was one in regard to which he had no grievance against the Admiralty, except it was that the number of men had been unnecessarily reduced. He agreed with all that had been said about the Marines. The Marines were a very willing Force; but he did not think it was wise always to push them forward wherever there was fighting. He was convinced the Marines did not object; but, still, they ought to be treated justly and reasonably. As to the personnel of the Navy, he saw, by a statement which he had taken some trouble to make out, it had been decreasing for the last five years, and it was now at a lower point than it had ever been. He did not want to sail under false colours, but to admit honestly that his attention was first drawn to the question of the personnel of the Navy by a speech of a gallant officer who was once a respected and esteemed Member of the House of Commons—namely, Lord Charles Beresford. In the last Parliament Lord Charles Beresford made a most interesting speech, in which he pointed out that the personnel of the Navy was utterly defective, and that often 50 per cent of the men in English ships were non-combatants. Talking of the ship which he (Lord Charles Beresford) commanded some years ago with so much ability and distinction, the Thunderer, Lord Charles said that when the boats were manned and went off there were only left on board the Quartermasters and some 15 Marines; that, he added, was a most alarming state of things, because the French had no non-combatants. He should like to ask his hon. Friend the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) whether he would endeavour to persuade the Admiralty to adopt some scheme which should secure that a larger number of the men on board their ships should be trained to arms? This was a subject which his hon. Friend would do well to consider and to bring before the Board, because what was possible in the French Navy must be possible in ours. He (Lord Henry Lennox) felt that he must say a few words more on the subject of the French Navy. He had no desire to enter into a comparison of the number and character of the ships in the French and English Navies—he had done that so often—but he had carefully studied the French Estimates; and he had found that the French were now spending more money on the personnel of their Navy than they had ever done before. The Return he had prepared showed that for 1885, for Service Marine, the French had voted 200,000,000 francs, as against 197,780,696 francs for 1884; for Artillery, under the head of Sources Extraordinaires, there was put down 8,700,000 francs; and there was an increase of 2,500,000 francs under the head of Invalides de la Marines. There was thus, this year, an absolute increase of 13,400,000 francs in the Vote for the French Navy. He would like also to be told what was the meaning of that most extraordinary Return of "Fighting and Sea-going Ships," which was issued contemporaneously with the Estimates? Included in the Return were the Northumberland, Minotaur, Agincourt, and Achilles, which, a previous Secretary of the Admiralty said, only very recently, were only useful as drill ships. How could any Board of Admiralty represent to the House of Commons those ships as fighting and sea-going vessels? The next lot comprised a series of venerable iron-clads—namely, the Warrior, Black Prince, Resistance, Lord Warden, Hector, Valiant, Defence, Repulse, and Penelope. To put these vessels down as a powerful element of the naval strength of the country was most misleading. Such ships could not be counted as fighting ships, and they were not sea-going. They had light armament of a very obsolete kind, and they had no speed at all. He would not go further on the point, except to say that last year the Secretary to the Admiralty said that the progress of the Board of Admiralty was neither startling nor ambitious. Had he said otherwise, he would have been the first Secretary who ever charged the Admiralty with having a startling and ambitious programme. The hon. Gentleman, last year, made a comparison of the relative merits of the English and French Navies, and had gone back for his purpose as far as 1867; but in doing so he had not given the name of any ships, nor their tonnage, speed, or armament. Nevertheless, he triumphantly stated that their ships were superior to the French. But it turned out, with regard to three years of his comparison, that he was comparing the ships of the English Navy with old wooden French ships which had no existence at all. He wished to help the Admiralty in their endeavour to persuade the Treasury to give them a little more money to maintain the safety of their Colonies and commerce and the supremacy of the country at sea; and it was for that purpose he had risen, under rather depressing circumstances, to address the Committee.

MR. GORST said, he was certain that the Members of the Government must have been struck with the fact that the burden of every speech delivered that evening on either side of the House was virtually this—"Why do you not spend more money on the Navy?" But, unfortunately, there had been no one present to whom the question could be addressed; and he was himself almost afraid that in making these observations he should come within the Prime Minister's definition of Obstruction, which the right hon. Gentleman said consisted in making a speech without attempting to persuade any one. Had he, however, the eloquence of Demosthenes there was no one on the Treasury Bench whom he could address or attempt to persuade. They were discussing the naval policy of Her Majesty's Government, and there were two Members of the Government before them who had no share in directing that policy. Now, if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty were, as he ought to have been, First Lord, the Committee could address their speeches to him with some effect; but, unfortunately, the Government had placed at the head of this great spending Department of State a Peer, who dwelt in the serene atmosphere of "another place," without fear of criticism and without fear of being asked the question—"Why do you not spend more money on the Navy?" What had become of the other Members of the Government?

Lord Henry Lennox

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was absent, and he observed that the right hon. Gentleman always carefully avoided these naval debates; doubtless because he feared an attack upon the financial policy of the Government. All they could do, then, was very little—they could force upon the Government, or rather upon the two Members of it who were present, the fact that the country was dissatisfied with that portion of the Expenditure which the Government devoted to the Navy of the country; and it was a notorious fact that the Admiralty shared that dissatisfaction. The Secretary to the Admiralty came down to the House, and was obliged to make the best defence he could of the Government with the materials at his disposal; and the noble Lord who had just spoken had given them a specimen of the shifts to which the Admiralty were put in order to make out the number of the paper fleet which they presented to the people. But they would not say that the expenditure on the Navy was satisfactory. Well, they had not got the Chancellor of the Exchequer to address; but he would like the Secretary to the Admiralty to tell the Committee on what ground the Government justified this inadequate expenditure on the defence of the country? In the accounts of their Expenditure, the cost of the Navy was treated in an unusual way. If the accounts were those of a commercial Company, instead of a great nation, all this expenditure on ships and material would be charged to capital; but being a great nation they put them down to Revenue. The expenditure on the Navy was nothing else than an investment of the property of the country for the purpose of defending its wealth and Possessions, and it ought to appear as such in the accounts. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was, no doubt, a great economist; and if he should address the Committee on this Vote he would, no doubt, accuse him of extravagance, and say that it was because he represented a Dockyard constituency that he was always in favour of spending money on the Navy. But was the course pursued by the Government really an economical one? They were actually leaving the defences of the country in an unsatisfactory condition; and it could not be because they had no money, for they were spending

£7,000,000 every year in the reduction of the National Debt. If the Admiralty could induce the country to believe that the Navy was kept up to an efficient strength; that there was really nothing in the criticisms addressed to them upon the subject by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), and other Gentlemen on that side of the House, all experienced in affairs of the Navy—if they could show that those criticisms were but the views of alarmists, and that they had expended all the money that was proper to be spent on the defences of the country, well and good; but if not, then he said that some Member of the Government should defend its position in this matter, and point out why so much money was spent in the manner he had alluded to, while the Navy itself was being starved. He did not wish to go into details, further than to say that the grievances of the engineers, naval schoolmasters, artificers, and others, were all due to the same cause—that the Admiralty had not enough money, and was obliged to resort to shifts in order to keep down the expenditure to the lowest point. All those cases had been presented to the Committee in the course of the evening. The discussion on the Navy Estimates differed entirely from those which took place on the other Estimates; no one ever dreamt of refraining from criticizing naval expenditure; on the contrary, Member after Member of the Committee rose to say the same thing, and to ask why so little money was spent, and why the Service was not made efficient. He thought at least that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might favour the Committee with his presence, in order that he might defend the policy of the Government, which was thus attacked. He might further observe that, although a great part of the criticisms of the evening had been upon the question of Ordnance, and the delay in the arming of those vessels which had been built, there had been no one present in the House to represent the War Office and answer the questions which had been put on those subjects. As might have been expected, an attempt had been made about an hour before to count out the Committee. At that time there were, he believed, but four Members present; and one speaker remarked that little interest was taken in the Navy Estimates. Of course, they could take no interest in them under the circumstances; and he therefore protested, and should continue to protest, against there being no responsible Minister of the Crown present to defend the policy of the Government against the charge of having reduced the Navy Estimates to a point below that which the country believed to be necessary.

MR. RYLANDS said, his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gorst) could scarcely have been in his place at the commencement of the discussion, or he would have heard the important speeches delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) and by his hon. Friend near him (Sir Edward J. Reed). [Mr. Gorst: I heard them both.] Then his hon. and learned Friend, who generally displayed wonderful acuteness, seemed to be under some obfuscation of intellect, because he understood his hon. and learned Friend to say that Members had been complaining that so little money was spent; whereas they had asserted that while they voted a large sum of money for naval purposes every year they did not get the return for that money which they had a right to expect, but although they spent £11,500,000 a-year for naval purposes, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham, like the daughter of the horse-leech, cried "More, more!" He (Mr. Rylands) contended that more money was spent than ought to be spent, and that the country had no sufficient result to show for it. He entirely agreed with the speakers in the early part of the discussion who said that it was most unfortunate that, in regard to the question of naval expenditure, it was so difficult to get the ear of the House or the attention of the public. One set of political officials succeeded another at the Admiralty; and although they were in power they were the mere mouthpieces of the permanent officials. Instead of dealing with this great question as a matter of business, and in the interest of the public, they allowed the permanent officials to influence them, with the view of keeping up the old traditions of Admiralty administration. He was delighted to hear the allusion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster to the manner in which the Admiralty accounts were presented to the House. He thought the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly fair, and that it was delivered in the best possible spirit, because he admitted that the present mode of making up the accounts was one which had the sanction of former Administrations; but the fact was, the Members of the House of Commons were hoodwinked in respect of the amount of expenditure. They had been led to believe that the cost per ton of iron ships built in the Dockyards was very much less than what it actually was. But what did the right hon. Gentleman say? He said that he had received information, from a private shipbuilder of great respectability, that the cost of labour on iron vessels built by him was only about one-half the cost of labour expended on vessels built by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman made a most true remark in regard to that, although he rather tried to lessen the effect of the statement—namely, that Dockyard work was necessarily dearer than private work.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I said it was dearer, but, in my judgment, not necessarily so.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was glad to hear the correction of the right hon. Gentleman; he understood that, as a matter of fact, Dockyard work was dearer, though not necessarily so, than private work, and he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman. The Dockyard work was, however, so dear that if any private shipbuilder carried on his business in the way the Dockyard business was done, he would very soon be in The Gazette, even if he had the Bank of England to back him. He said that the dearness of the work of the Admiralty was patent to everyone. Again, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was full of wisdom and good judgment; and he entirely agreed with him in pointing out that it would be far better if the Admiralty were to decide upon the plan or type of a vessel and at once proceed to build it, because if that were done they would keep more abreast of the discoveries of the age than they did under the present system, the effect of which was that while they were deciding upon the type of a vessel the whole stream of discovery changed its course, and after, perhaps, seven years the ship, when completed, was found to be obsolete. His hon. Friend near him (Sir Edward

J. Reed) made a statement which, coming from him, was of the greatest possible importance—namely, that from his experience he did not believe that the ships built by private contract were in any way inferior to those built in Her Majesty's Dockyards. What did that teach them? Looking at the fact, not as the Representative of a Dockyard constituency, as was his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), but as a business man accustomed to manufacturing operations, he (Mr. Rylands) had no hesitation in saying that by going into the open market, after deciding upon the kind of ship required, the Admiralty would get a ship constructed and delivered in a stated time and at a less cost, from a private shipbuilding yard, than they were paying now. If that system were adopted, they would be able to cut down the Naval Estimates, and the country would get in return for its money a much larger number of vessels of war. Now, he was only repeating the language used by Mr. Cobden 20 years ago in that House, when he pointed out that the cost of the Shipbuilding Department of the Navy had increased in every ramification. It had gone on increasing ever since that time; and if the Committee would analyze the accounts before them they would see that for every pound expended in wages they paid 5s. more for superannuation charges. The police charges and establishment charges alone were something incredible; and he asked whether any man in his senses could imagine that an establishment so conducted could be carried on at a profit, if in addition to all this the management of the shipbuilding department was in the hands of a gentleman who knew nothing practically of shipbuilding establishments? It was not because a man was an Admiral that he understood manufacturing operations; nevertheless, such gentlemen were put into the Dockyards to preside over shipbuilding arrangements; and after three years or so, having done as much mischief as possible, they were withdrawn to make room for others. The whole practice appeared to him to be contrary to those common-sense principles which ought to guide the administration of the affairs of the country. Therefore, he hoped that an end would be put to a system under which the construction of a vessel, planned and laid down by some officials years before, went dragging slowly on until, after the lapse of seven or eight years, caused by interference with the process by persons who considered themselves to be more ingenious than their predecessors, a vessel was produced that, after all, was open to objection. His hon. Friend near him had said, with perfect truth, that the country had spent during the last four or five years many millions of money which were not represented by anything that could be brought to bear in the event of war, and that this vast absorption of capital was in unfinished ships, which at the present moment could not be brought into play, and which for every month they were delayed ran an increased risk of having to be written off as obsolete when they were completed. For these reasons, he thought the Committee, not in a parsimonious, but in an intelligent and business-like spirit, should criticize strongly the unbusiness-like and wasteful manner in which the millions voted year by year for naval purposes were expended without that return which they, as Representatives of the taxpayers of the country, had a right to demand from Her Majesty's Government.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, the policy of the Admiralty was, in fact, the policy of the Prime Minister, the Secretary to the Treasury, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, without whose consent the Admiralty could do nothing. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had, he thought, slightly misrepresented the right hon. Member for Westminster. That right hon. Gentleman had made some criticisms on the forms in which the accounts of the Admiralty were presented in the Estimates, and had conclusively shown that they were deficient in some respects; but he ventured to think that the hon. Member for Burnley had gone too far in attributing to the right hon. Gentleman the statement that the money provided in this Estimate would be sufficient for the purposes of the Navy. His own opinion was that, although a certain saving might be effected by a better form of accounting, the amount was insufficient; and he ventured to think the Committee would agree with him when he said that if the Admiralty were to ask for a considerably larger sum of money for Navy purposes they would be supported by the House and the country. He did not wish to make a long speech on this occasion; but there were one or two points upon which he should like to ask for some information from the Surveyor General of the Ordnance. The Committee had heard a good deal, in the course of this debate, about the guns for the Colossus and the Edinburgh; and he should like to know exactly how that matter stood, if the information could be given to the public? He thought that not only the House of Commons, but the country generally, had ground to complain of the very great delays that had occurred in the Ordnance Department in supplying guns to the Navy. He ventured to say that that Department was too much under the influence of Elswick and Woolwich, and he thought the Department ought to get inspiration from other quarters. There was a great foreign gunmaker—Krupp; and there was a great English gunmaker—Whitworth; but the House never heard of any trials and results either on the Continent or at home, though he believed there had recently been some very important trials of Whitworth guns of large calibre. He did not know whether the Ordnance Department knew anything of them; but if they did not they ought. He should like to know specifically what was the cause of the delay in regard to the guns of the Colossus and the Edinburgh? In the course of this debate complaints—and very legitimate complaints—had been made of the delays with respect to the completion of ships laid down in Her Majesty's Dockyards. The causes of these complaints had been very specifically stated. There was no doubt that, to a great extent, these delays in the completion of Her Majesty's ships were caused by some conflict of opinion between the different Departments of the Admiralty. These guns had to be considered minutely; and, as he had said before, the great object of the Admiralty was to obtain absolute perfection—and a very legitimate object that was; but in order to obtain complete perfection they had very frequently to encounter serious delays. But there was another cause of the delays complained of in the completion of Her Majesty's ships, and that lay with the House of Commons itself. The ship that had been delayed the longest time, he believed, was the Inflexible. He would not now go into the old story of the Inflexible; but he thought those who were Members of the last Parliament would agree with him in saying that the real cause of the delay in the completion of that ship was the action of the House of Commons; and the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) legitimately had a great deal to say upon that. The Inflexible took seven or eight years to complete; but he did not think the result could be complained of, for he believed the Inflexible, as she now stood, with her 80-ton guns, was superior to either of the two great Italian ships. She was stronger than they were in many respects, and was a highly creditable addition to Her Majesty's Navy. He hoped the ships that were to succeed her, of similar calibre, but differently armed, would be as admirable ships as she was. He did not say that any ships could be perfect; but the Inflexible had, on the whole, been a great success. The noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) had complained that the Admiralty had no general policy. Well, the noble Lord had himself belonged to the Administration of the Admiralty, and knew a good deal of what went on in the arcana of that Body. He ventured to differ from the noble Lord—and he spoke not of one Admiralty, but of successive Admiralties—in saying that they had no policy; for he thought all Admiralties had a policy. He would not, however, say that that policy was not interfered with in detail by the Treasury; but he wished it was not so interfered with. No Admiralty could completely carry out the policy it professed; but, still, he did not agree with his noble Friend in thinking that the Admiralty had no policy. The fact was, every Admiralty must have a general policy, not only in shipbuilding, but must have an idea of what was required for the defences of the country. To his mind, a complete policy of the Admiralty involved not only the building of ships, but a complete policy, such as, say, General Moltke had in the invasion of France by Prussia in 1870. Every Admiralty must have in mind a general scheme of defence not only for the commerce of the country, but for the shores of this country. In fact, every Admiralty, that was worth anything as an Admiralty, ought to have every point of naval policy perpetually in mind; and he ventured to say that the Admiralty presided over by Lord Northbrook, and represented in this House by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), had all these points in mind; but, although they might have a perfect policy in mind, it was impossible to carry that policy out without the consent of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister. He was happy to see that night that, instead of only about five Members, there were at least 50 present; and he hoped the House would continue to take more interest in the affairs of the Navy, and a more intelligent interest in the Navy than it appeared to have done in times past; and that the Admiralty, when they attempted to increase the shipbuilding of the nation, would be backed up not only by public opinion out-of-doors, but by the House of Commons generally. He believed there was no nation in the world that took greater interest in the affairs of its Navy than did the people of Great Britain; but, still, so far as the House of Commons was concerned, that interest had not been shown very minutely by the Representatives of the nation. He hoped that in the future the state of things would be considerably improved, and that the House of Commons would support the Admiralty in all the attempts they made to force the janitors of the Treasury, in order to obtain such a Navy as they ought to have to ensure the defence of the country.

Mr. DAWSON said, the absence of a more responsible Ministry than those who now occupied the Treasury Bench had been already referred to; but for his purpose the able exponent of the Admiralty now present would be sufficient. He wished, first of all, to call attention to a matter which struck a layman—namely, the grievances of the paymasters. He conceived that the hon. Gentleman would allow that the prospect these officers had of getting promotion was getting longer and longer away; and that, through no fault of their own, it was quite possible that the period when they might expect promotion might be extended even to 1889-90. And while the term of promotion was postponed, when they got the promotion, or the advantage of their long service, that advantage would be proportionately decreased. If they had only 10 years and 11 months, and so did not reach 11 years, they would only get six years' junior service; whereas, if they had passed that time by even one day, they would at once jump into full service of 15 years. He could not see, upon any logical, or actuarial, or just ground, why that extraordinary state of things should exist, or, being in existence, should be allowed to continue. The hon. Member had himself referred to the unjust position in which those men stood. Like the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), he looked at these matters as a business man; and it seemed to him that this was a cheese-paring policy, while the Admiralty were spending money in providing guns that would not go off. Apart from that subject, he wished to say that he thoroughly agreed with the hon. Member for Burnley as to Government Establishments, and the extravagant manner in which they did their work, compared with private builders upon open contract. In the matter of Army Clothing he had moved for the Returns, which were not yet presented; and when they were presented he should be able to prove that the cost of the work done by the favoured Government factories was greatly in excess of the work done by open contract. It appeared, from the debate that night, and from the speech of the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), that the cost of the work done by the Government factories was unnecessarily great. The whole issue of this debate appeared, therefore, to be that the matters upon which saving could be made were the very matters upon which the Government were most lavish and profuse. In regard to ships, they ought to spend money judiciously; and in the matter of the paymasters, they ought to be generous and just; but they were cheese-paring in the extreme, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would give a satisfactory answer upon the points to which he had ventured to draw attention.

SIR JOHN JENKINS said, he could not quite fall in with the whole of the remarks that had been made as to lavish expenditure in all the Dockyards. Last year he was several days at Pembroke Dockyard, of which the gentleman in command had spent a great deal of his life in the Naval Service; and he was glad to be able to bear testimony to the efficient manner in which that Yard was conducted. Naval gentlemen, from their long training, undoubtedly knew exactly what was necessary for the Service; and as to the practical departments under their charge they were able to select men who had the necessary technical knowledge. He could certainly testify that as regards Pembroke Dockyard the men were all practical men, and did their work in an efficient manner. He rose more particularly to express his disappointment that no provision was proposed for improving the position of that very important branch of the Navy, the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers. This question had cropped up year after year; and he thought that if this Service received more encouragement from the Government, a large amount of money would eventually be saved to the country. There was a good class of men enrolled in that Service, who would be able to render valuable aid in the defence of the country in an emergency. They had a large number of gunboats lying idle at two or three ports, which might be most usefully employed and turned to profitable account by being used at the various ports round the Island, not only for the protection of those ports, but for the training of men for the Naval Service. He hoped the Admiralty, in their next Estimates, would make some provision for a capitation grant for the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers. Many appeals had been made to the Admiralty in that direction; but, so far, those appeals had been made in vain. He sincerely hoped the Admiralty would do something in the coming year to give encouragement to this important branch of the Navy.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I wish, in the first place, to revert to the very important and instructive speech which my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) made at an early period in this discussion. It has been alluded to by several hon. Members who have spoken during this debate; and there has been a substantial general agreement in the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman. There were two points to which he specially alluded. In the first place, he referred to the great waste, both of time and money, which was involved in alterations from the original designs of ships, and to the desirability generally of proceeding as quickly as possible to the completion of any ships which have been taken in hand. With regard to that principle, I believe the right hon. Gentleman was preaching entirely to the converted, when he addressed his observations to my hon. Friend the Civil Lord of the Admiralty and myself. We entirely agree with him; and I am sure I am speaking for the First Lord of the Admiralty and other Members of the Board when I say that they altogether agree with him that that is a most important principle. As I remember, the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) pointed out two years ago, with great clearness, any delay in the completion of a ship involves the loss to the nation of the use of the capital which has been expended upon the ship; and that is a consideration which ought to induce us to hasten the completion of a ship as much as possible. But, besides that, there is no doubt that if we go on changing and departing from the original design we ultimately produce a ship of which the main design may be obsolete, or somewhat out of date, and which is not so effective an instrument of war as if it had been taken in hand and finished at once. Well, having made that statement—I will not say that admission—of what I believe to be a cardinal principal in the matter, I must, at the same time, ask the Committee to remember that there is something to be said on the other side. In the first place, I said, when introducing the Estimates, that it was impossible for us—it would be folly in us—to shut the door upon improvements; and in these days improvements do not take place through the caprice or fanciful inventions of constructors. If we were to leave it to our Naval Constructors, I believe they would be more anxious to adhere to the original designs than anyone else. The Committee must remember that we live in changing times, in times of inventions, every one of which affects shipbuilding. We live in times of inventions with regard to armament, to guns and their carriages; to torpedoes, and the machinery connected with the ejection of torpedoes; to machine guns and quick-firing guns, and to their fittings, and mountings, and racers; besides, hydraulic and electric machinery. These, and some other things which I might mention, account for nearly all the delays which are complained of. A great deal has been said, and will be said, as to the delays in respect to guns; and I may have something to say with respect to detailed points later on. I cannot too strongly impress it on the Committee, as I have before had occasion to state, that the delay with regard to the guns has not been in regard to their manufacture. The delay has been with respect to fixing and settling the types and details of the guns. When the present Government came into Office, we found the country in this position—other countries had gone ahead of us, and it was necessary for us to enter upon a great wholesale change of armament, that change being necessitated not by any peculiar advantage of breech-loading, but by the use of slow-burning powder, which involved an enormously long tube in the gun; and when you have the great length of tube which that implies you must load at the breech. There were many grounds for hesitation, because we all know what delay is involved in the appointment of a Committee on such a subject; but the question was so large, and the amount of expenditure was so great, that the Government thought they would not be justified in proceeding without securing the very best advice that could be obtained, and they appointed an Ordnance Committee consisting of naval and military officers, and certain civilians and engineers possessing great knowledge of the metals employed in the construction of guns. Of course, a Committee like that having been appointed, it proceeds steadily with its investigation, and for a long time no apparent progress whatever is made. We have now passed through those years when there was nothing but delay and disappointment, and, apparently, alteration of opinion; but I was glad to be able to say, when I introduced the Estimates, that during this last year a very great stride has been made, and we at length see daylight at the end of this long investigation. I am told that the most important points are settled; and although there will still, no doubt, be considerable hindrances with regard to many of the smaller details, I believe I may say substantially that there will be no hindrances on any such scale as there have been hitherto. This, I think, constitutes a satisfactory position of the question, because now my hon. Friend at the head of the Ordnance Department enters upon the duty of constructing the new guns with a knowledge and confidence which he could not have possessed by any other means; and we may hope that we have avoided the danger we should otherwise have incurred of rashly entering on the re-armament of the Navy after a hastily-considered plan, and then, after a few years, finding that we were all wrong, and must incur all the expense over again. There have been difficulties not only with regard to the form and design of the guns, but with regard to the material to be used. That is one of the great causes of delay; and the other considerations I have named are all factors which tend to the same result—the development of torpedo warfare, and the greater use of electricity and hydraulic machinery. But if the object of what hon. Members have urged is to impress upon us and our Colleagues the necessity of completing ships as quickly as possible, and altering the original design as little as possible, I can assure them that every word that has been said is entirely concurred in by us. The other point to which my right hon. Friend alluded was the notable, and now becoming rather threadworn, question of tonnage. I take some credit to myself for honesty in this matter, at all events, because I was almost the first that had the courage to attempt an explanation of this thorny subject; and I from the first stated what I now repeat—that my own personal opinion is not in favour of this system of computation. I admit all that has been said upon it. The unit varies, and whatever the value of the unit may be the multiple varies also; but what are you to do? The same thing happens if you do not talk of tons at all, but talk of so many hundred parts of a ship; and I find, on looking at the Estimates of other countries where they use this other mode of computation, that when they had nominally built a ship, perhaps up to 99-100ths, there is still something to be built, and in the end they build more than a whole ship. That is precisely what we do with our tons; but the advantage of this system of computing by tons is that it has always been followed for many years past, and it affords a means of comparing the work of one year with the work of another year. In fact, I may candidly say that my noble Friend at the head of the Admiralty and myself, being rather impressed by the doubtful quality of this unit, thought that in the expense accounts for this year we had better show an amended table, going back and making the necessary corrections in the previous years, because it would not do merely to deduct what was necessary for last year. You must also take into account the error which had accrued relating to the year before, and so on. We proceeded thus until we came to the years of the Administration of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster; and then the question was, whether we should tamper with his figures, or should stop there? If we stopped there, it would be misleading to the House, and not very fair to ourselves. If we went back on these figures, where were we to stop? Again, probably the whole thing would have been misunderstood; and we came to the conclusion that it was better to leave things as they were. To say it is a misleading statement is not accurate, for it does give a fair mode of comparing one year with another, and it does not mislead those of us who are acquainted with the manner in which the figures are dealt with. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) spoke of the fallacious mode in which the accounts of the Admiralty were made up; but this does not affect the accounts at all; it is a mere question of stating in the Estimates the progress made. After all, the real test of what is done is the number of ships that are completed. That is the only thing we can fall back upon; but seeing that in one year you may not complete any ships, and in the next you may complete three or four, you want some mode of comparing the actual work done with the work intended.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I referred to the question of the completion of ships.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A ship ought not to be called complete until it is, at all events, capable of being in a very short time made perfectly ready for sea; but, unfortunately, there comes in the other element of which I have been speaking in the early part of my observations—that is, that at the last moment there are some little fittings, connected, for instance, with machine guns, which require to be done, which cost a great deal of money, and which prolong the detention of the ship in the Dockyard, and yet the ship may be, for all practical purposes, called complete. With regard to the tonnage, my right hon. Friend alluded to two parts of the Estimates. He will forgive me if I am not able to answer all that he said, because it is very difficult to follow figures quoted in debate. Although he alluded to them the last time we debated these questions, I did not follow, as closely as, perhaps, I ought to have done, what he said. There is this point, however, to be borne in mind—that in the one case the figures relating to last year are the number of tons estimated as building during that year, and in the other case the figures are the number of tons that have been built altogether on the ships then under construction. Some of the ships have been completed in the meantime. However, I will look into the matter closely, because I am not really certain as to how it stands. The noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) alluded to a considerable discrepancy in the amount of tonnage, and he has been good enough to give me the figures he quoted. I will promise him that I will have the matter looked into, and let him know what I find. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) addressed a few remarks to the Committee, to which I listened with great pleasure, as everyone must have done, seeing that he always puts his case in a decided, as well as a fresh and easy, manner. He made a complaint—with which, I must say, I entirely sympathize—in regard to the First Lord of the Admiralty not being in this House. He has made the complaint often before; and although as I say, I sympathize with him, still it is not an altogether unmixed evil that we have the First Lord of the Admiralty in the other House. My hon. and learned Friend himself made a great point of the fact that almost every Member who had spoken had urged upon the Department increased expenditure. Well, we have not had a great many speakers to-night; but of those we have listened to, no fewer than five are Representatives of Dockyard constituencies. I do not blame the hon. and learned Gentleman and his brethren who occupy that distinguished position, for urging the claims of all classes of Dockyard employés who form their constituents, or in whom their constituents take an interest. I find the claims of these people are always reasonably and temperately put forward in this Committee, and I hope I am always ready to listen to what is said; but, still, I say it is obvious that the fact of these hon. Members representing Dockyard constituencies accounts for many of the demands made every year for more money in connection with the Navy Estimates. I observe this of the class of Members to which my hon. and learned Friend belongs—namely, that if one of them speaks they all must speak, as it would not do, I presume, for one of those champions of that part of the community to appear more energetic than another. I therefore see some advantage in the absence of the First Lord from this House. I am really glad that before it reaches my noble Friend at the head of the Department, the force of the stream of demand is somewhat abated by its having passed through me. I may, however, assure my hon. and learned Friend that, as far as I am concerned, I will do all in my power to bring before my Colleagues all the cases that he has put before us. My hon. and learned Friend thinks we ought to spend more money, and declares that we ought to be able to justify our inadequate expenditure on the Navy, taking for granted that we admit that expenditure to be inadequate. But I do not admit anything of the kind. I do not admit that there is any discrepancy between the views of the First Lord of the Admiralty and of the Treasury. The First Lord of the Admiralty is a Member of the Cabinet; and the Cabinet, as my hon. and learned Friend knows, is bound to have not only some regard to the various classes in the employment of the Admiralty and the interests of the Service generally, but also the interests of the people. They are bound, for the sake of the public, to exercise all the economy they can, consistently with properly conducting the Service of the country; and they are certainly of opinion that what the Admiralty asks for this year is sufficient to meet that object. I believe that the Estimates are quite sufficient to maintain the Navy in such a position as that it shall be able to discharge its duties thoroughly. We hear very extraordinary statements on this subject; and I have been much astonished at a remarkable statement recently made as to the relative position of the Navies of this country and France. Some Members of the Committee may have seen it, and it has been directly alluded to to-night by more than one hon. Member. The statement to which I refer is very misleading; in fact, it is entirely wrong, and in so serious a document shows such carelessness in its compilation that it is highly desirable I should avail myself of this opportunity of pointing out where it is inaccurate. I am speaking, of course, of the letter, or pamphlet—I am not sure which—which was recently put forward by Admiral Sir Thomas Symonds. Sir Thomas Symonds is a most distinguished officer, of whom I will not speak with anything but the highest respect. He is, no doubt, animated by the very best of motives, and thoroughly believes that the Navy is insufficient; and he is obviously anxious to arouse the opinion of the country. Well, I think, though I have always taken the line of declining to enter upon any comparison between the Navies of this country and our great Neighbour—as I believe it to be entirely opposed to the public interest—though, I say, I have always consistently taken that line, yet, when a statement of this sort is made, and so publicly cast at the head of the Government, and held out to the public as a ground upon which they should demand a large public expenditure for the Naval Service, I think it is right that I should state how erroneous it is. I will do so in a very few words. Sir Thomas Symonds, in his estimate—I might point out other errors, but the one I will indicate is so glaring that I think I may say, Ex pede Herculem—gives a comparative statement of the Navy Estimates of England for the present year, and the French Projet de Loi for 1885. He shows, or professes to show, that the French vote £906,905 more per annum than we do in building 15 new armour-clad ships to our 12.

SIR JOHN HAY: My hon. Friend will allow me to say that the statement has been amended, and that I have seen a letter from the Admiralty acknowledging the receipt of the amendment.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: An official amendment?

SIR JOHN HAY: Yes.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I was not aware of it; but, at any rate, the statement has been officially made to the Admiralty.

SIR JOHN HAY: There certainly has been.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I was not aware of it; but, at any rate, it is right, as there are hundreds and thousands in the country who have read the statement, and have not seen the correction, that I should take this public opportunity of correcting the mistake. I say the statement was that this year the French are spending £906,905 on their armour-clad Navy more than we are. How does the gallant Admiral arrive at this sum? I will begin with the smaller items first. In the first place, he leaves out altogether our proposed expenditure on a new vessel of £12,744. Then he leaves out a sum of £160,000, which we take under these Estimates to spend on the Benbow, which is to be built by contract. He takes a detailed estimate in his French calculation for labour and materials; but in the English estimate he calculates labour only. This, in itself, makes a deficiency of about £500,000. And then, lastly, having taken all the figures from the French Estimates out of the résumé, or summary, of the ships to be built, he proceeds to add to it £794,000 for payment to contractors, although it was already included in the summary given; so that I make it out from this document, which is gravely put forward by this gallant officer—of whom, I say, I will speak with nothing but the highest respect, so highly do I esteem his motives—that he is only some £1,300,000 out in a very obvious calculation which can be made by anyone. I only quote this, because I have seen the document to which I refer alluded to as a wonderful disclosure of our inferiority, and because it is a very good sample to give the country of the way in which these comparisons are sometimes made—comparisons always redounding to the credit and exaltation of the shipbuilding policy of others, and always depreciatory of the poor efforts of this country. Now, to come to some of the detailed observations which have been made by the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox). He found fault with us in respect to many individual points. He said a great deal about guns, in regard to most of which I have already made a sufficient statement. He also made some inquiries about the Edinburgh. When introducing the Estimates I explained that the Edinburgh was being delayed on purpose, because we wished to avoid the necessity of doing and undoing work—because we wished to have the experience which will be gained in building her sister, the Colossus. I trust the delay which is taking place will be amply compensated for in time to come by the advantage we shall gain. We are now proceeding in other instances on the policy of building several ships of one type. If you go on building new ships of fresh types, you have in each case new difficulties to overcome, new departures and new variations to make in the process of building; but if you repeat a type which has not been very long out of hand, and is still a new type, then the experience you gain in building the first stands you in good stead, and enables you to largely improve upon your first plan in building the second. That is just what we are anxious to do in regard to the Edinburgh—that is to say, we wish to give the Edinburgh the advantage of our experience in connection with the Colossus. I may say with regard to the 43-ton gun for the Colossus, it is quite true that there has been some delay in regard to the breech mechanism. The gun is on board; but it has been discovered that some little alteration must be made in the screw of the breech, and that has brought about some delay. At the same time, this is not a matter which will cause any very serious delay. The noble Lord made a statement which I was greatly astonished to hear him make. He complained, on this question of guns, that a certain Return that he had moved for had not been given to him in a useful condition. He paid me a compliment, which I did not deserve, for having answered a certain letter of his, when I told him that, so far as the Admiralty were concerned, they would not object to this Return being given. I was not aware that my hon. Friend the Surveyor General of the Ordnance (Mr. Brand) had any objection to the Return being prepared; but he says my hon. Friend objected to this Return of guns supplied to the Navy being given. He said my hon. Friend required that he should leave out the word “supplied;” and that if he did the Return would be like the play of Hamlet with the part of the Prince of Denmark left out.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Hear, hear!

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: “Hear, hear!” says the noble Lord; and I must say I am astonished to hear him cheer that statement, because I am informed that a note was sent to the noble Lord in which it was stated that the word “supplied” could be kept in if the words “and manufactured” were included.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: That note I have never seen or heard of. I wrote to the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, as I was leaving London, saying that if “manufactured” and “supplied” were put in I should be willing, but that without the word “supplied” it would be worthless.

MR. BRAND: I must say I regret to hear the noble Lord say he did not receive any communication. I had a letter sent to the noble Lord’s private residence, some three or four days ago, stating that there would be no objection to the Return, and that he might keep in the word “supplied,” so long as he would consent to the insertion also of the words “and manufactured.”

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I did not receive it.

MR. BRAND: I am very much surprised to hear the noble Lord say that he did not receive that letter.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am glad the noble Lord is to get his Return in a satisfactory form. Then the noble Lord raised the whole question he brought before us a few weeks ago. He complained that we had refused to give information about the boilers, and I think I disposed of that point at the time; at any rate, I have nothing to add to what I then said. Then he complained that we had begun a new ship at the end of the year, though we had said here in the spring and summer we did not want any more iron-clads. We did not say we did not want any more iron-clads. What we said was, that we did not think it necessary to begin any more as at present advised. But in the course of the year changes occurred in the distribution of the labour of the Dockyards, and an opportunity presenting itself for use-

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

fully employing some of our labour on a new ship, instead of waiting for the new year, we commenced in the course of last year. The noble Lord also said that a new iron-clad is to be laid down this year, but that the Estimate was very low, and that it really meant nothing. If the noble Lord's argument means anything, it is that no iron-clad is to be begun except in the month of April; because the meaning of our taking a small sum is simply that we wish to lay in materials for the ship before the end of the year. The noble Lord complained that the Mersey and Severn were classed as iron-clads in last year's Estimates. Well, I, myself, was the first to announce that these ships should not be classed as iron-clads; but they were so classed, for this reason—that they were intended to be, if I may say so, successors to the Polyphemus—not identical with her, but of much the same character, especially in the matter of torpedo discharge. When we looked into the matter last year, the Board of Admiralty agreed that before the Estimates were moved in the House, this year, it would be better to treat these vessels as a new class of ship, and I announced that opinion in moving the Estimates last year. When I said that they were battle-ships, I also said "as auxiliaries to iron-clads;" and I am prepared to maintain, on the authority of our Advisers, that this will be so, and that they are perfectly capable of taking their part in a great naval engagement. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) asked me to describe these vessels; but I said so much about them last year, that I do not think I ought to take up the time of the Committee any further now in regard to them. Roughly speaking, they have horizontal steel decks, covering the magazines and machinery, and protecting the boilers, instead of armour-plating on the sides; and in many respects the protection is quite as good in the one case as in the other, though the upper part of the vessel may be totally unprotected against shot and shell. A reference was made to the Committee which has been appointed on the invitation of the Admiralty, and there was an idea expressed that it was in substitution of the Committee that was proposed in the House by my right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay). The two things are utterly different, and the subjects on which they were appointed are utterly dissimilar. The right hon. and gallant Admiral moved for a Committee of Inquiry into the condition of our Iron-clad Fleet; but the Committee I have mentioned have nothing whatever to do with such an investigation. I stated before that what we have done is to call to our assistance some of the most eminent men of experience connected with private Companies, both as shipbuilders and owners, to give us their advice as to two points—first of all, as to the conditions under which ships are built by contract—so as to secure to ourselves the full benefit of the experience and building powers of the private yards—and, in the second place, to advise us as to what we should do in the very difficult question of repairs, either in our own Dockyards or by contract. The Committee is not a Departmental one, as has been stated. It consists of three Members of this House, two gentlemen connected with great lines of steamers, and a naval officer, who was associated with the others in order that there might always be someone present at their inquiries to point out the actual requirements of the Navy. There is no one connected with the Admiralty on it; and it is entirely independent, its inquiry being confined to the subject I have referred to. Coming to questions of a personal nature which were brought forward by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Captain Price) as to the engineers, they, no doubt, are in a position to complain of some inequalities in the system on which their pay is arranged. I am not aware what was the cause of the original adoption of that 11 years' rule, which has been so frequently alluded to in connection with the engineers and paymasters. I cannot myself see any advantage in it, and I cannot see what the object of it was; and I am bound to go a little further, and say that I have not been able to discover anybody who does. Then arises the question, should it be altered? It applies to several classes, and any alteration in the system would involve a considerable re-arrangement of the pay of all these classes. Well, some of these classes are not in a condition that seems to require a re-arrangement of their pay. In the engineers, taking them first, I am told that promotion goes on very fairly, and that they have really not much to complain of in that respect; and applying to them the test that the hon. Member for Falmouth (Mr. Jenkins) applied, I am bound to say there is no difficulty in procuring officers to serve in that branch of the Profession, and, therefore, there is no urgent demand for a large increase of pay. There is, moreover, this difficulty—that the position of these officers has been so recently settled that it would be difficult to disturb the arrangements again without a longer experience of the working of the present system. At the same time, I will say, irrespective of what has been stated to-night, that I will look into the matter to see whether there is any anomaly or grievance which can be removed without opening up the general question. Then as to the petty officers. The pay of the artificer class is regulated by the pay of similar men outside the Government service. The stewards are in a much better position, and any number of respectable men can attain to that position; so that there is no very strong case, such as there was in regard to seamen petty officers, for improvement in pay. I do not think we shall be disposed to open that question. The case of the schoolmasters I am not very familiar with; but I will look into it. And now as to paymasters. Some years ago, unfortunately, there were far too many entries made in that class, so that it is now overstocked, and promotion, therefore, is not so quick as it ought to be. As a matter of fact, promotion will get a little worse than it is; but after a while it will get better. All round, however, they are not insufficiently paid. They are subject to the 11 years' rule, like the engineers, and I will see whether that rule can be modified; although, if its modification is found to involve any considerable increase of expenditure, I cannot hold out any hope of a change being made. It is true there is a deficiency of strength in the Corps of Marines. We are fully alive to the necessity of doing all we can to keep the Corps up to its proper strength. With regard to the men of the Fleet, we are taking boys in a sufficient number to make up the losses which have occurred. My right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) alluded, somewhat to my astonishment, to the speech made by the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty at the Royal Academy dinner. The first Naval Lord of the Admiralty, I understand, quoted the words of even a greater authority than himself—Lord Wolseley—who had said it mattered nothing whether our ships are built of iron, wood, or pasteboard, our seamen will fight and do their duty. I am sure everyone understood what that meant. It meant that our seamen are of such character and spirit that they do not look twice or thrice at the description of the ships; they are always ready to do their best under any circumstances. The right hon. and gallant Admiral, in order to justify, I suppose, his character as a Scotchman—who is said to require a surgical operation to enable him to see that a thing is not meant in sober earnest—quotes the remarks of Sir Cooper Key, and says—“This is a solemn declaration made in public by the Chief Naval Adviser of the Government, that a pasteboard ship is as good a ship as any other.” We have heard of paper ships, but we have never yet heard of pasteboard ships; and it is not the intention of my gallant Colleague to propose that any of them should be constructed. Now, I have only one word to say in regard to the point raised by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron). The hon. Gentleman has alluded to the fact that gunboats are being used, as he thinks, for improper and illegitimate purposes in the West Highlands. The Board of Admiralty have great disinclination to use gunboats for any purpose not directly connected with the service of the Navy; but they have been used on some occasions to check riots and preserve the peace. I promise the hon. Gentleman I will look into the documents from which he derives his information, and see what explanation can be offered.

MR. DAWSON said, the hon. Gentleman had not said anything about the comparative cost of work done in the Dockyards and that done by contract.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think the Committee we have appointed will probably assist us in that matter. There is no doubt at all that Dockyard work is more expensive than contract work; but it is more carefully and more elaborately done. I know that contractors, in many places, greatly dislike taking Government work, because it requires to be so skilfully done—the standard of excellence is so high. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) has asked for information as to the number of boys. The total number borne is 5,755, distributed as follows:—In training ships, 3,690; in harbour ships, 246; and in sea-going ships, 1,819. All the answers I have received to inquiries made have convinced me that we get an extremely good class of boys. There is one thing which is most satisfactory. I have found that boys who are allowed to go home for their holidays very often bring a boy back with them. That is a very good sign that the Service is popular in the various districts of the country, and also that our boys are well treated, and like their life. In answer to the inquiry of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), I have to say it is the case that the Victorian Government have, with great public spirit, gone to some expense in providing themselves with certain ships; and on the occasion of the recent difficulty in the Red Sea they offered the use of those ships to the Imperial Government. Although the ships were not called into requisition, the Admiralty, and I am sure the Committee likewise, entertain the highest sense of the spirit which prompted the offer. Nothing can be more desirable than that the Mother Country and the Colonies should assist each other in these matters.

SIR JOHN HAY said, it was but fair to his gallant friend, the Admiral of the Fleet, Sir Thomas Symonds, to say that when he discovered the mistake he had made in his Circular he at once took every means to send to all who had received it, and to the Admiralty, the correction which he found to be necessary. He (Sir John Hay) had ascertained from his gallant friend that this morning he received a letter from the First Lord of the Admiralty acknowledging the receipt of his communication, and thanking him for it.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: My right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) will understand, that although I thought it necessary to make the statement which I did in this public way, I did not mean the slightest disrespect to Sir Thomas Symonds. I regret he should have put forward so misleading a statement.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that before they came to a vote he desired to direct the attention of the Secretary to the Admiralty to the Sub-head "I" of Vote 2. The total for "Seamen's Clothing, Soap, and Tobacco" was £149,008, against £211,500. That showed a decrease of £62,492. There was a note to the effect that—

"The sum of £37,500, for Clothing Allowances hitherto provided for under Sub-head I, has been included in Vote 1. The actual decrease, therefore, is £32,200."

Anyhow, a decrease of £32,200 upon £211,500 was a very large one indeed. The sum to be voted was £149,008; but if his hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would turn to page 15, he would find under "Credits," letter "O"—

"Estimated Amount of Charges against Wages of Seamen, &c., for Issues of Seamen's Clothing, Soap, and Tobacco, and of Credits for Supplies of the same on repayment to Officers of the Fleet, to Royal Naval Reserves, and to Coast Guard on shore, £187,063," or £38,000 more, "Seaman's Clothing, Soap, and Tobacco."

The items were very remarkable. First of all, the decrease was very large—one-seventh of the whole—and at a time when one would suppose the exigencies of the Service called for a larger than a less expenditure on seamen's clothing. The Committee were entitled to an explanation of the figures if it could be given.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: First of all, as to the £37,500. That represents commuted allowances in lieu of seamen's clothing, which the Treasury decided ought to be charged in Vote 1 instead of Vote 2. The decrease of £32,200 arises because there is less required for working suits and clothing for Reserve men, and to replenish the stock of seamen's clothing. I heard of this at the time the Estimates were being prepared, but I do not retain in my mind the precise reasons. The stock of clothing may have been a great deal higher than it was found necessary to maintain.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE asked if the hon. Gentleman could not give a little more definite promise with regard to the inquiries he proposed to make into the 11 years' rule? The hon. Gentleman had made what he called a sentimental concession which was very pleasant to listen to; but it was not very effective. Was it proposed that an inquiry into the operation of the rule should be made by a Departmental Committee? If so, it was likely the sentimental concession would be translated into a reality.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have said I could not see any particular virtue in this 11 years' rule; but I am not prepared to say more. I will look into the matter; but I am afraid there will be great objections to the abolition of the rule, if it were found it would lead to any substantial increase of the pay of the whole class. If, however, the anomalies can be removed I will endeavour to remove them.

MR. TOMLINSON said, his principal reason for wishing to make a few observations that night was that both last year and this year he had received communications from that distinguished officer, Sir Thomas Symonds, calling special attention to what he considered the great inferiority of the intended additions of their Fleet as compared with those of the Navy of France. He confessed that the statements made by Sir Thomas Symonds filled him with alarm; and that alarm had not been much mitigated by anything that the Secretary to the Admiralty had said. The hon. Gentleman had put forward a theory which, so far as he (Mr. Tomlinson) knew, was an entirely new one. He believed he was correct in saying that from the time of Admiral Lord Hawke, if not from an earlier date than that, the authorities of the Admiralty had always considered it was necessary for us, in considering the proper strength of our Navy, to have reference to the strength of the Navy of France especially, but also to those of other countries; and until the present time he was persuaded no member of the Admiralty Board had thought it desirable to disregard that consideration. The hon. Gentleman challenged some of the money figures in the statement of Sir Thomas Symonds. But the money question was only a secondary one. Sir Thomas Symonds rested his argument chiefly on a comparison of ships. He gave a list of ours, and compared them with a list of French vessels. He (Mr. Tomlinson) did not think that any instructed person would hesitate, on reading the statement in question, to affirm that, at all events, we were drawing near to a position of very considerable peril. Such was the conclusion he had arrived at, and that conclusion was not affected by the monetary inaccuracies which the hon. Gentleman had laid stress upon. Sir Thomas Symonds also drew attention to the fact that a great many more men were employed in the French than in the English Dockyards. Now, these were matters which every Englishman ought to take the greatest interest in; and he (Mr. Tomlinson) was the more encouraged in making these observations by the remarks which were made—and not unfairly or unjustly made—by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) in the early part of the evening. That hon. Gentleman spoke of the meagre attendance of Members on both sides of the House during the discussion of these naval subjects. It was certainly to be regretted that the important questions of the strength of their Army and Navy did not excite the attention they deserved. Hon. Members had one excuse for their non-attendance, and that was that in any remarks they, who had little or no technical skill and knowledge, made were comparatively helpless. The hon. Gentleman (Sir Edward J. Reed), of course, spoke with great authority on these subjects; and whether he succeeded or not in inducing the naval officials to give greater consideration to one part of naval matters or another, every word he uttered was weighty and worthy of note. But they who were simply laymen in naval matters felt themselves in the difficulty that they were at the mercy of the officials, and must, to a great extent, accept their explanations. He desired to support, as far as he could, the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) as to the grave injury and loss to the country which arose from the kind of control which was exercised by the Treasury over the Army and Navy Services. He believed that the result of this control was frequently to prevent the judicious expenditure of small sums, whereby millions of pounds might be saved in the end. It appeared to him that the only thing that could really allay the anxiety of the country would be the adoption of some such suggestion as was made some time ago—namely, that a strong Committee should be appointed to consider the question, which was not a Party question, and he hoped never would be made one. The great point was—what was required for the defence of the country; what amount of expenditure was needed? Let them adopt the principle which was, he believed, the basis of the military administration in Germany—namely, that there was no economy in an expenditure which stopped short of efficiency. If they did that, their Services would be based on the only true principles of economy.

MR. RYLANDS said, that last year he drew attention to certain frauds which had occurred in the administration of this Vote. He should be glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman what steps had been taken to prevent fraud in the future?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, a Report was made on the subject by gentlemen connected with the Admiralty, and then the Accountant General himself went down to make investigation. The result was that arrangements had been made which it was believed would have a most salutary effect.

MR. WARTON said, the explanation of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, with reference to the statement of Sir Thomas Symonds, was very unsatisfactory. It was of small importance whether the French Estimates exceeded ours by £900,000, or whether they fell short of them. That was not the point they should discuss; and he was rather astonished that a Gentleman, so able and so clever as the Secretary to the Admiralty, should descend to arguments of that sort. The point was that the cost of the Navy of France was nearly equal to our own. The position of the two countries was utterly different. France was a country with very few Colonies; England had Colonies in every part of the world. He doubted whether any hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench knew exactly the number of our Colonies; and he said that the preponderance of our Colonial Empire over the French Colonial Possessions made it important that we should have a very much stronger Navy than France. We had to send our ships to the Pacific, to the India and China Seas—in short, to all parts of the world; and even if our Navy were twice as large as the French Navy, that proportion would be nothing more than a right one, considering the immense Colonial interests we had to defend. As an hon. Member had pointed out, it was not a question of money—it mattered not whether more or less was spent—but to have fewer ships than the magnitude of our commercial and Colonial interests required was a perfect disgrace to any Ministry. He had been much impressed by the weighty and solemn language used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), on several occasions, with regard to the Navy; and he regretted to be unable to perceive any improvement in this year's Estimates, as compared with those of last year. The Government seemed not to be aware of the importance of our Colonial Empire, to judge by the kind of comparison they made between the Navies of the two countries. There could be no doubt that our Navy should be strong enough to meet the combined Navies of other countries; and in the old time it was so. This was particularly necessary now, because we were not likely to find many allies. But the disposition of the Government was to shirk every difficulty, and to creep out of every obligation, whenever they could; the old traditions of national honour had faded away under their hands, and the character they had lost to the country was the only one which could add strength to the Empire in times to come. A Government with a cowardly policy and a poor Navy would meet with the contempt of the world. It was once the custom of foreign nations to take the word of England seriously. When Lord Palmerston said anything it was known to mean something; but the custom in these days was to say that the utterances of the Government meant nothing at all. With an Army and Navy kept in a state of inefficiency, and with a Government ready to creep out of every obligation, he felt ashamed, as a patriotic Englishman, of the position they occupied, and of the miserable explanation given by the Secretary to the Admiralty of the formidable figures which had been put forward relating to the Navies of France and England.

Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £188,600, Admiralty Office.

SIR JOHN HAY wished the Committee and the Secretary to the Treasury to take notice that the expenses of this Establishment were increasing every year. He merely recommended that fact to the attention of economists and the Secretary to the Admiralty without any wish to reduce the Vote, which was, no doubt, necessary to the Public Service.

MR. RYLANDS said, he should be glad if the Secretary to the Admiralty could give an explanation of this increased charge of such a character as might be satisfactory to the Committee. On two or three occasions there had been some sort of reconstruction of the Naval Department; and he had been assured by the Government at the time the proposal was made that the effect would be to secure considerable economy therein. He was bound to confess, however, that he entertained great suspicion that such a result would not be obtained. It appeared to him that the process which went on in these reconstructions of Public Offices was something like this. The officials regarded it as a most unfortunate circumstance that there should be a stagnation of promotion, and they wished to get an improved position; in order to get promotion they impressed upon the authorities that by making a reconstruction of the Office they would be able to get rid of a number of clerks, and be able ultimately to secure economy. But he always found that in a short time the number of clerks sprang up again to what it was before the reconstruction took place. He knew there were numbers of men in the vigour of life, and fully capable of performing public duties, who had been retired on pensions, simply under the arrangement of reconstruction of the Departments in which they served; and he thought there was no greater abuse in Public Offices than the way in which gentlemen, very often in the prime of life, who had capacity for public duty, were placed upon the Pension List and compulsorily retired, with the object, as he supposed, of making things pleasant for those who remained in the Office. He protested against this practice; and he thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay) was justified in pointing out that, on the face of it, there appeared to have been no economy in the reconstruction of the Department in question. Moreover, while this Pension Charge on account of the Army and Navy was becoming most alarming in its proportions, as far as he could see there was no corresponding advantage in the administration of the two Services. He objected altogether to this increase of charge, and he should be glad to find that his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty could lay such facts before the Committee as would satisfy them that it was justified by the requirements of the administration.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he could assure his hon. Friend that there had been no reconstruction at the Admiralty, in the sense of pensioning certain men and taking on others in their stead. The additional expense was the result of the appointment of the staff required for the Intelligence Department, and of additional provision for the Constructive and Engineering Staff of the Controller's Department. The latter, which was represented by the sum of £4,000, was part of a scheme elaborated by the Committee, over which his hon. Friend the Civil Lord presided, for reconstituting on a better and, as they thought, a more efficient footing, the body of Naval Constructors.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was as much averse as the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) to any unnecessary expenditure; but during the time he presided at the Admiralty both he and his Colleagues felt the great importance of having information on purely naval matters; and therefore he entirely concurred in the course the Admiralty had taken of placing the Intelligence Department under one responsible official, whose sole duty would be to furnish the Department, and therefore the Service at large, with information which, under circumstances that he hoped would never arise, might be of vital importance. With regard to the Constructors' Staff, he should regard as money well spent any reasonable expenditure incurred in securing the services of the most qualified persons for the purpose of designing and constructing ships of war; and he would add his belief that if they could by any means attract into the Service men who had not been originally trained in the Dockyards a great benefit to the Service would be obtained. He did not in the slightest degree grudge those gentlemen who now occupied the position of Constructors all the distinction and credit which belonged to them, although he was of opinion that the Service would be benefited by the infusion of a little new blood, inasmuch as the result would be a rivalry advantageous both to the country and the men themselves; and he hoped the moderate scheme which the Civil Lord had settled, and to which he had given so much attention, would secure that very important result.

SIR JOHN HAY said, it appeared that, under the new arrangement, the First Lord of the Admiralty would not have a house, and that the First Naval Lord would have a house. However that might be, he considered it rather an unfair arrangement for the Admiralty that the Offices were to face the north, which, although it permitted a view of Nelson's Monument, would prevent the officials ever seeing the sun. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would be able to say that, under the contemplated arrangement, the Admiralty were not to be left out in the cold.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had expressed much surprise that the Government had broken its promise of effecting economy in this Department. It was well known that the hon. Member was a humourist; but on this occasion he had surpassed himself, because it was impossible to discover which promise the Government had not broken with regard to any subject. For his own part, he was glad to find that the conduct of the Government had met with such general disapproval. The Secretary to the Admiralty had explained that a portion of the increase under this Vote was due to arrangements in connection with the Intelligence Department. But he would ask, what was the use of such a Department, if the Government did not avail themselves of the intelligence received? They had, for example, some time ago, received information that there was in the China Seas a foreign cruiser capable of "mopping up" all our cruisers and gunboats, and of devastating station after station before we could catch her. Yet, nothing had yet been done to protect our Eastern commerce. If the Admiralty were unable to act upon intelligence of that kind, he thought the money asked for might as well be saved.

MR. GORST said, he had often observed a disposition on the part of the Admiralty to plunder the funds of Greenwich Hospital as much as they could, and his remark applied, not to the present Board alone, but to all. He thought the Committee ought to insist upon all the charges made upon the funds being set out as clearly as possible in the Estimates. Besides the amount of £789 charged for work done by the Accountant General's Department, there was a sum of £500 for work performed in several Departments of the Admiralty in connection with the business of Greenwich Hospital; and that not being sufficient, there was a charge on page 22 of the miserable sum of £52 for the salary of a messenger. He trusted the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Estimates would be able to afford some explanation, for the confusion in the accounts was such that it was impossible to make out what the Charity had to pay.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay) was incorrect in thinking that there would be no house for the First Lord of the Admiralty, although, perhaps, the question would more properly have been addressed to the Chief Commissioner of Works. The First Naval Lord would also have a house. The Offices might look towards the north; but they would certainly be placed on the most advantageous side of the building. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman remarked that they would never get the sun; but he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) did not know that exposure to the sun was an advantage to a Public Office. At any rate, the arrangement would be made under the direction of the Board of Works; and he had no doubt that the fullest accommodation would be secured. Amongst the reasons in favour of the present arrangement was this, that the erection of the new building would not interfere with the present Offices.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £196,900, Coast Guard Service and Royal Naval Reserves, &c.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he thought the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers had been treated by the Admiralty with but scant courtesy. They were a most valuable body of men, or would be if they were properly treated. Last year, and again this year, he had put a Question on the subject to the Secretary to the Admiralty; but he had not yet got a satisfactory reply. The year before last these Volunteers applied to the Admiralty to be allowed to man the gunboats at the Naval Volunteer display, engaged in attacking the forts; but they were told by the Admiralty that no gunboats would be employed; yet the event proved that that was not strictly accurate, for some gunboats were employed. They applied again this year for permission to man the gunboats engaged at Portsmouth, but it was not granted. He should have to deal specifically with this case when the Report came up, and state the grievances of these men; but he could not allow this Vote to pass without entering an energetic protest against the way in which these Volunteers had been treated by the present Administration in regard to a capitation grant, as well as in other respects.

SIR JOHN HAY desired some information with regard to the Royal Naval Reserve. He understood last year that a considerable addition was to be obtained by the enrolment of men from the Orkney and the Shetland Isles, and from the Isle of Man; but only 17,000 men were at present on the list of the Reserve, and money was only being taken for 18,000 instead of 20,000. As he had understood, the object of enrolling men from the Orkneys and Shetlands and the Isle of Man was to bring up the strength to 20,000; and he would like to know whether these hardy and excellent seamen had been enrolled; if so, whether they had proved satisfactory in regard to drill; and whether the number of 20,000 would be made up?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, the visit of Her Majesty's ships to the Orkneys had not been attended with the success which had been looked for with regard to the enrolment of men from that part of the Kingdom. In the Shetlands there was already a considerable force of men enrolled of fine physique, whose drill had received the highest approval from the inspecting officer. With regard to the Isle of Man, the arrangements had not yet been completed; but when they had been, enrolment would be proceeded with, and he believed with the success which was desired. He naturally took great interest in the Royal Naval Volunteers, and he was sorry that they had been disappointed in regard to a capitation grant; but this was a matter that lay with the Naval Advisers of the Admiralty; and the scheme for the utilization of this Force was not sufficiently matured to justify the Admiralty in proposing a capitation grant. A good deal was, however, done to encourage the Naval Volunteer movement. They were given an opportunity of drilling with the Royal Naval Reserve, and also of cruising in gun-vessels, which were appropriated to that purpose in the summer, and that privilege he believed was greatly appreciated. He need hardly remind the Committee that it cost a considerable sum to provide those boats; but he believed that the annual cruise was a greater attraction than a capitation grant would be.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £112,670, Scientific Branch.

MR. GORST said, last year a promise was given that the course of instruction on board the Britannia should be examined, and a Report presented to the House. He wished to know what progress had been made by the Admiralty in that matter?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN explained that a difficulty which had been experienced was that a special examination would cause an interruption of the cadets' studies, while, if the examination was not specially conducted for the purpose of the Report, it would be one upon which their future naval career would be founded. The position of the cadet in the Navy was determined by the place he took in the examination; and it was very undesirable that that examination, which was to determine his future career, should be conducted by gentlemen appointed for a special purpose unconnected with the ordinary system of the training school. It was important that there should be some sort of uniformity in the examinations. The ordinary examination was conducted by independent Examiners of good University standing; and he thought he had not only fulfilled his promise, but had done what was best for the Institution itself, by laying on the Table the Report made to the Admiralty on the occasion of the last examination. He saw no reason why the Report should not be presented to Parliament every year.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked whether the Report was satisfactory? At present the cadets were admitted to the Britannia by competitive examinations; and he wished to know whether the result of that system, with the two years' training on board this ship, had been as entirely satisfactory as had been anticipated? His recollection of the Report upon that system was that the system was not so entirely satisfactory as it had previously been, and that there had been a falling off in the number of boys passing.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the Report was in the hands of hon. Members, and he had not heard any expression of dissatisfaction; on the contrary, the Report was considered very satisfactory by the Director of Studies, who had said it showed that the school was in a good condition, except in respect to some particular points of detail.

MR. RYLANDS said, he had not received the Report as to the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, showing the number of students, the various classes of instruction given, and other details.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN replied, that the Report would be issued.

MR. RYLANDS said, this was a matter to which he had several times called attention, for it seemed to him that the entire cost of the Establishment was excessive, having regard to the service. The charge was £31,992 in the Estimates; but, in addition to that, there was the Navy pay of the officials, which did not appear in the Vote; so that altogether the amount was very excessive, considering the character of the Institution. He hoped the hon. Member would pay some attention to this subject.

Vote agreed to.

MR. W. H. SMITH proposed that Progress should be reported.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he proposed only to take Votes 7, 8 and 9, and to postpone Votes 6 and 10.

LORD HENRY LENNOX objected to this course, because he should have to trouble the Committee somewhat with regard to Votes 8 and 9. It would, therefore, be better for the Committee to swallow the pill at once, and proceed no further now. There was generally a dispute over Vote 6.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN suggested that a compromise should be made by taking Vote 7.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought it was a most inconvenient plan to take Votes out of order; and as they had been engaged so many hours he hoped the Committee would now report Progress.

MR. DAWSON also objected to the Votes not being taken in their order, and said, he and his hon. Friends were interested in Vote 6. They were anxious to draw attention to the exceedingly small sum allowed for Dockyards in Ireland as compared with England. He, therefore, moved that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—
(Mr. Dawson.)

MR. GORST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty to give the Committee some information as to when the Estimates would be taken again? They had now reached Vote 6, in which some of his constituents were much interested; and upon that the Secretary to the Admiralty had promised to give an explanation, which would be looked for with interest by the Members for Dockyard towns. He hoped the hon. Member would not postpone the Estimates until August, as had frequently been done; and he felt sure that, so far as the hon. Gentleman was concerned, that would not be done; but he hoped that some Member of the Government would be able to give a pledge that they should not be so delayed.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he could make no definite statement as to when these Estimates would be taken again; but he thought he might appeal to hon. Members whether the Estimates had this Session been postponed to a late date? Already they had been discussed for two nights; and the promise made that the second night should be before Whitsuntide had been very handsomely fulfilled by so early a date being taken. He hoped hon. Members would trust the Admiralty not to take any undue advantage of a postponement now.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked when the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty was likely to make a statement with regard to the case of the paymasters and assistant paymasters?

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the matter had been fully stated that night by several hon. Members, and he had expressed his general opinion on the subject, and stated that the Admiralty would look into it. But it would be quite impossible to look into a complicated question like that, affecting three branches of the Service, between now and the Report, which was usually taken a day or two after the completion of Supply. He thought he might again appeal to hon. Members as to the way in which the Government had so far acted with regard to these Votes.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, this subject had been over and over again pressed upon the attention of the Admiralty, but without the least effect, he himself having addressed several Questions to the hon. Gentleman upon the matter, but only received curt replies. Now that there was some prospect of the Government being driven to pay some attention to the subject, he wished to know when the decision of the Government might be expected? He would bring this matter up on the Report.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

BILL [Lords].—[BILL 120.]

(Mr. Dodson.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Dodson.)

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, it had happened, through circumstances over which they had no control, that he and some of his hon. Friends had had no opportunity of making an objection to this Bill at any of its stages. It would be in the recollection of the House that both on the second reading and on the Motion to go into Committee on the Bill they accepted a suggestion by the Prime Minister that they should raise their objections in Committee, and he thought the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) would do him the justice to admit that his opposition and that of his hon. Friends to the Bill had been moderate throughout. For himself, he was bound to say that the hon. Member's advocacy of his cause had been powerless; and that the hon. Member himself must feel that the victory had not been entirely on his side. The contention of the hon. Member, and those who acted with him, was that the policy they desired to carry out would prevent the import of diseased cattle; and the Duke of Richmond, in support of the same policy, had recently stated that the true remedy for foot-and-mouth disease was dead meat. But the agitation which this Bill had aroused showed that the expectation put forward by the Duke of Richmond had been disappointed; for it proved that neither this Government, nor any that might succeed them—and which might be less well disposed to the people—could possibly carry out that policy. It was simply impossible for any Government of this country to prohibit the import of live animals for food from the United States and other countries. When this Bill, in a less harmful form, was introduced in the other House, Lord Carlingford stated that legislation on the subject was not necessary; and he (Mr. Arnold) objected to this Bill, because it was useless; because it added nothing to the powers of the Privy Council; and because it was mischievous, in so far as it gave an invitation to the Privy Council to use the authority they already possessed under the Act of 1878 in a careless and hurtful manner. He regretted extremely that the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who had lent such stalwart aid in resisting legislation of this character, was not now in his place; but he would remind hon. Members with whom the right hon. Gentleman's opinion might have any weight, that when this Bill was in Committee the right hon. Member earnestly pointed to the third reading as the proper opportunity for recording their protests against the Bill. He and his hon. Friends, however, could not that night do more than record their protest against this useless Bill. He moved that the Bill be read that day six months.

Mr. THOROLD ROGERS seconded the Motion.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Arthur Arnold.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BROADHURST said, he was glad his hon. Friend had moved the rejection of the Bill. If it passed into law it seemed to him that its title ought to be altered, and that it should be called "The Landowners' Relief Bill." That would be a far more appropriate title for the measure than the one it now had. He objected to such measures as this being smuggled through the House of Commons at a time of night when all respectable people, or the greater part of them, were in bed and asleep; and he ventured to say that if the present position of the Bill and its character had been anticipated at the time when it was first brought before the House it never would have been permitted to reach the stage at which it had now arrived. This was one of the lessons which young Members of the House would not fail to take advantage of. They had a Bill introduced originally of a very moderate and, what appeared to be on the face of it, harmless nature. At every stage of its progress through Parliament advantage had been taken by the landowning interest to strengthen it until it had become a formidable measure, and one which, in his opinion, would be disastrous to the interests of the people who lived on small incomes. Moreover, to his mind, it would be disastrous to the House of Commons, who had been a party to its passing, for it was a measure of taxation on the food of the people. He sincerely hoped that his hon. Friend would press his Motion to a Division; and he (Mr. Broadhurst) only wished that they had such opportunities of pressing their opposition to the measure as would prevent its becoming law. He could say, for himself, that should he have the privilege of remaining a Member of the House for any considerable time, on the next occasion when this kind of inroad upon the rights of the people was attempted, in however small a degree, he should take good care that every possible opposition was offered to it—even to the very introduction of the measure. They knew perfectly well how pleased the Opposition was with the Bill. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), they all knew, gloried in his great success, and his influence over this House in ordering it to pass the measure. The hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well the object of the Bill, and had, in fact, declared it the other night. The hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members had declared that the measure tended to encourage the home production of meat. [Mr. WARTON: Hear, hear!] Yes; they understood all about that; but what was to become of the stomachs of the people? Unhappily, the working classes of the country, and the poor of the community, were not so well provided with the world's goods as was the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton). The hon. and learned Member could look at an increase in the price of food with great satisfaction, because he was probably protected against want. But the poor and the working classes were differently situated. What was to become of the food supply during the three or four years interval that would be occupied in growing sufficient cattle to meet the home demand? Why, he had no hesitation in saying that the people of the country would have to undergo a period of starvation from fresh meat; and if they did not go through that process hon. Members opposite would say that the Bill had failed to accomplish its object. He only regretted that they below the Gangway on the Government side of the House had been so neglectful of their duty, and so misled by the apparent moderation of the promoters of the measure at its earlier stages, as to have allowed it to reach its present dangerous position. He should certainly support his hon. Friend in his opposition to the measure, and he only regretted that their prospects of opposing it were not far greater than they were.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he thought it right to point out the singular contrast which was presented by the speeches of the two hon. Members who had spoken. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) objected to the Bill, because, he said, it would be useless, ineffective, and harmless; and the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken declared it to be a most formidable and mischievous piece of legislation. As to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, they had often heard of speeches made to the Gallery; but he (Mr. Chaplin) must say that he thought the speech they had listened to had either been made to the hon. Member's constituents, or else the hon. Member was utterly ignorant of all the debates which had taken place on this question. The hon. Member had not taken the trouble to reply to, or to dispute any one of, the numerous arguments which had been advanced over and over again on that (the Opposition) side of the House in favour of the Bill; and all he had been able to tell them had been proved to be wrong times out of number—namely, that if the Bill was passed the necessary consequence would be that the people of the country would be subjected to starvation. The hon. Gentleman had said, and said very truly, that he (Mr. Chaplin) rejoiced at the passing of this measure. He did rejoice, and rejoice very heartily, at the prospect; and he would tell the hon. Member why. It was because he had given some attention to the subject, and was satisfied that, so far from any of those evil effects which the hon. Member had foretold being brought about, within a very few years after the passing of the measure they would find that the price of meat, instead of being increased, would be substantially lowered, and that the Legislature had succeeded in doing something, though it might not be much, to add to the comforts and to provide for the interests of the people of the country.

Mr. SLAGG said, he could not be reproached for unduly prolonging debates in this House; but he hoped he might be permitted to add a few words of protest against this most objectionable Bill. He did not think the House had even yet thoroughly realized the strong antipathy which was felt to the Bill by the large constituencies of the country. In his own constituency (Manchester) there had been a most remarkable meeting—one of the most remarkable he had ever recollected—in which the public hall of the town was crammed to its full capacity. It was crowded not only with Liberal objectors, but with Tory objectors to the Bill; and there appeared in force on that occasion a large number of men of great experience in the meat trade, who were, perhaps, as well qualified to give an opinion as to the probable results of this Bill as any hon. Member in the House. On that occasion the meeting was addressed by the American Consul, an exceptionally intelligent gentleman, who showed, amongst other things, that, in the case of America, from which country it was feared by the promoters of the Bill that a great deal of infection would be brought, and to deal with which some special precautions were going to be taken, that the introduction of foot-and-mouth disease, in the first instance, was really traced to an importation of cattle from this country. It was explained at the meeting that the result of this measure, if it was carried into practical operation, would be necessarily a very distinct increase in the price of food. Trade in this country was in a very depressed condition. The earnings of the working classes were diminished, and this was, therefore, not a time to play any tricks with the food supply. He was sure that, persevering in the present course, Parliament would inflict on the populations of the large centres a very serious and grievous wrong; and he could only say that if, in the future, the landed interest in this country and the Tory Party who had supported this measure were identified with the cry of Protection and dear meat, they had only themselves to blame.

Mr. W. H. JAMES also opposed the Bill. His opinion of it was not so highly coloured as that of his hon. Friend below him (Mr. Broadhurst); but, at any rate, he wished to point out that the Resolution carried last year by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) was only adopted by a majority of six votes. Well, the majority, he had ascertained, represented something like 674,000 electoral votes, while the minority voting against the Resolution represented no less than 999,000. This Bill was generally represented as being a contest between town and country; and he had no doubt that if he were to analyze the figures he had given a little more closely he would be able to show that the contest was one between the constituencies of the North with those of the South. He did not think the House should lose sight of the fact that in these large Northern constituencies the population during the last 10 years had enormously increased. It was no exaggeration to say that during the last 10 years the populations of some of the large Northern towns had increased much more largely than anywhere else. The population of Northumberland, for instance, had increased 12 per cent. The population of the county of Durham had increased 26 per cent; of Yorkshire, 18 per cent; of Derbyshire, 21 per cent; of Nottingham, 22 per cent; and of Leicester, 19 per cent. In all these large county constituencies, and in all the large urban populations, this Bill was immediately directed against the food supply. Without in the least wishing to impute motives to hon. Gentlemen who had promoted this legislation, it was obvious to him that it had been promoted by the Central Chamber of Agriculture and Chambers of Agriculture up and down the Kingdom. They knew how dear was still to the agricultural interest the objects and purposes of Protection. That interest knew that it was very probable that if the food supply of the people was diminished, their own interest would not be injured. When these discussions were raised, it should not be forgotten that amongst these enormously increasing populations to which he had referred there was not the same convenient opportunity of expressing opinions as had members of Chambers of Agriculture and such organizations. He could not help thinking that they were only at the commencement, and that they would find that, as this Bill had been promoted by these Bodies, before long foot-and-mouth disease in this country would be still existing, that they would have further restrictions, and that the amount of the food supply would be exposed to still further diminution. If that was the case amongst these very poor populations, and if some day they found when they went to the butcher that there was an increased price put upon the pieces of offal that they were in the habit of buying, the House would find that they had raised a very deplorable and formidable feeling throughout the country. The fault would lie, not with those who had opposed this measure, but with those who had promoted it.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Balfour.)

(NO. 74.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD BALFOUR, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its main object was to put an end to the cruel pastime of shooting birds from traps. The circumstances under which it had been brought before the House, and which he should like to recall, were these. Last year a similar Bill was introduced in "another place," and its second reading was carried by 195 to 40. It was late in the Session when that Bill was brought up to their Lordships' House, and its second reading was put down for a day far on in the month of August. There were not many of their Lordships present when it came on, and after a short discussion, upon a small Division being taken, it was rejected by a majority of 30 to 17. That was hardly a judgment of their Lordships' House which the supporters of the Bill could be expected to regard as final; and, therefore, the Bill had been brought in again, in the sanguine hope—in which he heartily joined—that their Lordships would reverse their decision of last year, and pass the present Bill by a considerable majority. With the view of meeting some of the objections that had been urged to the Bill of last year, he had modified it in some respects; but its essential features were the same as those of the Bill of last year, and its object, briefly described, was to suppress the practice of pigeon-shooting, which, certainly, under no circumstances could be legitimately described as sport. He knew that that character was sometimes claimed for it; but he would like some of its defenders to get up and state the grounds on which they put forward that claim. He was not going to venture on an attempt to define what was, and what was not, sport; but sport, to be legitimate, ought to provide healthy recreation for the mind and body, and, in some respects, test the strength and ability of men, and, it might be, also, of trained dogs, against the instincts of animals more or less in their native haunts. If that was to be the canon by which to decide what was, and what was not, sport, it would be very difficult for the advocates of pigeon-shooting to bring it within that definition. He did not think he went too far, when he said that pigeon-shooting had its origin, and owed its continuance, to the fact that it was a medium for gambling for bets and stakes subscribed by the competitors. He did not ask their Lordships to condemn betting and gambling. He did not think the Legislature could properly be asked to do that; but something could be done for the purpose of checking, as at present practised, this essentially revolting practice, in which animals were put to death for the main, if not the only, purpose of affording a means for amusement and gambling. He would like those who advocated the practice to face the question whether or not it was frequently attended with serious cruelties? As regarded himself, he had no doubt upon the subject. He divided the cruelties into two classes—firstly, those which were wilful injuries, such as where it had been proved, as it had in many cases, that birds had been mutilated, or otherwise cruelly injured, by having their bills twisted, their bodies bruised, and their feathers plucked out by the attendants, before they had been put in the trap, for the purpose of giving one competitor an advantage over another; the other class of cruelties was one that, he contended, was almost inseparable from the continuance of the practice—namely, the sufferings which the birds underwent on their way to the place where they were to be shot. It was said in a Paper, which he held in his hand, and which had been extensively circulated amongst their Lordships, that the practice was not attended with cruelty. That Paper purported to give reasons against the second reading of the Bill, and apparently had been distributed by some of its opponents. It said that—

“Not a single case of cruelty had occurred in connection with pigeon-shooting; and that if it did occur the law, as it stood at present, would be quite able to deal with the offenders.”

He ventured to say that was not the case. He (Lord Balfour) would admit that pigeon-shooting might not be accompanied with cruelty in well-regulated clubs; but the Secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals informed him that that Body had obtained convictions in 25 cases; and he added the significant sentence that many more could be obtained, but for the fact that the officers of the Society could not gain admission to private grounds. By private grounds, he meant public-house grounds and other similar places. When the officers of the Society became known, on their attempting to enter these places, they were warned off, and not allowed to get near enough to see what was going on. To bring the law into operation it was necessary—and very properly necessary—to prove a specific act of cruelty committed by a specific person, on a specific bird, at a specific hour, on a specific day. To get all these facts with sufficient exactness, they must have every facility for proper observation; and the difficulty of securing an entry into these private grounds prevented many prosecutions which would otherwise be instituted. So much for that form of cruelty. There was another, and an analogous, kind to which he wished to call attention, and it referred not only to pigeon-shooting, but also to the shooting of starlings and sparrows out of traps. The existing law was hopelessly insufficient to deal with cases of that kind, inasmuch as it only applied to domestic animals, which those birds were not. Not many days ago, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals prosecuted a man for having cruelly treated pigeons on their way to a shooting ground; but it was only through accidental circumstances that it was discovered that the pigeons were domestic, and that, therefore, the Act applied. But there was another case on the 19th April, in which the same Society applied for a conviction. It was a case of some sparrows. The Society prosecuted a publican and several other persons under the Wild Birds Act. It appeared that there were 12 dozen sparrows packed in boxes on the top of one another. Many of these birds were so much injured by the manner in which they had been packed, that they were unable to fly. Stones were thrown at them, and if they still refused to fly, they were kicked to death. These birds, however, having been recently caught, were not domestic animals, and the Justices refused to give a conviction. That fact, in itself, was sufficient to show that the existing law did not give sufficient power. Before he left that document which had been issued by the opponents of the Bill he would like to make one or two other comments. In the sentence before the one he had referred to, there was a statement that this Bill would also put down partridge-shooting, a statement which most certainly was not correct. Then the document gave, as a reason for the rejection of the Bill by their Lordships, that the pigeons used at shooting clubs were the source of considerable profit to farmers and dealers, and in support of that they gave the price of the pigeons that were used. He (Lord Balfour) was obliged to them for doing so, because he thought it furnished him with a complete answer to one of their arguments. The lowest price, he found, was 16s. per dozen, the highest, 30s. That, he thought, disposed of the argument that was often used—namely, that they were interfering with the poor man's sport, for he ventured to say there was no man who could properly be described as "poor" that could afford to pay from 16s. to 30s. a-dozen for targets to shoot at. With regard to the amount of profit gained by those who reared pigeons, these figures could not be held to represent anything like the amount, because pigeons, like other animals, must be fed; and if they were not fed by the owner, they were allowed to travel over the country and feed at other people's expense. Therefore, the figures in question were no proof of the largeness of the sums made by rearing pigeons. There were other objections to the Bill. Last year it was said that it would be wrong for the Legislature to pass this Bill, because, for the first time, it was making the act of shooting at a bird an offence on account of cruelty, and that it was no more cruelty in shooting at a bird sprung out of a trap than in shooting at one sprung in a turnip-field or a cover. In order to meet this objection, he had made the 2nd clause of the Bill provide that a penalty should be incurred by keeping or using any ground for the purpose of pigeon-shooting; while those who engaged or assisted in such shooting should also be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5. They could not wholly exempt those for whose amusement and edification the whole performance was got up. That, he thought, would be manifestly unjust. The offence which was made punishable was not the shooting at a bird, but the shooting of a bird out of a trap or other contrivance. That was the object of the promoters of the Bill, and he was afraid, if the practice was to be put down, that was the only way to do it. If, however, another and a better one could be suggested, by which the end desired could be attained, he would gladly adopt it. There was this curious feature about the opposition to this measure—that while many noble Lords had told him that they could not support the Bill, on the ground that it partook of the nature of paternal legislation, they always added that they did not wish to be numbered among those who approved pigeon-shooting, which they admitted was a most reprehensible practice. He frankly admitted that the Bill might be open to the charge that it partook of the nature of paternal legislation; and he expected that it would be warmly opposed, on that ground, by the noble Earl on the Cross Benches, who was always most anxious to prevent the Legislature from passing measures that were open to that charge. If, however, Parliament were compelled to choose between paternal legislation and the evils of pigeon-shooting, he would venture to say that he should infinitely prefer the former, for the evils of pigeon-shooting were greater than the evils of paternal legislation. It had also been remarked that the Bill would open the door to the prohibition of shooting and of field sports altogether, and that they might as well make the Bill apply to the shooting of pheasants and partridges, for pigeon-shooting was no more cruel than partridge or pheasant-shooting. There was, however, a marked difference between confining a bird in a trap, for the purpose of shooting at it, and seeking it in a wild state. He did not know whether the admission would help, or would hurt, his chance of passing this measure; but he avowed that, if any kind of shooting or of field sport were so conducted as to outrage public feeling, as pigeon-shooting did, then he believed that such shooting or sport would be sent where he now asked their Lordships to send pigeon-shooting by passing this Bill. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."
—(The Lord Balfour.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) said, that, as he had done last Session, he should oppose the Bill, on the ground that it came before the House asking for something under false pretences. He denied altogether that his noble Friend (Lord Balfour) had shown there was necessarily any cruelty in pigeon-shooting. He (the Earl of Redesdale) contended that there was no cruelty in shooting at a bird for the purpose of killing it, and that the noble Lord had failed to show that there was necessarily more cruelty in letting a bird out of a trap and shooting at it than there was in partridge or pheasant-shooting. What was cruelty? The noble Lord had not ventured to determine the question in this matter. Was it shooting at birds with intent to kill? If this was the meaning of the word, then everyone practised it who went into a turnip-field to shoot partridges, or into a cover to shoot pheasants. The noble Lord said the Bill was for the purpose of putting down pigeon-shooting. Then, why was it not so called? He (the Earl of Redesdale) would tell their Lordships why it was not, and that was because the noble Lord had not the courage to call it so; and, also, because he knew very well that he would be much more likely to get support from their Lordships for the measure by calling it "Cruelty to Animals Acts Amendment Bill." The Bill, however, had nothing whatever to do with cruelty to animals. It was somewhat remarkable that it should have taken some 30 or 40 years to find out that pigeon-shooting was cruelty. If the noble Lord, for the Society he represented, required further powers to detect cruelty if it was perpetrated, let a Bill be introduced for the purpose. Such a measure, however, should be called by its proper name, as he (the Earl of Redesdale) objected altogether to a Bill being called by a name which could not properly belong to it. There was nothing objectionable in a man showing his skill in the use of a gun or any other instrument, and the shooting at a bird with the intent to kill it was necessary to test skill in the use of a fowling-piece as was shooting at a target with a rifle or long-bow. There was a class of persons in this country who objected to all kinds of field sports, and who regarded hunting or shooting of any kind as cruelty. He (the Earl of Redesdale), however, called shooting sport, and legitimate sport. He thought there was no ground for the Bill, and, therefore, he moved its rejection.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months").—(The Earl of Redesdale.)

LORD ABERDARE said, that he should give the Bill his best support, on the same ground that he objected to bull-baiting and cock-fighting—because those particular forms of sport tended to brutalize the people. There were thousands of places throughout the country where pigeon and other forms of trap-shooting were carried on amid circumstances of revolting cruelty, as those who had to administer justice well knew. All who had anything to do with the prosecution of these cruelty cases were aware of the difficulties in the way of bringing the offences home to the offenders. He might instance, as one description of cruelty, the very long periods which some of those birds were confined. When Martin's Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Horses and Asses was brought forward in 1821, it was met by the objection that, if once this line of legislation were allowed to be commenced, there was no knowing where it would stop; and that, perhaps, measures would be brought forward to prevent cruelty to dogs; and, it was added, amid roars of laughter, perhaps even to cats. He was sure the great mass of the public did not object to sport engaged in for the purpose of exercise, which meant roaming through woods and fields, and required a considerable knowledge of the habits and instincts of animals; but, in the present case, the so-called sport was of an inferior, a poor and contemptible character; it did nothing to develop the qualities of strength and activity in the persons who engaged in it and was, moreover, subject to the very grossest abuses on a large scale. Therefore it was that he said pigeon-shooting had a brutalizing tendency. The sufferings of pigeons were very great, and all the practices resorted to at pigeon matches should be put a stop to. Abuses were inevitably connected with this sport, which was not worth protecting. There were other amusements which were subject to abuse—as, for instance, the theatre and the racecourse; but he should be sorry to see either of those amusements put an end to because there were abuses connected with them, because they had redeeming features which could not be claimed for the so-called sport of pigeon-shooting. Should the Bill pass this stage, it was his intention in Committee to move an Amendment to extend the operation of the Bill from places specially set aside for pigeon-shooting to places occasionally used for that purpose.

EARL COWPER said, he should oppose the Bill, much against his inclination in many respects; because, in the first place, he thought it might be unfortunate that a Bill which had passed by such a large majority in "another place" should be thrown out by their Lordships; and, in the second, there were people who would say that their Lordships, many of whom were fond of shooting, were afraid of their own arrangements being interfered with. But their Lordships ought to be above such considerations, and to let their votes be guided by considerations of public policy. Like the noble Earl who had moved its rejection (the Earl of Redesdale), he thought there was a great deal of false pretence about the Bill. He maintained that in pigeon-shooting the cruelty at the moment was very little indeed, and not more than that of any other shooting, or any other mode of putting animals to death, and the alleged incidental had not been proved. Speaking for himself, he had given up pigeon-shooting, because he did not like the associations connected with it; but, so far as he could remember, there was less cruelty connected with pigeon-shooting than almost any other kind of sport. On those grounds he must oppose the Bill, because he could not admit that their Lordships had before them sufficient evidence as to the alleged abuses to justify them in passing such a piece of restrictive, exceptional, and highly objectionable legislation as was involved in the present Bill. He thought it his duty, as a Member of that House, to vote straight forwardly against the Bill.

EARL FORTESCUE, in opposing the Bill, said, he never remembered a more remarkable speech made by an ex-Cabinet Minister—indeed, an ex-Home Secretary—than the one which had just been delivered, carefully informing the roughs of what cruelties they could now perpetrate with impunity. He (Earl Fortescue) objected to the Bill, although he had no sympathy whatever in this so-called sport. It was a matter of opinion, certainly, how far the practice partook of the character of sport; but if this Bill was to pass, he would like to know where this proposed legislation to restrict cruelty to animals was to stop? A good deal had been said in reference to the cruelty of conveying pigeons from the places where they were bred to those where they were to be shot at; but the same noble Lords who made this objection, supported the carriage of animals from foreign countries at the cost of immense suffering to them, in order that they might be killed for food in this country, instead of being imported in the shape of dead meat. What that suffering must be might be judged from the fact that in one year over 14,000 had died of the passage, most of them thrown overboard, the rest landed dying and useless. He regretted those sufferings, and he equally objected to the recently-revived cruel fashion, now prevalent, of docking horses' tails; but he was not prepared to give effect by prohibitory legislation to his opinions on those points. There was a risk of too much legislation on questions of that kind. Were they in future to do nothing without appealing to Parliament? He felt jealous of the honour of the British Parliament, and he hoped—though he was afraid that was past praying for—its high character and position would be maintained. The reputation of that Parliament, which, with all its imperfections had been for centuries the envy and admiration of all lovers of liberty abroad, was now being lowered in the eyes of foreign nations both by what was done and what was not done in it. There were important measures which the time of Parliament might be usefully employed upon; but he protested against the time and labour of the Legislature being wasted upon a proposal of this kind. Nero fiddled while Rome was burning, and they were legislating for pigeons when affairs at home and abroad were calling urgently for attention.

LORD WAVENEY said, he should support the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, because he considered it was a duty they owed to the lower animals, when killing them, to see that they had at least a fair chance. All birds should be placed upon an equality; but no pigeon let loose from a trap had an equal chance of his life with a partridge put up in a turnip-field, or as birds sought for in the high hills or on the Rocky Mountains.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY, in opposing the second reading, said, that for some time he had been engaged in the practice of pigeon-shooting; but he had not done so for many years, because he did not think it a sporting operation, and because it was an expensive one. He did not give it up because he considered the sport was cruel. He was not an admirer of the large battues that took place; and he thought if they were to stop the shooting of pigeons from traps, those ought also to be stopped, for there was nothing more cruel in pigeon-shooting than in destroying pheasants, where they were driven huddled up into a corner, and shot by hundreds. Last year, he read that out of six guns, in one week of six days, those six guns had killed 8,358 head of game, which gave an average of 230 to 240 for each gun each day. He should not have mentioned this, did he not think it came very ill from the noble Lord, who, it might surprise their Lordships to hear, was one of this party of six guns, to come forward and move the second reading of this Bill. The Bill was introduced under false pretences, for no serious attempt had been made to prove that pigeon-shooting was attended with unnecessary cruelty.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he considered he should be wanting in proper regard for the duties of his Office if he did not say one word in support of the Bill, and he could not admit that the measure had come into the House under false pretences. The noble Lord who introduced the Bill (Lord Balfour) did not impute any cruelty to the skilled pigeon-shooter, but he wished to put down a great mass of cruelty connected with the shooting. As the noble Lord had said, he was quite willing to accept any other means of putting down this cruelty, if it could be done; but he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) did not believe that it could be done by any other means. This did not belong to that class of sport which was so dear to Englishmen, but it was one which was passing out of usage—that old class of so-called sport which preyed on the sufferings of confined animals. This was not a case where a man delivered a shot, and the bird's life was taken in a moment. It was that old system of inflicting punishment on confined creatures to which he objected. There could be no doubt about the fact that acts of cruelty were committed. He had been informed by persons living in the neighbourhood of these grounds, that they constantly picked up injured birds, which lived a considerable time, some of them with one eye gouged out, some with beaks twisted across, and otherwise mutilated in a shocking manner, in order to make them fly in a particular direction. These things, of course, were not to be attributed to the shooters, but were done in the interests of the large number of depraved persons who assembled in these places to gamble.

It had been suggested by his noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) that such legislation was unworthy of the dignity of that House; but he could not agree that anything was unworthy of their Lordships' dignity which in any way tended to remove one pang of suffering; and if there was any doubt as to the suffering that was caused, it could easily be set at rest by inquiry. But the acts of cruelty, it was urged, were the work of a brutalized mob. No doubt the mob that collected on these occasions was a brutalized one; but he thought they were being helped to be further brutalized by the sanction of such proceedings as these. They were, in fact, a source of terror and annoyance—he did not like the word danger—to the neighbourhood. As regarded them, he would not call them “dangerous classes,” for he thought there were very few who could be so described; but he thought none were more dangerous than the utterly unemployed class of loafers who went about all day with a gun in their hand ready to shoot or to pick up birds wherever they fell, totally regardless of boundaries, fences, and all rights of property. He thought it a great argument in favour of the Bill that it met with help from those who maintained true sport. He cordially supported the second reading, and trusted the House would not sanction a system which brutalized the population. If sport ever were to be attacked as sport, it would be because some of its votaries upheld as sport a practice which wholly tended to brutalize so many, as well as to inflict incredible suffering on thousands of innocent creatures.

On Question, “That (‘now’) stand part of the Motion?”

Bill to be read 2^d this day six months.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO TREATY.

RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in rising to move—

“That the Petition of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce against the ratification of the Congo Treaty be printed and circulated with the minutes,” after remarking that he must substitute the Birmingham Petition for that from Manchester, which he had named in his Notice, but which could not be found, said, he must acknowledge that his Motion was a somewhat unusual one; but it was one, he believed, justified by the facts of the case. He did not intend to discuss it in any Party spirit, but purely as a commercial question of great importance. A deep interest was taken in the Congo Treaty in Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, Glasgow, and all the great commercial centres of the Kingdom; and the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs must be aware that considerable objections to the ratification of the Treaty were felt, not merely amongst Members of the Conservative Party, but also amongst those of that Party to which the noble Earl himself belonged. He did not intend, on that occasion, to ask their Lordships to pass a Resolution against the ratification of the Treaty, or to act in any way prematurely in the matter. Such a course would be very inconvenient, because, when this subject had come up last year in the House of Commons, upon a Motion of Mr. Jacob Bright, the Prime Minister had given a pledge that the Treaty should not be ratified until the House of Commons had had an opportunity of considering the matter; and he saw by the report in The Times that that pledge had been renewed as lately as yesterday by Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, who had said also, that Her Majesty's Government had re-opened their correspondence with Portugal on the subject of the Treaty. But what he did wish was, that the fullest consideration should be given to the matter. He would remind them of a few facts regarding the history of the Congo. The River Congo had been discovered by Portugal, or, at all events, by a Portuguese subject in the year 1491; and Portugal, therefore, claimed the sovereignty over the district. But in 1853 Lord Clarendon, in a despatch of the 26th of November, said it was manifest that the rights of Portugal had long since lapsed; and in 1860 Lord John Russell had used words to the same effect in a despatch to the Portuguese Minister. In 1876, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), when Minister for Foreign Affairs in Lord Beaconsfield's Cabinet, had used similar language. Lord Palmerston, moreover, some years before, in writing to Lord Howard de Walden, had stated that it could not be permitted that British vessels which might be seized by Portuguese cruisers in the region of the Congo River, should be adjudicated on by a Portuguese Prize Court. It was clear, then, that the claims urged by Portugal with regard to the Congo and the adjacent coast had not been acquiesced in by the Government of this country in recent years. [The noble Earl here quoted from the Report of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce in 1883, which alluded to the fact that there was great apprehension of interference with the interests of British trade by Portugal; and from other similar documents.] In November, 1882, a deputation had waited upon Sir Charles W. Dilke on the subject; and a Memorial had been sent to the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) representing the small claim which Portugal had upon that region. The exports and imports from and to this country, although more or less a matter of calculation, were, on good authority, £1,000,000 each way per annum, so that the question was by no means an insignificant one. Last year the Manchester Chamber of Commerce had addressed a letter to the noble Earl representing that the trade from Loando, north of the Congo, to Quinsembo, south of that river, was not carried on by Portuguese, but by English and Dutch traders, and that that had been the case for some time. There had been nine Treaties made by this country with the Native Chiefs on the Lower Congo, dating from June, 1854, to March, 1877, which might be reduced to seven, as two of them were merely additional articles to two of the other Treaties. The essence of all those Treaties was absolute Free Trade on payment of a sort of “accustomed duty” to the Chief before the ship began to unload; and in many of them there were stipulations against the Slave Trade and the atrocities which accompanied it. The noble Earl then quoted from a letter which Mr. Jacob Bright had addressed to The Daily News on the 18th of April, in which he said—

“The present condition of things on the Lower Congo, this region which Portugal has long coveted, and her claim to which England has always stoutly resisted, is well described in a letter from Earl Granville to the Portuguese Minister, dated March 15, 1883. ‘On this coast many trading factories are established, of which a small minority only are Portuguese. They belong to British, French, German, and Dutch houses. They pay no dues or imposts, making only insignificant payments to Native Chiefs. Their vessels ply without hindrance in the rivers and along the coast. There is no obstacle to the free access of the traders to the interior. Missionaries also, irrespective of creed, are allowed perfect freedom in their work. It would be impossible, then, to agree to the imposition of burdens which do not now exist; . . . the freedom of trade and navigation of the River Congo should be absolute, involving exemption from all river dues or tolls; equality should be secured to missionaries of all creeds.’ After this statement will it be believed that Her Majesty’s Government have made a Treaty with Portugal by which the contention of Lord Granville that the ‘freedom of trade should be absolute’ has been abandoned, and the ‘imposition of burdens which do not now exist’ will take place?”

Alluding to the Slave Trade, Mr. Bright says—

“To give increased territory to Portugal in the interest of African freedom is a new doctrine in this country. A year has seldom passed by without the British Government rebuking the Portuguese Government for conniving at the Slave Trade. It has been, indeed, said that the Slave Trade is the only trade for which the Portuguese have shown a marked aptitude. Lord Mayo last year described to me his journey in the steamship Angola, from Benguela to Lisbon, in company of a cargo of slaves. He said that between Angola and the Island of St. Thomas there is a regular traffic in slaves, and that official forms are made use of in order to conceal its character, and to enable the officers of the Government to reap some portion of the reward. Slaves are brought from the interior to Catumbella—they are called ‘Colonials.’ The price here is £7 a-head. They are then sent in lighters to the Portuguese steamship at Benguela, thence to Loanda, where official forms are gone through. They are assumed to have engaged themselves for five years’ service. They are then shipped in the same steamer to the Island of St. Thomas. They are well treated on board and decently clothed. Price at St. Thomas from £10 to £15; a pretty girl sells for more. They can be re-engaged by the planters at the office of Santa Anna, the capital of the Island, and in this re-engagement they are not consulted. In the ship in which Lord Mayo sailed in February last year there were 82 of these ‘Colonials’ on board. They die early, and never see their own country again.”

The noble Earl then referred, in some detail, to the last Papers on the subject which had been laid before Parliament, and particularly to the Mozambique tariff which was scheduled to the Treaty now awaiting ratification, and which the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs appeared to consider a liberal one. That tariff imposed duties, however, ranging up to 10 per cent ad valorem. Quoting, again, from Mr. Jacob Bright, he (the Earl of Belmore) showed that the Portuguese Customs officials on the Mozambique coast were extremely unsatisfactory; that, in addition to the Customs duties, British merchants had to pay very heavy trade licences, whilst each of their employés were separately taxed. The result was that all the British merchants but one had been driven away from the Mozambique coast; and that one made a living by carrying on a trade of a peculiar character. It was feared that if the Lower Congo came under the Dominion of Portugal, British subjects would have to pay, in addition to the Customs tariff, Income Tax and Succession Duties such as were now imposed in their adjoining Possessions at Angola; and that the settlement at Boma, a town near Nokki, which had been fixed on as the western limit, on the southern bank of the river, of Portuguese jurisdiction, would be ruined. Inland, no limits of jurisdiction were fixed by the Treaty. He (the Earl of Belmore) admitted that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs having pointed out that the Governor General of Mozambique had, of his own authority, attempted to increase the duties under the tariff, the Portuguese Government had repudiated the Governor General’s action. He also admitted that the noble Earl had come to an arrangement with the Portuguese Government that there should be no transit dues on goods passing up the river, to the Upper Congo; and, further, that a landing place which had been constructed a few miles lower down the river than Vivi (on the northern bank opposite to Nokki), and where the current was not so strong, for the Belgian station in connection with the Association under the control of the King of the Belgians, should be outside the limit of Portuguese territory. Two questions seemed to suggest themselves arising out of this Treaty. Why had it been concluded at all? And why with Portugal in particular? The noble Earl would probably refer him for an answer to the first question to the Treaty itself, which said that it was to put an end to all difficulties relative to rights of sovereignty; to provide for the complete extinction of the Slave Trade; and to promote commerce and civilization. Well, be it so; but was Portugal the best Power to carry out these objects? We might have taken one of three other courses. We might have either taken the Lower Congo under our own protection; or established a sort of international protectorate; or handed it over to one of the other Powers trading in the district. The noble Earl concluded by moving his Resolution.

Moved, "That the petition of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce against the ratification of the Congo Treaty, presented to the House on the 22nd of April last, be printed."—(The Earl of Belmore.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am afraid that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Belmore) has, in point of form, been somewhat irregular in moving that a course should be adopted which is never followed in this House, inasmuch as it is not the practice to print Petitions. He has supported his Motion in a long speech; but I am very reluctant to complain on that account, because it is impossible for him to have been more temperate and more moderate. He has read many extracts; but some of them tell as much on one side of the question as on the other. The noble Earl said that he did not intend to introduce any Party feeling, and I admit that he has most thoroughly carried out that good intention. I do not know whether it is the absence of Party feeling that accounts for the fact that the noble Earl had only one Peer on the seats behind him, increased to two after the conclusion of his speech; but I hope that absence of Party feeling will continue until this matter is finally and satisfactorily settled. With regard to the printing of the Petition, I have already said that it is contrary to the usage of your Lordships' House; and I regret that the less, because, in this case, it is entirely unnecessary, for the Petition is merely the repetition of certain statements and arguments contained in letters and other documents, addressed by the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester to the Foreign Office, and they are included in the Papers on the subject, which are shortly to be presented to your Lordships. I might have been disposed to postpone any discussion on the matter until a time when there are a few more Peers in the House, and when those Papers have been presented and considered, especially as we are now in communication with the Portuguese Government on a very important point—namely, the objection raised by some foreign Governments to the character of the Treaty; but I am glad to have an opportunity of making a few remarks, if even in very general terms, on the nature and objects of this Treaty. The noble Earl referred to the large commerce which was going on with the River Congo, and said—

"Her Majesty's Government are not aware of that large commerce, and are doing something to destroy it."

Why, the very object of this Treaty is exactly the reverse of destroying that commerce—it is to retain and to enlarge it. The noble Earl further said the Manchester Chamber of Commerce had declared against the Treaty, saying that it would ruin their trade; but the Cotton Spinners' Association of the same city—a most important institution in itself—say really the reverse, and they add what I believe is perfectly true—namely, that, while commerce is now a monopoly in the hands of a few strong firms of different nationalities, the result of this Treaty will be to throw it open to a much more extended commerce on the part of small traders on the Congo, who will be able to invest their capital with a sense of security now altogether absent. The noble Earl spoke of the necessity of reading extracts from the pamphlets of the Chamber of Commerce, some of which I am bound to say, are of great interest; others having little interest, and not indicating much knowledge of the matter. Much was also made by the noble Earl of the point that there had been a persistent repudiation of the Portuguese claims by different Secretaries of State. I admit that it is true that the Secretaries of State have not, up to this moment, recognized those claims. It happens that I received an appointment in the Foreign Office nearly 50 years ago. I have been connected with the Office four times since then, and may therefore claim to have some acquaintance with its traditions and documents; and from my experience, which I am sure will be backed up by that of the older permanent officials of the Department, and by the noble Earl behind me also, (the Earl of Derby), the real motive of that repudiation was exclusively the fear of encouraging, and not being able to deal with, the Slave Trade on the Congo, which is entirely stopped at this moment. That makes the whole difference between the former and the present state of the case. Her Majesty's Government are aware that different countries and different associations are all competing for the commerce of Africa, and especially in the region of the Congo. We have a state of things which is singularly illustrated by the long extract quoted by the noble Earl from a despatch of the English Consul, in which he describes every sort of outrage as going on—an attack on the Dutch factory, with retaliation and fighting, repudiation of the sovereignty of Portugal altogether in the first instance, and then, under the pressure of circumstances, an appeal to the Portuguese Government to settle matters. If the Portuguese Government had not intervened, and if the English Consul had not also used his influence, matters would have resulted in a very disgraceful state of things. I could give other and similar instances. I cannot conceive these considerations not making it important to have some settled Government. It is all very well for individual merchants or powerful firms to say that we are taking away the freedom of trade; but we think that there is freedom of trade in this Treaty, in the true sense of that term, which does not exclude the imposition of moderate duties. The 1st Article of the Treaty recognizes Portuguese Sovereignty in that portion of the territory to which the noble Earl has referred, and the next five Articles make a more complete and favourable arrangement for the perfect freedom of the navigation and commerce than can be found in any existing Treaty of the class at this time. The noble Earl used two arguments, in the first of which he said—"If you move at all, and if a Treaty were entered into, you ought to secure the object that you have in view." I think that this Treaty does secure our object. The noble Earl's next point was that if we entered into a Treaty at all, it should not be with the Portuguese. There have been innumerable deputations to the Foreign Office upon this subject, and the greater number of the gentlemen who formed them have admitted that they could not find fault with the Treaty; but their real objection, like that of the noble Earl, was that we ought to have taken the Congo ourselves. But are we really to take possession of every navigable river all over the world and every avenue of commerce, for fear somebody else should take possession of it? The Portuguese have claimed this particular territory for nearly 400 years, and there is no reason why their claim should not be perfectly good, although we have hitherto refused to recognize it. Their claims have not been opposed by any other country, and the only reason why they are not now in occupation is this—that we, acting in a high-handed manner, but one justified by the circumstances of the time with reference to our anti-Slavery opinions, gave them to understand that we would use force to prevent their occupation of the territory. And so matters stand at the present moment. It is rather too late to say that we should not enter into a Treaty with Portugal; for, as a matter of fact, the Government have already done so, and have agreed to negotiate a Treaty. After what has passed, a formal Resolution having been come to in the House of Commons, and no objection raised to it in the House of Lords, it appears to me to be too late to say we will not have this Treaty because it is made with a country like Portugal. We have laid down in the Treaty the strictest rules with respect to the freedom of commerce, bearing in mind the pledges given in Parliament by the Government. The noble Earl fears that the Portuguese will not mind those obligations; but if we have force sufficient to prevent them from doing that which they claim they have a right to, why should we fear that they will not adhere to the Articles of the Treaty to which they themselves willingly consented?

THE EARL OF BELMORE: Are they to have power to levy any taxes under the Treaty beyond those levied for Customs?

EARL GRANVILLE: With regard to the territory in question, if the noble Earl looked at the clause he would see that we not only have the advantage of the most favoured nation clause in the Treaty as regards other countries; but there can be no differential duties as between us and the Portuguese. This Treaty does not merely deal with the territory in dispute, which is not a very large one; but it goes beyond that, and deals with the Slave Trade which exists in the East of Africa. With regard to that question, we have obtained, for the first time, that which both the Foreign and Colonial Offices have been striving for for years—I mean a permission to use effectual means to put down the Slave Trade on the Zambesi and on the East Coast. It is also most important that we have secured the most favoured nation clause with respect to the rest of the African Possessions of Portugal. The noble Earl referred to certain evils connected with the labour traffic, and there are, without doubt, evils connected with it. With regard to the labour traffic there, which amounts to slavery, Mr. Johnstone, who has written a most interesting book on the subject, says that, on the Congo, nearly all the firms, with, possibly, the exception of English firms, employ slave labour. The noble Earl knows better than I do what has been done with regard to the labour traffic in the Fiji Islands, and the extreme difficulty there has been in dealing with it. Portugal, France, Germany, and ourselves are all occupied in trying to deal with this important question. With regard to the slave traffic, we deal with it in a manner I have described; but we do not attempt in this particular Treaty to deal with the labour traffic specifically, and I think there are very good reasons for that course. I put it to your Lordships, if this Treaty does not take effect, what our position will be. I do not mean to say that the noble Earl wishes to fetter the liberty of action of Her Majesty's Government in taking any course that may seem most wise; but the course suggested by him would involve us in the possibility of war. Mr. Jacob Bright is a strong advocate for peace, and I should like to ask whether he would advocate the threatening of Portugal with a war after she has in this Treaty agreed to all the conditions which Her Majesty's Government thought necessary in order to obtain absolute freedom for commerce and trade, and absolute liberty for the conduct of missionary work, and with regard to the suppression of the Slave Trade, within their African territory.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he would like to ask the noble Earl when the Papers would be laid on the Table?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he could not state absolutely; but he hoped in the course of a few days.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, after the objection taken to his Motion on the ground of Order, he should ask the permission of the House to withdraw it.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock,

PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (POOR LAW) (No. 4) (BELCHALWELL, &c.) BILL.—[BILL 150.]

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he had arranged with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that the Notice relating to this Bill should be postponed until Monday, the 19th May. He would, therefore, move that the consideration of the Bill be postponed until the 19th instant.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be postponed until the 19th instant,"—(Mr. R. H. Paget),—put, and agreed to.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday 19th May.

QUESTIONS.

BOARD OF INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND).

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the appointment of centre superintendents to conduct the examinations for the Board of Intermediate Education in Ireland, preference is given to gentlemen from Trinity College and others wholly unconnected with intermediate education, nominated by individual members of the Board, or pressed on their notice by external influence, to the exclusion of the assistants in the intermediate schools and colleges of Ireland; whether a clerk in the Registry of Deeds Office, in Dublin, was appointed in 1882; in consequence of the numerous applications, have the Board reduced the remuneration of superintendents from twenty to fifteen pounds, and have they given notice of their intention to reduce it still further; and, in extension of this principle of economy, has the reduction of the salaries of the two assistant commissioners from a thousand pounds per annum to any less amount been recommended?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Assistant Commissioners inform me that, in selecting the centre superintendents of examinations, preference is not given to gentlemen from Trinity College and others wholly unconnected with intermediate education; but that the Board appoint only those persons whom they consider best qualified, and, if possible, those who have had experience in such work. A gentleman who was temporarily employed in the Registry of Deeds Office was one of the persons appointed in the year before last. The Board have reduced the remuneration for this class of service, in conformity with the recommendations of a Committee which recently inquired into the administrative arrangements of the Department. A reduction of the amount of remuneration given to persons temporarily employed for a purely occasional duty would afford no reason for reducing the salaries granted to permanent officials at the time of their appointment.

ARREARS OF COUNTY CESS (IRELAND)—COLLECTION IN CO. LEITRIM.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether any legal means exist for compelling the county Leitrim grand jury to collect the arrears of cess, amounting to £53 10s. 8d., on the evicted lands of Colonel Tottenham, M.P. in the baronies of Rosclogher and Dromahaire; is it the fact that the owner has already been successfully decreed for poor rate and seed rate on said lands; can he explain why, out of £125 due, only about £50 was recoverable; and, if this be owing to a portion being over two years in arrear, will he give instructions to the Local Government Board for speedier collection to be insisted on in future; and, do any means exist of ascertaining the extra amount of poundage that falls on the rate and cess payers of Leitrim in consequence of the non-collection of the levies on evicted farms?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): £53 10s. 8d. was returned as arrears of county cess, due on lands of Colonel Tottenham, which had been evicted. These arrears have been re-apportioned on the lands liable, and it is believed no extra poundage will be imposed under this head. An arrear of poor rate and seed rate accrued while certain lands were untenanted. Colonel Tottenham, who is not, in any event, the person primarily liable, was decreed at the April sessions for poor rate and seed rate to the amount of £37 9s. 6d.; a balance claimed of £37 12s. 1d. was irrecoverable by reason of more than two years having elapsed from the making and publishing of the rate, and the 12 & 13 Vict., c. 104. protecting in such case the person not primarily liable. Colonel Tottenham has appealed, as he contends he had no beneficial use of the lands while they were untenanted. The clerk of the Guardians states instructions to proceed were given in time, but that the actual proceedings were not taken till too late. The Local Government Board is now aware of the default. I cannot say what the extra rate may be by reason of £37 12s. 1d. being lost; but it is very insignificant.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)— RED BAY PIER, CUSHENDALL, CO. ANTRIM.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, By whom and at what date was the pier or harbour at Red Bay, Cushendall, county Antrim, constructed; at what date did the commencement of the collection of dues commence; who were the officers appointed in the first instance for the purpose of collecting the dues; when was the present harbour master appointed, and were there any other candidates for the office; what superior qualification did he possess over the others; and, why did he receive the preference?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, this pier was finished in 1851, and was handed over to the Grand Jury of the county of Antrim in 1857. Since that date the Treasury have nothing to do with it.

COASTGUARD (IRELAND)—ARRANGE-MENTS FOR TRANSMITTING PAY OF MEN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, How long is it since cars were allowed to convey Coastguard Officers in Ireland to get the monthly pay for the men instead of, as formerly, sending the money by the men from station to station; and, whether it is a fact that seven shillings is paid for such conveyance at Ballintoy, county Antrim, while another person has tendered to do the work for four shillings; if so, why was the smaller offer not accepted?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that reference had been made to the local officers, and he found that pay cars had been used for many years when public cars were not available. A payment of 7s. was made in this case, which was not excessive for a distance of 14 miles. An offer of a conveyance for 4s. was made; but it was not a proper conveyance. Such arrangements must be left to the local officers, and there was no reason to question their discretion.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—WICK-LOW MAGISTRACY—APPOINTMENT OF MR. MARTIN LANGTON.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Lord Chancellor has come to any decision in reference to the appointment of Mr. Martin Langton to the Commission of the Peace for the county Wicklow?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Lord Chancellor informs me that the case of Mr. Langton is still under consideration.

MR. W. J. CORBET: I will repeat the Question on Monday.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES (IRELAND)
—THE EXAMINATIONS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the statement that the calendars of the Queen's Colleges being published before the time fixed for the Royal University examinations, If he was made aware by the Queen's College authorities that the calendars so published only contain the examination papers set in the preceding year, and are therefore valueless in reference to the University examinations of the year in which they were published; and, whether there is any valid reason why the papers set at sessional examinations held in May or June should not be published, in a separate form or otherwise, so as to be accessible before the ensuing examination of the Royal University in October?

MR. TREVELYAN: It appears to be sufficiently obvious, without explanation on the part of the Queen's College authorities, which I do not think they were bound to give in this case, that the calendars could only contain the examination papers set at preceding examinations, and not at examinations to be held after their publication. With regard to the suggestion that the papers set at the sessional examinations in May and June should be published in a separate form or otherwise, so as to be accessible before the ensuing examination, it appears to relate to a matter which is academic rather than administrative, though, no doubt, a consideration of expenditure would be involved in which the Treasury would be concerned. The Government having now appointed a Commission of Inquiry, I think that the House will not think it unreasonable if, pending its Report, I hesitate to answer Questions which are really academical Questions, bearing on the relation of the Queen's College examinations to the Royal University which, I think, ought to be, and I hope will be, referred to this Commission.

MR. O'BRIEN: The right hon. Gentleman has not replied to the Question I put to him, which was, whether the Queen's College or Colleges made him aware that the examination papers published in the calendar were not in the papers of the year? This is not the first time the Queen's College authorities gave misleading and evasive information; and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not perfectly plain that the answer put into his mouth by the Queen's College was calculated and intended to shirk the point raised?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. O'BRIEN: I am entitled to ask the right hon. Gentleman to answer the Question I put on the Paper.

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he did not feel called on to answer Questions which were merely academic. The second Question now put by the hon. Member is not in Order.

MR. O'BRIEN: On the Vote for the Estimates I will see whether the right hon. Gentleman will not be a little more communicative.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—COST OF POLICE IN CHARGE OF HOLDINGS IN CO. LIMERICK.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, To what fund the expense of the six police is placed who are in charge of Mr. Coote's three farms in the barony of Costlea and County of Limerick?

MR. TREVELYAN: The men are a part of the county force, and are chargeable as such.

MR. O'SULLIVAN: Are they charged on the county of Limerick?

MR. TREVELYAN: I cannot say off-hand; but I feel sure the free force is not sufficient for a county like Limerick, and for more in excess of that the county pays a moiety.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—GIRLS' SCHOOLS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he could state to the House what is the average cost for 1882 per child in the ordinary National Female Schools of Ireland, as paid in salary and result fees from all sources; what is the average cost for 1882 per child in the Model Schools (female department) of Ireland, as paid in salaries and result fees from all sources; and, what is the average cost for 1882 per child in Convent Schools of Ireland, as paid in capitation and result fees from all sources?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that the Education Department does not keep separate Returns showing the cost per pupil in female schools as distinct from male or mixed schools, or of the amounts paid in salaries and result fees as distinct from other payments, such as gratuities for training monitors, good service pay, &c. The information asked for could not therefore be given off-hand; and in order to obtain it it would be necessary to employ about 22 members of the Department at overtime for about a fortnight.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. JOHN HAMILL.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a letter in The Daily Express of the 23rd April, and to a leading article in the same paper of the 24th April, signed "Vigilant," with reference to the recent appointment by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland of Mr. John Hamill to the commission of the peace for the county Louth; whether the statements made with respect to Mr. Hamill are correct; whether he is the same Mr. Hamill who presided at a meeting of the Town Commissioners of Dundalk on the 23rd April, when a vote of condolence to Her Gracious Majesty the Queen, which had been passed at the previous meeting of the board, was rescinded; whether it is the intention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to appoint to the commission of the peace for counties in Ireland persons who neither reside in the county nor possess any property qualification; and, whether there would be any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return giving the names of all those magistrates who, in the past four years, have been appointed "county magistrates," not having been recommended by the Lieutenant of their respective counties, together with a statement showing the amount of property each possesses in the county, and the reasons for such appointments? I may also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the late Lord Chancellor Law did not decline to appoint Mr. Hamill?

MR. SEXTON: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers this Question, I would ask whether Mr. Hamill did not hold the Commission of the Peace for the borough of Dundalk for three years before his appointment to the county; and, whether, as regards the vote referred to, it is a fact that it was not rescinded at all, but expunged on the ground that when it was passed the board was resolved into a sanitary committee, and was not, therefore, qualified to deal with the subject?

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL: I would also wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Mr. John Hamill is not one of the most considerable owners of property in Dundalk (the county town of Louth), and also the owner of considerable property in the adjoining county of Monaghan; whether he has not been twice elected in two successive periods to the chairmanship of the Town Commissioners of Dundalk; whether he has not, under Commissions of the Peace issued by three successive Lord Chancellors—namely, Lord O'Hagan, the late Mr. Law, and the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, acted as a magistrate in the borough; whether he was not recommended by the board of Town Commissioners for the magistracy; whether he has not discharged the duties of his magistracy in the borough with intelligence and independence, and without complaint from any quarter; and, whether, in the opinion of the Chief Secretary, any different or higher standard of qualifications is required for the due discharge of magisterial duties in counties from that required in boroughs?

Lord Arthur Hill

MR. TREVELYAN: I followed the Question of my hon. and learned Friend to the best of my ability, and I believe what I am going to say will cover all the points raised, except the question as to the unanimity of Mr. Hamill's election to the chairmanship of the Town Commissioners, as to which I am not aware. With regard to the general question, I am not willing to enter into a matter which I could not answer in less than a quarter of an hour, as to the difference between the qualification of a county and a borough magistrate; but I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Hamill is qualified both for one and the other. I have read the letter and article referred to in the Question asked by the noble Lord, and I do not propose to enter into the statements therein contained with respect to Mr. Hamill, which are of a personal nature, and which, after all, if submitted, would not be to his disadvantage, but would be distinctly to his credit. I refer to the allusion to his early history. What I am able to state is that Mr. Hamill is a gentleman of position and independent means. He was appointed a magistrate for the town of Dundalk so far back as 1881 by Lord O'Hagan when Lord Chancellor, and was re-appointed to that office by Lord Chancellor Law, and later still by the present Chancellor. He has discharged his duties as magistrate and as chairman of the Town Commissioners in an efficient and upright manner. He was strongly recommended to the Lord Chancellor for the Commission of the Peace for the county of Louth, to which the Lord Chancellor, after particular inquiry, appointed him. I believe the recommendation of his colleagues on the Town Commission, who best knew him, was unanimous. He presided at a meeting of the Town Commissioners of Dundalk, he being the chairman of that body, when the vote of condolence to Her Majesty, passed at a previous meeting, was rescinded simply on the ground of its having been irregularly entered on the minutes of the Board; but it is not true that he objected to such a vote being passed. On the point of his duty on this occasion he consulted the town clerk, and found that there was no other course which he could legally pursue. I cannot speak as to the intention of the Lord Chancellor as to future appointments further than merely to say that I am satisfied he will appoint fit and proper persons to the Commission of the Peace, for which I am advised that no qualification such as being the holder of property in the county is necessary. I have reason to believe, however, that Mr. Hamill holds property largely in the county of Louth, though the part of the county is the borough of Dundalk, and he is also a considerable landowner in an adjoining county. The general Return asked for cannot be given, as there are no materials for preparing it except as regards the appointments made by the present Lord Chancellor since his accession to Office.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSIONERS) — MR. WILLIAM GRAY.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. William Gray, who is one of the Sub-Commissioners for fixing rent in Ireland, is the same Mr. William Gray who is reported to have been in the habit of attending, and occasionally presiding at, political meetings where cheers for the suspects and the Land League, and cries of "no rent," and denunciations of landlordism were common topics, and who, in one speech, said :—

"If Griffiths' valuation of a farm be twenty shillings per acre, and the taxes, say, three shillings, then eight shillings and sixpence would be a fair rent. But I am not certain that, when the forces represented by steam, and the contemplated arrangements in America are fully carried out and developed, even this will not be an exorbitant rent ;"

and, in a speech on another occasion, is reported to have said :—

"The farmers did not get, as they should get, the benefit of the Healy Clause. . . . They would not, however, give up agitation ; and, before 1891, they would have another Act, which would be a greater improvement on the Act of 1881 than the Act of 1881 was on that of 1870. . . . Lord Monck was a landlord, Judge O'Hagan, who betrayed the early traditions of his youth, Litton, who by false promises was elected for Tyrone, and who now betrayed the farmers, and Vernon, were all landlords."

MR. TREVELYAN: At present I know of no authority for these statements, except an anonymous paragraph in a London evening newspaper ; but I am making inquiry on the subject. I hope the noble Lord (Lord Arthur Hill) will accept this as an answer to his Question on the same subject.

POST OFFICE—ADVERTISEMENTS OF TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether at any time he demanded royalty, at the rate of one-tenth of the charges of the Telephone Companies, for the insertion of advertisements in their own catalogues, printed at their own expense, for the use of their own subscribers ; and, if so, on what ground this demand was made, and why, having been made, it was abandoned ?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that at no time has a royalty been demanded for charges paid to the Telephone Companies for advertisements. A royalty was demanded on a certain payment of one guinea which was made by some subscribers to telephone exchanges in addition to their ordinary subscription ; but on the character of this payment being explained the demand was at once relinquished.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—NEWRY UNION.

MR. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that on the 31st March, several charges have been brought against Mr. Joseph Bell, the returning officer of the Newry Union, in relation to the recent election of three guardians for the Newry Division of that Union, viz.: that he rejected on illegal and frivolous grounds many votes tendered on one side, and that he recorded a large number of votes tendered on the other side, although same were objected to and ought not to have been received ; that his rulings were not consistent with each other, or with his decisions at previous elections ; and that, by these means, he contrived to give Messrs. Sinclair, Savage, and Todd a very small majority over the outgoing guardians, and declared them elected ; whether it is not also alleged that the returning officer wrongfully permitted several persons to remain in the Board room till late hours at night inspecting the papers relating to the election, contrary to the Workhouse regulations, and without the presence of any agent of the other side; whether it is also charged that the minute book has been falsified in relation to a motion which had been before the Board of Guardians in reference to the election; whether it is also charged that the porter's book, giving the hours of outgoing of the persons who had inspected the election papers, had been wrongfully altered, and that the returning officer's son refused to give the porter the names of the persons who had inspected the election papers, thereby rendering the porter unable to fulfil his duty by inserting the names in the book; whether complaints of these matters were sent to the Local Government Board as far back as 31st March, demanding a re-scrutiny and an inquiry, and whether the Local Government Board has since admitted that the returning officer was wrong in a large number of his rulings; and, whether it is the intention of the Local Government Board to direct a re-scrutiny of the disputed votes by a properly qualified person, and an investigation into the conduct of the returning officer as requested, and whether such re-scrutiny and investigation will be held without further delay?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is the case that charges of the kind mentioned in the Question were made, and have been the subject of much correspondence. Several votes were found to have been improperly recorded for all the candidates; but the rejection of such votes would not disturb the return of Messrs. Sinclair, Savage, and Todd. The Local Government Board cannot institute a general scrutiny of all votes recorded at the election; but I understand that a day or two ago they addressed a letter to the hon. Member with reference to several specific votes objected to, and that they are prepared to entertain any further objections to particular votes. The Board also, as I understand, furnished the hon. Member with the Returning Officer's explanation as to the complaint respecting the presence of persons in the workhouse, and the alleged falsification of the minute book, and they await any further observations he may make on the subject. They cannot decide, while the correspondence is going on, whether an inquiry is necessary or not.

Mr. Small

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND —SYLLABUS OF LECTURES.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a letter of the Very Reverend Dr. Walsh, a Member of the Senate of the Royal University and of its Standing Committee, published in The Freeman's Journal of May 3rd, in which the writer states that—

"As a matter of fact, neither the Senate of the Royal University, nor its Standing Committee, nor, so far as I know, any individual member of either body, has had any opportunity of in any way considering the merits of, or consequently pronouncing any opinion upon, the proposal," that Fellows of the Royal University should publish an annually revised syllabus of their lectures, with a view to securing absolute fairness of University examinations; and, whether he has any observations to make upon the letter of the Very Reverend Dr. Walsh, as it is in apparent contradiction to the statement he was understood to make that the preponderance of opinion among the authorities of the Royal University is not favourable to the proposal?

MR. TREVELYAN: What I said was that, so far as I had been able to ascertain, the preponderance of opinion among gentlemen in responsible positions in connection with the Queen's Colleges and the Royal University was unfavourable to the proposition contained in the hon. Member's inquiry. What I said as to the Royal University was gathered from the answer which I received from the secretaries. I have no doubt that Dr. Walsh is right in saying that the Senate and Standing Committee were not consulted. I suppose there was no time to consult them. There will be an opportunity for those interested to raise this question before the Commission.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—NEWRY UNION —SALARY OF THE MASTER OF THE WORKHOUSE.

MR. LEAHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the Newry Board of Guardians, which at present contains several members whose elections were disputed, intends to increase by £20 the salary of the master, who, until fourteen months ago, was porter of the House at less than half of his present salary, and who was censured by the Board a few months ago; and, whether the Local Government approves of such action under the circumstances?

MR. TREVELYAN: There are some Guardians on the Newry Board whose elections were disputed; but, even if they have been improperly returned, which has not yet been proved, the circumstance would not affect the decision of the Board of Guardians on a point such as that referred to, as the hon. Member will see by a reference to Section 30 of the Poor Relief Act—

“The Guardians are, on the 10th instant, pursuant to notice, to consider a proposition to increase the Master’s salary; and if they resolve to do so, the Local Government Board will give the matter the necessary consideration; but the objection which has been lodged against the election of certain Guardians affords no reason for the postponement by the Guardians of the discussion on the subject.”

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—THE RABBITS IN RICHMOND PARK.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been drawn to two men having been convicted and sentenced to a month’s hard labour for having committed a trespass upon Richmond Park in search of rabbits, and to the fact that the witnesses against them were a carter to the Board of Works, who watched them for an hour, and a “watcher,” who was sent to watch certain dead rabbits which had been hidden; whether it is the business of carters in the employ of the Board of Works to act as guardians of the rabbits in Richmond Park; whether the “watcher” is paid out of public funds, and what are his functions; and, who has the right to shoot or trap the rabbits in Richmond Park?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The matter referred to has not been specially brought under the notice of my Department, as it concerns the Ranger. The watchers are paid out of money voted by Parliament. It is their duty to watch the deer and to preserve order after the park constables go off their duty. If, in the course of their duty, they see offences being committed, it is their duty to interfere. The right to shoot or trap rabbits in Richmond Park is in the gift of the Queen. The Duke of Cambridge, who is the Ranger, exercises this right at the present time, and bears all the expense of feeding and preserving the game. The carter referred to in the Question was not, on the occasion mentioned, spending the time for which he was paid by the Office of Works. He has not, therefore, been paid for watching out of the public funds. I believe the public like to see the rabbits running about the park.

MR. LABOUCHERE observed that the public would also like to shoot those rabbits; but he would like to know from what source the Chief Commissioner derived his information that the carter was not paid out of public money?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was informed that the carter was doing this work out of his ordinary working hours, and, therefore, was not paid out of public money.

ARMY—EXAMINATIONS FOR PROMOTION.

EARL PERCY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can now inform the House what steps he proposes to take with regard to the system of examination of officers for promotion in the Army; and, whether he can afford any relief to those who have suffered from the present regulations?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: After carefully looking into the subject, I have come to the conclusion that the aggregate of marks required—namely, 55, is too high, and that it should be reduced to the former standard—namely, 5. The aggregate was, I understand, increased to compensate for a reduction which was simultaneously made in the minimum of each subject; but, on the whole, I think that the old aggregate standard was sufficiently high. I have also carefully considered the circumstances of the last examination in which so many officers failed to qualify. I find that in one of the examination papers there was, unfortunately, a typographical error which, though not of great importance, undoubtedly did prejudicially affect the papers of several of those who failed to qualify; and I have, therefore, decided that the record of that examination, so far as it regards the unsuccessful candidates, shall be cancelled, and that they shall be allowed another trial at the examination in July.

that the Government have decided to postpone the Purchase Clauses Bill until the 11th of June; and if it is intended to introduce the Bill before the adjournment for the Whitsun holidays?

MR. TREVELYAN: There is no foundation whatever for the report, which only reached my eyes through an allusion to it in a leading article in The Daily Express. I have every reason to believe that the Bill shall be introduced before the Whitsuntide holidays; and as far as the preparation of the Bill is concerned, that can be no obstacle at all.

THE PUBLIC OFFICES — THE NEW ADMIRALTY BUILDINGS.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I wish to take this opportunity of explaining and apologizing for a mistake into which I fell in answering a Question put to me in Committee this morning by my right hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir John Hay) in reference to the new Admiralty buildings. He asked me whether the Estimates for them would contain provisions for a house for the First Lord? I then said it was a question which ought rather to have been addressed to my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works, and I have now to pay the penalty of having undertaken to answer for another Department. When I last saw the proposals they did contain a provision for such a house. Since then they have been more fully considered, and now it is not intended to include a house for the First Lord in the new building.

SIR JOHN HAY: I will only say that while my hon. Friend makes this announcement I hope he still adheres to the excellent reason which he gave as to whether the First Lord should have a house—namely, that it was absolutely necessary in time of war.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

[BILL. 3.] SECOND READING.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. T. A. Dickson

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. WARTON, in moving that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months, contended that, taking into consideration the grave and heavy penalties that were enacted last year by the Act having reference to Parliamentary elections, time, at any rate, should be given to ascertain how that experiment would work before the same principle was extended to municipal elections. As a rule, when penalties were too heavy they were found to defeat themselves, and it was his impression that they would do so in the Act of last year; and therefore he thought that time ought to be given to see whether the heavy penalties imposed by that Act would defeat their own objects or not. But surely it was unreasonable to apply to elections for Poor Law Guardians and members of school boards the same penalties that were provided with regard to Parliamentary elections. Where the present Bill departed from the Act of last Session the change was for the worse—namely, the omission of the excellent principle of a maximum expenditure, which he considered would be much more effectual than heavy penalties in preventing corrupt practices. It was his opinion that no men would be found to offer themselves as candidates for the petty offices to be obtained at municipal elections if they had to run the risk of all the heavy penalties which men who were desirous of becoming Members of Parliament had to run. For these reasons he begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

MR. BIGGAR said, he seconded the Motion for the rejection of the Bill, though he disagreed very much from a part of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport's speech relating to public-houses. He himself held very firmly the opinion that the part of the Bill which prohibited the holding of election meetings in public-houses was most valuable, and if its other provisions were equally valuable, he should not oppose the measure. Such meetings could do no good to anyone except the publican. They demoralized the supporters of the candidate in whose supposed interest they were convened, and they increased the election expenses very substantially. There were other parts of the Bill to

The Government have placed Monday at the disposal of my right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who is to bring forward a Motion with regard to General Gordon. I am anxious, and all my Friends are anxious, that hon. Members should compress their speeches as much as possible; but it will be absolutely impossible to conclude the debate in one night, and I wish to know whether the Government can in any way assist us? I have also to ask hon. Members who have Notices down for Tuesday to allow us to continue the debate on that day. The Government are going to give precedence to the Motion of my right hon. Friend at the Tuesday Morning Sitting. I presume it will be impossible, or very inconvenient, to rescind the Order that has been made with regard to Tuesday Morning Sittings. Undoubtedly, however, it would be well if we could meet at 4 on Tuesday; but if that cannot be, we shall debate the Motion from 2 till 7, and then we shall resume at 9 o'clock. Now, there are 12 Notices of Motion and eight Orders of the Day on the Paper for Tuesday evening. The Notices of Motion are not as formidable as they appear to be at first sight, for many of them hang together. If it would be possible for those hon. Members in whose names the Notices stand to signify their willingness to allow their Motions to be set aside, we could make some arrangement with reference to the Bills set down as Orders of the Day, and the debate could be finished at the Evening Sitting. It would, of course, be more convenient to take a 4 o'clock Sitting.

MR. GLADSTONE: I can only answer the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman so far as I am myself concerned. It would be of no advantage to entertain the proposal to rescind for Tuesday the resolution to which we have come—for this reason, among others, that if we were to rescind it, the effect would be that the Government would lose all power of giving any facility to the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends for their Motion on Tuesday. If we were to agree to meet at 4 on that day, the same application to hon. Gentlemen who have Notices on the Paper would still have to be made which has now to be made with regard to the Evening Sitting. We have, therefore, I think, done all that lies in our power. But considering the inconvenience of a fixed term for the closing of the debate, I shall be glad to support any application which the right hon. Gentleman may make to Members to waive their privileges at 9 o'clock on Tuesday evening; and likewise, with respect to the Orders of the Day, I think that it will be desirable to postpone all the Motions and Orders until after the debate with respect to General Gordon.

EGYPT—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he wished to put two Questions to the Prime Minister. The first was, whether the proposed Conference on the subject of the finances of Egypt was to be held in London or Constantinople? The second Question arose out of an answer given by the Prime Minister yesterday, when he declined to give a pledge that other matters besides the Law of Liquidation would not be considered by the Conference. He wished to know whether the basis of the Conference and the limits of the questions to be discussed had been fixed; and whether the Prime Minister would communicate them to the House before the meeting of the Conference?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the first Question of the hon. and gallant Member, I do not think that the place of meeting has yet been absolutely settled. With regard to the second Question, I have to say that the basis of the Conference is really settled by the indication sent out by Lord Granville, which has been laid on the Table of the House. What I have already said amounts to this—that a discretionary power remains to raise any other question than that proposed by the Government; but no other question is within the actual range of the Conference, and if any other question should be raised it would be a new question, and it would be like calling a new Conference. We cannot undertake that the Conference shall forego the opportunity of raising a new question at a given time.

PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. T. A. DICKSON: I would ask the Chief Secretary if there is any foundation for the statement which appears in several of the Irish papers, did not see the smallest practical difficulty in the way of a Schedule limiting the expenses of elections in particular wards in the same way that expenses were now limited in particular constituencies. He would, therefore, ask the Attorney General whether he would undertake to engraft upon this Bill the most valuable feature of the previous enactment? If something were not done in this direction, he feared that the flood of corruption at municipal elections would be very largely increased.

MR. MONK said, he thought the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman well deserved the attention of the Attorney General. There was another matter which he desired to bring to the notice of his hon. and learned Friend, and that had reference to the presentation of Petitions. There ought to be some official, say the Director of Public Prosecutions or his substitute, who should not only attend the trial of these Petitions, but be required to aid in the presentation of them in cases where there were grounds for believing that corrupt and illegal practices had largely prevailed. Very few Petitions would be presented if the matter were left to the electors; and he would, therefore, suggest that the Public Prosecutor should be authorized to present a Petition whenever his attention had been called to the prevalence of corrupt practices, and he had satisfied himself by a preliminary investigation that there was a foundation for the charge. That was a subject, however, which could be dealt with in Committee on the Bill.

MR. DAWSON said, he was all in favour of securing purity of election, either at Parliamentary or municipal contests; but the reason he objected to the principles of this Bill was because of its application to Ireland. He thought it was not fair to apply the same rigorous restrictions to a country the conditions of whose municipal life were entirely different to those of this country. The provisions of the Bill were exceedingly severe, and if they were applied to the small constituencies of Ireland they would practically annihilate Irish municipal constituencies altogether. After pointing out the unequal and limited character of the municipal franchise in Ireland, and the rigorous manner in which the provisions of the Bill, if carried out, would work in connection with the punishment of electors, the hon. Member asked the House to consider the nature of the Courts in Ireland with their political bias. When this was considered, he thought the measure was a dangerous one to bring forward in the present narrow condition of the Irish franchise. In England there was a household municipal franchise, which even admitted women; in every town in Ireland, except Dublin, the qualification was £10, which meant in the towns of Ireland a rental equivalent to £25 or £30. Then they had a system of registration which prevailed in that country by which the landlords were returned instead of the occupiers—a state of things which was inimical to the rights of the people. The City of Limerick had nearly 40,000 people within the municipal boundary; yet, owing to the restrictions and the high qualifications, the number of municipal electors was only about 400. This extraordinary condition of things—high qualifications in a city of small wealth—led to a result which he would relate. There was one ward in Limerick where only 30 burgesses in a population of 8,000 or 10,000 people were on the list. Out of these, when the election came some had died and some were absent, and there were not available the 16 persons required by law to sign the nomination paper. They were often told how violent and unconstitutional were the people of Limerick and of Ireland. But could it be otherwise when they were thus deprived of the means of exercising political influence? In Dublin a law was passed which, although the Preamble promised everything, gave nothing. With a view of equalizing the Dublin franchise to that of England, household suffrage for municipal elections was declared; but a rider was added that, before a person could exercise this suffrage, he must have resided there for three years, which was taking away with one hand what the other gave. The result was that Dublin, with a population of 300,000, had only 6,000 or 7,000 municipal electors, while the same population in an English city would produce about 50,000 or 60,000 electors. Therefore, to apply this Bill to Ireland under the circumstances he had mentioned, and to bring Petitions before Courts which were, unfortunately, animated by political hostility to the bulk of the Irish people, was to sanction the passing of a facile machinery by which the small remnants of municipal life existing in the country would be wiped out.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he had listened with attention to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard), and he was quite at a loss to know why he should vote against the second reading of the Bill. He understood the hon. and learned Member to say that, unless some maximum amount of expenses was stated, the want of a limitation would be made a sort of auxiliary step to the corruption which would go on in an indirect way in Parliamentary elections. He concurred in that opinion. He believed the real advantage of this Bill was to be found in the fact that it would prevent, to a great extent, that mode of corruption which had been practised in Parliamentary elections through the medium of corruption prevailing in municipal boroughs. He could not see, however, why the question of expenses should not be dealt with separately in a Schedule containing a scale of maximum expenses, and which might be inserted in Committee. It seemed to him that the whole argument of the hon. and learned Member was really an inducement to the House to read the Bill a second time, and to amend it as far as possible in Committee. A great deal of difficulty had been felt by hon. Members in consequence of the Motion by the Attorney General to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee instead of the Committee of the Whole House. So far as the hon. Member went, his own impression was that it was a measure which might well be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. That, of course, depended together on the nature of the subject, but they had also to consider the character of the business in the House. They had to consider the character of the business pending before the House. This was done by the hon. Member, and that the number of the Bill was before Parliament was a fact which all the time was a vote to them. Before, the Bill was in favour of the Standing Committee. MR. SPENCER was a speaker on the subject in the

and learned Member was not in Order in anticipating the discussion.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he begged to submit to the ruling of the Chair. With reference to the tribunal appointed to try these corrupt practices at municipal elections, he thought the penalties imposed by this Act were as severe as those imposed under the Parliamentary elections. It was well known that the tribunal which tried corrupt practices at Parliamentary elections consisted now of two Judges, although originally there was only one. No doubt the House was also aware that under the Municipal Corporation Act corrupt practices at municipal elections were not tried before a Judge, but before a barrister, who was appointed Commissioner for that purpose. He tried the cases alone and without a jury. It was he thought, worthy the consideration of the House whether it would not be desirable to appoint two barristers instead of one to try these petitions in reference to municipal elections. This was a subject which was a subject of the Committee of the Whole House. He intended to move that the Bill should be referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

municipal franchise; and if that was the case, he thought there would be no objection to the Bill being extended to that country. The penalties contained in the measure might, perhaps, be too severe; but that was not a point that touched its principle, which was the prevention of corrupt practices. Considering the present state of Public Business in the House, he was inclined to support the Attorney General in wishing to have the Bill referred, after its second reading, to a Standing Committee, where it might be dealt with speedily and in a practical manner.

MR. GRAY said, the question was whether, without any case at all having been made, and on the bare possibility which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Serjeant Simon) thought might arise of corruption hereafter existing in Irish municipalities, this House ought to be called upon to pass a very stringent and severe Corrupt Practices Code for Ireland. He did not think that was a principle upon which this House had been accustomed to act. Some kind of case was usually made by those who proposed important changes in the law such as this. He did not profess to know much about the way in which English municipal elections were manipulated; but he relied upon the assurances which had been given by the English Members on both sides of the House that corruption existed to an enormous degree in certain English municipalities, and that it was exceedingly difficult to prevent bribery. If that were really the character of English municipalities, he should be happy to assist English Members to pass the necessary Code for the prevention and punishment of those abuses. When hon. Members proposed to pass a similar Bill for Ireland, he said—"Show me some reason for it. Give me cases of corruption in Irish municipalities such as have been quoted from England, where hundreds of electors were bought for a pot of beer per head;" and then, even though the franchise was restricted, he should join in seeking to put an end to such abuses. But if no such things could be shown, if it were granted, as was the fact, that Irish municipal elections were pure, then there was no reason for extending this Bill to Ireland. Why should the Bill be extended to Ireland, and not to Scotland? They all knew that their Scotch friends were pure in everything. He observed the hon. and learned Attorney General taking notes. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL dissented.] He begged the Attorney General's pardon—he meant the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He had not any intention of accusing the hon. and learned Attorney General of knowing anything about Irish affairs. The Solicitor General for Ireland, if he should speak on this subject, would admit there was no such thing as corruption in Irish municipal elections. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND assented.] The hon. and learned Gentleman signified his assent; and if that were so, it was not right that a Bill of this kind should be extended to Ireland until some cause had been shown. They had no confidence in the administration of the law in Ireland. They did not believe that those who would have the administration of this Bill, when passed into law, would be impartial. If they thought differently, and if they believed it would not be used by those administering it for political purposes, he would have no objection to it being passed, though it were only for the purpose of meeting the hypothetical case of the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken; but, in view of the arguments he and his Friends had urged, he believed a strong case had been made out for the exclusion of Ireland from the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped that the House would shortly be allowed to go to a Division. The necessity for that Bill had been admitted, and the question of its form had been much discussed. The principal criticisms passed upon it had reference to the absence of the maximum Schedule which appeared in the Act of last Session relating to Parliamentary elections. That Schedule was his own creation, and he would not have omitted it from the present Bill without good reason; but, having sought assistance from those who, quite irrespective of Party motives, had had practical knowledge and experience of municipal matters both in large and small boroughs, he found that there was a great concurrence of opinion against the introduction of that maximum Schedule into the present Bill, and on that account he had not introduced it. What had been put to him—and he thought it had great force—was, that it was desired to make it easy for men to enter local councils, to throw no obstacles in the way, and to get a better class of men if they could into those councils. The enforcement of a maximum Schedule for municipal elections would involve the adoption of the complicated and expensive machinery of the Parliamentary Act; and he was told that if this were done all the better class of residents would be deterred from having anything to do with municipal elections. If certain things, such as the payment of messengers, agents, and canvassers, the hiring of rooms, and the conveyance of voters, were forbidden, there was no opportunity for lavish expenditure, as the bribery at municipal elections was of an indirect rather than a direct character. If anyone would attempt to draw a Schedule equally applicable to a ward containing many thousand voters, and a ward containing only 100 or 200, he would find the difficulty of laying down a maximum of any kind that would be reasonable in both cases.

MR. ONSLOW asked whether the hon. and learned Gentleman could name any of the small boroughs that had been consulted?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had had a mass of correspondence and many interviews; and, while he could not specify any particular boroughs, he should be glad to satisfy the hon. Member privately. He had included Ireland in the Bill so as to obviate any objection that there was not to be equal law for the two countries. With regard to the Amendment which had been placed upon the Paper by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and also the expressed opinion which had fallen from the hon. Member for Carlow upon the phase of the question relating to Ireland—

MR. GRAY: I merely stated that I did not desire to suggest anything to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), continuing, said, that on the subject of Ireland he was about to state that some of the hon. Member's views upon the Bill were presented very strongly. It was quite true there had been no petition for corrupt practices at municipal elections in Ireland. He would, however, ask, was the hon. Member aware that the Act of 1872, which controlled municipal elections, was still in force, and applied to Ireland, and if this Bill was not passed would still apply with full force? The hon. Member for the County Carlow had dwelt strongly upon the subject, and had, no doubt, put his case very clearly. However, he would ask the Irish Members to consider that if this Bill, did not become law, the objectionable portions of the former Act would still remain the same. What had been objectionable in those parts of the former Act which applied to municipal elections were by this Bill given a new definition. If, however, this Bill were not passed into law, the old definitions under the Act of 1872 would still be enforced. If, after the Irish Members had considered the effect of that Act, they still thought that Ireland should not be included in the present Bill, and if the majority of the House were of the same opinion, the Government would have the greatest desire to do what was right. By mistake the Bill had not been extended to Scotland; but that would be amended in Committee. He desired to repeat that the inclusion of Ireland was a question upon which the opinion and votes of the Irish Members would have the fullest and most extreme weight.

MR. LEWIS said, the first part of the speech of the Attorney General furnished sufficient grounds for voting against the Bill, for it was a forcible statement of the objections which he (Mr. Lewis) took last year on the principal Bill. A painful picture had been drawn of the incomprehensible difficulties in which a respectable citizen of a small country borough would be placed by this Bill. All the miserable definitions of new crimes which were set forth last year were repeated. The hon. and learned Gentleman might have stated that candidates must not spend more than £500 upon an election, and have left out all those wretched and frivolous details. The candidate was now to be directed how he should conduct himself night and morning. They were told they must not have a blue ribbon; they might eat one thing, but not another; they might meet in one sort of club-room, but not in another. All these and other tyrannical inventions were the outcome of the modern Liberalism of the 19th century. For a long time he had been unable to discover the object of the Bill; but at last he had found that its object was to find work for the Grand Committee on Law, which had such ill-success last year with the Criminal Law Amendment Bill. They could not make that stalking-horse serve their purpose any longer, for that wretched creaking old mare, the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, had ultimately broken down. The Government said to themselves that corruption was out of favour; they were fond of so-called purity, and so they would have a new purity Bill. Having done all they could to make Parliamentary candidates miserable, the Government had turned their attention to municipal elections, and proposed to worry the country grocers and drapers. They had even proposed to apply this Bill to ladies who submitted themselves as candidates at School Board elections; but who ever heard of Mrs. Fenwick Miller, Mrs. Westlake, or Miss Hill being guilty of corrupt practices, or resorting to little wheedlements, caresses, or embraces in order to secure votes? Where was the corruption suggested by the Attorney General in connection with School Board elections? Did he, before he took an affectionate leave of Taunton, mean to suggest that corruption existed in connection with the election of the School Board there?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there was no School Board at Taunton.

Mr. LEWIS said, he was delighted to find that the Liberal Party had not succeeded in visiting Taunton with that infliction. He had never before heard it suggested that School Board elections were corrupt. This was just the sort of legislation which, in the good Radical time to come, they should have repeated over and over again. The Bill might be inscribed with the motto, parodying the words in a famous novel—"Here is an election; let's have a petition," so needless and irritating were the majority of its provisions. How could the Government say that they trusted the people, when they would not allow a School Board election to take place without providing that a barrister might be sent down to institute an inquiry into the circumstances of the election in order to ascertain whether corrupt practices had existed? The Bill applied to Poor Law Guardians, School Boards, and Town Commissioners, and in every case where there was an election the people might indulge in the prospect of a petition. They had heard that if in a Parliamentary election general corrupt practices existed, a candidate, even if he knew nothing about those corrupt practices, might be unseated. That doctrine, which was said to rest upon Common Law, was to be introduced for the first time by the 16th clause of this Bill into elections for Town Councils, Boards of Guardians, Town Commissioners, and School Boards. That clause showed that the Bill had been entered upon by the Government without due consideration.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) explained that the 16th clause did not refer to corrupt practices, but only applied to illegal practices.

Mr. LEWIS said, that that made his objection all the stronger. The fact was the Bill contained nothing to recommend it to the consideration of the House. The Attorney General, in his Bill of last year, had two modes of annoyance—he limited the aggregate expenditure, and directed the mode of its application. For the former some excuse could be made; but that was the part now abandoned by the Attorney General, while he retained the latter and more objectionable detail. The objections of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland who sat below the Gangway were of a very peculiar character. If some evil was to be done to England which it was not proposed to inflict upon Ireland, they complained that the two countries were not dealt with on an equal footing. He thought it was quite clear that there was as much ground for the suggestion that impurity existed in connection with Irish municipal elections as there was for the statement that corrupt practices existed in municipal elections in England. Ireland was no better than England and no worse. The Bill, on the whole, was contemptible and worthless; it was the mere breaking of the fly on the wheel; and a specimen of the Radical legislation they were to have in the good coming times.

Mr. SEXTON said, that the mind of the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House appeared to be in a very confused condition as to the relative cases which England and Ireland presented upon the present question. Where the circumstances of the two countries were similar they should be equally judged by the same laws. No such case had, however, been made out by the hon. and learned Gentleman who introduced the Bill. The most corrupt and insidious forms of bribery had been practised upon the burgesses in England; but no such thing was known in Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman had himself said that no cases of bribery were known in Ireland. Municipal and Parliamentary elections in Ireland were conducted upon entirely different lines to those in England; and therefore the circumstances of the case of Ireland did not call for the provisions of this Bill, which would be superfluous. So far as he could see at present, he would be disposed to say that Ireland should be struck out of the Bill. They had a struggle last year to procure a clearer and safer definition of the offence of undue influence, as they feared that in certain cases in Ireland the Courts might be inclined to deal harshly with the clergy. He recognized the spirit shown by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had charge of the Bill when he stated that if it was the opinion of the Irish Members that Ireland should not be included he was ready to strike the clause out. The Irish Members, during the interval which would elapse between the present stage of the Bill and the Committee stage, would look more closely into the matter, and ascertain what public opinion in Ireland was upon the subject. The Irish Members would, therefore, now cease from discussing the Bill; but reserve for the present giving their opinion as to the advisability of retaining or striking the clause out.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he would not detain the House any longer than to say he disagreed with the hon. Member for Sligo. He felt bound to enter his protest against the statement that no improper influence was used in municipal and Poor Law elections in Ireland. The clergy in elections in Ireland extensively used improper influence. He regarded it as most important that this Bill, if it passed at all in that House, should pass for Ireland as well as England.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

MR. WARTON said, he rose to ask the ruling of the Speaker on a matter which affected the powers, privileges, and rights of the House. In ordinary Bills they always had opportunity for discussion on the second reading and also upon the stage of going into Committee; but this Bill was to be referred to a Standing Committee, and would thereby be taken out of the cognizance of the House. The point of Order was this—whether, seeing that the Attorney General was now seeking to take two stages of the Bill, the House should not have a full, free, and fair discussion on the Motion for referring it to a Grand Committee?

MR. SPEAKER: On the question of Order, I have to say that the point raised by the hon. and learned Member was raised in April of last year, and was emphatically decided by my Predecessor in the Chair. His ruling was to this effect—that after the second reading, on the Motion to refer the Bill to a Standing Committee, there was not the same latitude of discussion allowed as upon the question that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House. It is not competent—that was the effect of the ruling—to discuss the whole merits and principle of a Bill upon the Motion that it be referred to a Standing Committee. But it will be for the House to take into account the specific considerations which point, on the one hand, to a reference to a Standing Committee, and on the other to a reference to a Committee of the Whole House as the preferable tribunal. There is an express provision that the Standing Order for the consideration of a Bill as amended does not apply to a Bill which has come back to this House from a Standing Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure.”—(Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he rose to propose, as an Amendment, that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House. He would frankly say that he was not himself in favour of Grand Committees, and he believed that all the Members who served on them last year had come to the conclusion that where there was no great principle to be discussed those Committees might possibly work; but that where principles were to be raised and there was to be serious opposition, there were grave doubts whether the Standing Committees would do the work for which they were appointed. The Standing Order with reference to the subject said that two Standing Committees be appointed, one dealing with Bills relating to law and Courts of Justice, and the other with Bills relating to trade and manufacture. He had never understood what was there meant by "law." Such a Bill as that upon the Paper relating to the Law of Evidence and the Bill of last year relating to legal procedure might be referred to the Standing Committee on Law. But here was a Bill which might subject members of Town Councils, for instance, to deprivation of their privileges for a long time; and he did not think it was one of the Bills contemplated by the Standing Order to which he had referred. At all events, it was for the House to consider whether this was the sort of Bill to be referred to a Standing Committee. The Prime Minister agreed to the insertion of words proposed by him to the effect that it was for the House to decide in each case whether a Bill was to be sent to a Standing Committee or not. It was, therefore, for the House to consider whether this was not a Bill which would be better considered in Committee of the Whole House. There was another important question. When the Corrupt Practices Bill of last year was introduced it was stated by the Attorney General that there should be a maximum of expenditure, which was a vital principle of the Bill. In this Bill there was nothing of the kind, and that was a question which ought to be discussed by the House itself; for it should be recollected that the very same people who would be employed at municipal elections would be employed at Parliamentary elections. He begged to move that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "referred to," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Committee of the whole House,"—(Sir R. Assheton Cross),—in-stand thereof.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

MR. TOMLINSON contended that the House, by its action last year in reference to the Corrupt Practices Bill, was precluded from referring the present Bill to the Grand Committee on Law. The Bill was one which could not adequately be considered but by the House itself.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, Her Majesty's Government would labour under a very serious misapprehension and a very great delusion if they thought the House of Commons was prepared to surrender its functions to any body, Grand Committee, Standing Committee, or otherwise. With regard to these so-called and mis-called Grand Committees, they were told by the Prime Minister not long ago that by their machinery nothing less than a revolution would be effected in the mode of conducting Public Business, and that the capacity of the House of Commons to discharge the functions of a Senate would be largely increased. But now the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to admit that his new methods of procedure were a failure. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Not at all.] The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster also prophesied great results from the institution of Grand Committees, saying that the House would be like a giant working with many hands. Now, however, Grand Committees as means for enabling the House to discharge important legislative duties, had practically been given up by the Government; for this Session no Bill of even third-rate importance was to be referred to a Grand Committee. The Government had realized that the House was determined not to allow Bills of first, second, or even third rank to be withdrawn from its cognizance. Every Member of the House had a duty to discharge towards his constituents and the country, and his responsibility was not diminished in the least by the reference of a Bill to a so-called Grand Committee. That being so, Members must narrowly criticize Bills referred to such Committees at the stage of Report. He objected altogether to the delegation or devolution of Parliamentary responsibility. The Prime Minister had called these Grand Committees a great experiment. How long did the right hon. Gentleman intend to make this House a chopping-block for experiments in legislation of this kind? If the experiment of last Session would not convince the Government of the failure of these so-called Grand Committees he was at a loss to know what would. Of all subjects, matters of law were least suited to be dealt with by a Grand Committee, for those Members who had the advantage or disadvantage of a legal training were unable, owing to the pressure of their other duties, to attend such Committees. The Members who commanded the greatest weight were the most absent. This scheme of Grand Committees had been a signal, and, he might add, a well-merited failure; and he hoped the Government would withdraw the Motion to refer this Bill to a Grand Committee.

MR. GLADSTONE: I shall not reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because, were I to do so, I should be grossly abusing my privileges as a Member of this House. [Colonel MAKINS: Oh, oh!] The hon. and gallant Member for South Essex interrupts me with exclamations.

COLONEL MAKINS: No; I did not.

MR. GLADSTONE: Do I understand the hon. and gallant Member denies he interrupted me?

COLONEL MAKINS: I had no intention of interrupting the right hon. Gentleman. I merely expressed my disapproval of what the right hon. Gentleman said.

MR. GLADSTONE: Well, perhaps he will allow me to say why I used the expression; and then let the hon. and gallant Member, if he likes, renew his exclamation. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman, from beginning to end, was a speech on the question whether there ought to be Grand Committees at all; and inasmuch as that question has long ago been settled, and it was perfectly well understood among us at the time of the discussion that on a Motion for the reference of a Bill to a Grand Committee the only question to be debated should be whether that Bill was a suitable Bill to be referred, therefore I say that a speech on the general question of Grand Committees on this occasion is an abuse of the privileges of a Member of the House. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was in marked contrast to that of the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire, for although the right hon. Gentleman very frankly admitted his objections to Grand Committees as a whole, the bulk of what he said was as to the fitness of the present Bill to be referred. What were the allegations of the right hon. Gentleman? He urged that this Bill could be better discussed in Committee of the Whole House. I am free to say that if it were a question of a state of things where we had a perfect capacity of discussing all measures in Committee of the Whole House, I should think it better that they should be so discussed. But this is an expedient to enable the House to do its duty, and to meet a state of things under which that duty cannot be done. Then the right hon. Gentleman said there were certain points in the Bill that were points of principle and not fit to be raised in a Grand Committee. So far as that is concerned, I freely admitted at the time that any such points of principle might be excluded from the reference, or might be considered again when the Bill came back. The right hon. Gentleman says that the question of whether there should be a maximum placed on the expenditure at municipal elections is a question of principle that ought not to be referred. I must say that I do not see that that proposal is of such importance and of such sweeping character as to render it incompetent for the Committee to decide upon it. I do not see why it cannot be rediscussed, if necessary, in this House, if Members are not satisfied with the way in which the Committee may deal with it. The right hon. Gentleman said that he did not understand how this could be considered a question of law. He said that all Bills were Bills of law in a certain sense. But in the most restricted sense no Bill is one of law. This Bill mainly deals with penalties for certain offences, and is therefore, I think, eminently associated with the class of Law Bills. The right hon. Gentleman will bear in mind that we gave Notice at the beginning of the Session that it was intended to refer this Bill to a Grand Committee, and the present proposal is only in pursuance of that arrangement. The right hon. Gentleman has not shown any cause why this Bill should not be so referred; and while I regret the necessity under which the House of Commons now suffers of devolving some of its duties on any subordinate body, yet the House has deliberately and advisedly adopted the principle of Grand Committees, and nothing that has been said has shown that this Bill is not perfectly well suited, in every practical point of view, for reference to a Grand Committee.

COLONEL MAKINS said, the Prime Minister had commenced his remarks with a somewhat savage attack on the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther); and when he (Colonel Makins) ventured to interject the monosyllabic remark "Oh!" the Prime Minister left off worrying his right hon. Friend, and turned with equal savageness upon him. He heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire, and it dealt with two points—the question of Grand Committees generally, and the desirability of referring this particular Bill to a Grand Committee. With regard to the first portion of the speech, no doubt there was some justification for the warmth of the Prime Minister; but, with regard to the speech as a whole, the Prime Minister was not justified in the attack which he made. At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman's remarks had had the good effect of drawing a speech from the Prime Minister, and thus preventing what would have been a public scandal. The late Home Secretary made a Motion, and there was no reply from the opposite Bench, except the cry of "Divide!" from the Attorney General.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I beg pardon. I never made such a remark at all.

COLONEL MAKINS said, that, at any rate, the hon. and learned Gentleman did not reply, nor did any other Member on the Government Bench; and had it not been that his right hon. Friend rose, the debate would have terminated. Therefore, he thought the right hon. Gentleman's speech had had a good effect. Speaking for himself, he would not be deterred from expressing his disapproval of anything he objected to; and he protested against the uncalled-for attack which the Prime Minister had made upon him.

MR. RAIKES said, the House had, unfortunately, become recently only too familiar with these attempts on the part of the Prime Minister to interfere with the course of debate, and to consider any expression of opinion distasteful to himself as being an abuse of the Privileges of the House. What had occurred was entirely due to the unwillingness of the Government to justify the proposal which he had submitted to the House. It was, however, to be hoped that there would not be an exhibition of the same sort for some time to come. The question of penalties to be imposed in respect of acts connected with the performance of public duty was one that ought to be discussed in the House; there was hardly a question upon which it was more important to preserve the Constitutional rights of Her Majesty's subjects; and if the Bill was referred to a Grand Committee he would reserve the Amendments which he intended moving, and bring them forward on the Report stage, when they could be adequately discussed. He was inclined to think that the difficulties of the Bill in the Standing Committee might, perhaps, lead to a proposal to have it re-committed in the whole House when it returned. He protested against the attempt of the Government to coerce the House into a renunciation of its Privileges of debate.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 206; Noes 149: Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 90.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill referred to the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure.

LAW OF EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.—[BILL 4.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Hareourt, Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had not given some reason for sending this Bill to the Standing Committee. It was not a Bill of any great length; it contained very few clauses; but it made a change in the Law of Evidence which was of the greatest importance. Hitherto the House had been dealing with a Bill of a technical character, containing a considerable number of clauses relating to a subject which, so far as Parliamentary elections were concerned, had been dealt with by Parliament at a recent date. No doubt, there was something to be said in favour of sending the measure dealing with corrupt practices at municipal elections to the Standing Committee. He did not believe that the reference would be successful, because it was clear that questions of great importance would be raised after that Bill had left the Standing Committee and come back to the House. He feared, therefore, the time of the Standing Committee on that measure would be wasted, as it had been wasted last year. But if the Attorney General wished this Bill to become law, he would put it to the hon. and learned Gentleman whether, instead of placing it behind the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, in its reference to the Committee, he had not better give some reasonable opportunity for the discussion of such a Bill in the House itself, by passing it through Committee there? He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman was not really consulting either the interests of this measure, or the fair discussion of the great principle which was involved, by referring such a measure to the Standing Committee.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he had no objection to see this Bill referred to the Standing Committee; but he thought the House had not had a fair opportunity of discussing the principle of the Bill in the House itself. The change proposed by the Bill—whether right or wrong he did not say—was of the greatest importance, and involved considerations of a serious nature. He hoped the Attorney General would give the House an opportunity, at a subsequent stage, to discuss the principle of the Bill. He had not given Notice of opposition to the second reading, because he took it for granted that an opportunity would be given for discussion of the advisability of the proposed change; but no such opportunity had been given.

MR. WARTON asked the House to consider the position in which it had been placed by the conduct of the Government. The Government had deprived the House of any opportunity whatever of expressing fully its opinion on a subject which was fraught with revolution to the Law of Evidence. On a question of change amounting to a revolution in the law, he did think that the Attorney General might have had some appreciation of its immense importance, and might have condescended to explain the object of the Bill to the House. In that belief he had refrained from putting down a Notice of opposition to the second reading of the Bill. The way in which the Government treated the House was extraordinary. He used the word "extraordinary" advisedly, because the Attorney General, in bringing forward this Bill for second reading had done so by merely raising his hat at 2 o'clock in the morning, and now, again, that evening, by a single phrase; and this, too, in connection with a measure which made a greater change in the Law of Evidence than had taken place for five centuries.

MR. SPEAKER: I must request the hon. and learned Member to confine his remarks to the Question before the House.

MR. WARTON said, that the manner in which the House had been treated by the Government, and the "conspiracy of silence," which prevailed on the Treasury Bench with regard to this as well as other matters—

MR. SPEAKER: I have already requested the hon. and learned Member to confine himself to the Motion of the Attorney General, which is that the Bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on Law. The hon. and learned Member does not appear to have paid any attention to my ruling.

MR. WARTON said, in justification of his conduct in not confining his observations strictly to the subject under discussion, that he had lost his temper at the manner in which the House had been treated. It was perfectly scandalous that the House had had no opportunity of discussing the principle of the Bill, because, unless it was explained, the House was unable to form a judgment upon it. It would be useless for the Attorney General to attempt to counteract "blocking" by crushing discussion.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD wished to say a word as a matter of justice to the Attorney General, because he himself was responsible to some extent for the authorship of the Bill. The obloquy which had been cast on his hon. and learned Friend because of this attempted change in the law ought not to rest upon him alone. This proposed change formed originally part of the Code which treated of this matter, and this branch of the subject was peculiarly under his own jurisdiction. But, having said that, it could not be denied that the change was a very serious revolution in the law. It had been one of the cardinal principles of the administration of the Criminal Law that no person who was himself accused should be a witness; and it seemed to him that referring this Bill to a Grand Committee in these circumstances was not altogether desirable. The question of principle—although he himself held a strong view in favour of the proposed alteration—was one on which there was among the Legal Profession and the public very considerable division of opinion. Under those circumstances, if that Bill was referred to a Grand Committee, ingenious Members would be found to devise Amendments which would raise the question of principle in a direct form, and the effect of which would be not to reduce the Bill to a satisfactory shape, but to defeat it in some way or other. The result would be that the labours of the Grand Committee would be absolutely thrown away. From the very constitution of a Grand Committee the sending of such a Bill as that before it would not facilitate the passing of the measure afterwards, because those who had been defeated in the expedients to which he had alluded would inevitably raise those questions of principle in the House when the Bill came back from the Committee. He, therefore, deprecated the sending of that Bill to a Grand Committee. The House had had no substantial opportunity of discussing that matter. He, for one, should have been glad to have had an opportunity of discussing at full length the questions of principle which lay at the root of the measure, and to show that the alteration it proposed was a just and proper one; but he knew, after what the Speaker had said, that that was not a fit occasion for doing so. Therefore they had had the Bill read a second time at a late hour of the night without discussion, and then they were asked to send it to a Grand Committee.

Sir Hardinge Giffard

MR. Inderwick remarked, that the principle embodied in that Bill had been already affirmed on three separate occasions by the House of Commons. In the first place, the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies had carried a Bill that was substantially the same in principle as the present Bill; then, under the late Government, the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) introduced a Bill which was read a second time, containing the same provision, and the present Attorney General had also introduced it. He agreed very strongly with the substantial provision of the Bill that accused persons should be allowed to give evidence; and as that principle had been adopted over and over again in that House he did not think there would be any difficulty in the Grand Committee accepting it, and dealing with the details of the measure. At the same time, he must say that he, for one, should be glad that such a proposal should be discussed before the whole House, that he might have an opportunity of expressing his views. If, however, the Bill were sent before a Grand Committee, in his opinion, the only substantial questions to be discussed would be the details of the principle to be adopted; and he felt confident that afterwards every opportunity of discussing the matter would be afforded them in the House.

MR. GREGORY said, that whilst a good many gentlemen connected with the Incorporated Law Society, to which he had the honour to belong, did not look with disfavour on the principle of this Bill in regard to prisoners giving evidence on their trial, he unfortunately differed from them; and he certainly thought that Members of the House should have more opportunity than had hitherto been afforded them of discussing the measure. So far as they had admitted the principle of it hitherto, it had been comparatively limited in its extent. It had never been attempted on the large scale now suggested; and whether the Bill was going to a Grand Committee or to the Whole House, what he wished to see was whether they could not make some provision against what he thought was the tendency of the Bill—namely, of forcing or compelling every prisoner into the witness-box. There would, in case of the Bill becoming law as it stood, be such a prejudice of feeling against a man who did not tender himself in evidence, that he thought it must inevitably lead to his conviction. How that obstacle was to be met he did not propose to discuss at that stage of the Bill; but he thought it was a point worthy the attention of the Committee, and that in respect of it, as far as possible, the prisoner ought to be protected.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Solicitor General for Scotland whether it was intended that the Bill should apply to that country? The Scottish Members and the Scottish people had had no opportunity of discussing the matter. He hoped the old system of examining Scottish prisoners was not going to be re-established. His own belief was that the process of examining the prisoner was not desired by the people of Scotland. He was in favour of devolution as far as the principle was concerned, but not in the middle of the Session. If Bills were to be sent to Grand Committees, it should be done at the beginning of the Session.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. ASHER) said, that the Lord Advocate and he were of opinion that that Bill ought to be applied to Scotland; and, consequently, they proposed to move the Amendments in the Grand Committee which were necessary to make the Bill applicable to Scotland. He thought there was nothing in the Scottish system which should make the principle of the Bill, if it was a sound principle, inapplicable to Scotland.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, that the proposal was not new to the House or to the country. For many years it had been the subject of discussion both in and out of Parliament; and during the last Parliament a Bill was introduced by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley), and it was read a second time after a full discussion. The objection to the present Bill seemed to him related rather to its details than to its principles; and those, he thought, were better fitted for consideration by a Grand Committee than by Committee of the Whole House. But he hoped that some opportunity would be afforded to the House for its discussion at a future stage.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he held that this Bill was about the last one which ought to go to a Standing Committee. There was in it no detail at all. It altered the law in a most material particular affecting life and liberty, and made a change to which the House ought not to assent without full discussion.

MR. WEST said, he hoped the Government would reconsider the matter. The House ought to have the opportunity of discussing the principle of the Bill.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, that the real reason why the Bill should not be referred to a Grand Committee was that both the principles and the details ought to be brought prominently before the public, as they would be by being discussed in the House rather than in the Grand Committee.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, that he approved of the principle of the Bill, but he did not think it was carried far enough; and the House was the proper tribunal to discuss the question whether the principle should be carried further by making a prisoner compellable as well as competent to give evidence.

MR. BULWER said, that all were agreed that the principle of the Bill was one on which the sense of the House ought to be expressed; and if it was to be discussed, after leaving the Grand Committee, the labours of that Committee would be wasted. As there was no procedure in the Bill, but only a simple, though very important, question of principle, it was not proper to refer such a Bill to a Grand Committee.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he hoped the Government would consider what had been urged upon their own side of the House. It was quite clear that there existed differences of opinion as to the application of the principle; and the discussion of the subject ought to reach the public, which it could not do through the medium of a Grand Committee, whose proceedings were practically not reported.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON thought that the principle of the Bill ought to be decided in that House. In the interests of the Bill itself, he would urge the Government not to send it to the Grand Committee. If they adhered to their decision much time would be wasted, and the Bill might not reach the House again before August.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he did not believe that the course which the Government had adopted would tend to pass the Bill into law this Session. He was anxious to see it passed; and, believing there was an overwhelming majority in the House in favour of the Bill, he regretted that anything should be done to impede its progress. No doubt, the Attorney General was taking the course which seemed to him the best; but if the Bill reached the Standing Committee it might not be dealt with until a late period of the Session. He was of opinion that when once the House had affirmed the principle of the Bill, the consideration of the Amendments would not take more than a few hours. If the Attorney General still desired that the Bill should go to the Standing Committee, he would support him with his vote; but the responsibility would rest with him.

Mr. HICKS said, he hoped that the Government, after the appeals which had been made to them, would reconsider their decision. He entertained a very strong objection to the proposals made in the Bill; but whether he was right or wrong in his view, he considered it most important that the principle should be discussed fully and clearly before the public. In his opinion, the Government would save time by declining to send the Bill to a Grand Committee.

Question put.
